Notes and Clippings.

THE Salvation Army is said to be encouraged. At the last Canadian town they visited, only ten of their number were arrested for vagrancy.

A LARGE hunting party, composed wholly of Methodist preachers, is operating along the Illinois river, and chrome-legged chickens are, accordingly, roosting high.

CHRISTIANITY in Dakota has received a new impetus. Sitting Bull, becoming religiously impressed, is lending himself around to be exhibited at church fairs as a curiosity.

A COUNTRY paper, describing a funeral, says, "The words of the officiating minister were, as it were, wafted heavenward, the wind being very strong at the time." It would be interesting to know which way that same wind was blowing.

PROF. HUXLEY said recently at the London Hospital Medical College that, in granting decrees, the tripartite qualification of medicin, surgery, and midwifery should be insisted upon, and that to allow anyone to practice without it at the present age of the world was "perfectly monstrous."

A LONG ISLAND Sunday-school teacher was recently called upon to resign her position in the school or giv up teaching dancing. She thought the matter over carefully, and it is hoped prayerfully, as to which position brought her bread and butter, and, strange to say, she still teaches dancing.

A PROMINENT Chinaman in San Francisco was asked by a reporter how the children of Confucius generally celebrated their Christmas day. "Samee like Melican man," was the rejoinder; "eat, drink, and git dlunk." These Chinamen need to undergo but a slight change to become good Christians.

THAT the wild horse is not of exclusivly Asiatic origin is disputed not only by Dr. A. Mehring, but by Professor Morse, the latter showing conclusivly that the natural country of the horse was America; but there is reason for the belief that the animal existed nearly in its present form as far back as the tertiary age.

THE other day a popular clergyman, in a sermon, called the theater the "Devil's Playhouse," and declared in the same discourse that the "wicked should not prosper." Peck's Sun wants him to explain why Mary Anderson is raking in $3,000 a week while a man who peddles Bibles don't average two dollars a day.

THE missionaries in the Sandwich Islands are now turning their attention to the Chinese, who hav settled there in large numbers. They find the Celestials willing scholars, although, like many of their cousins who hav made their homes in this city, they are willing to be taught religion principally that they may learn the English language.

THE University of Mississippi, at Oxford, gives the girls a chance at high graduation. There are two hundred and forty students, of whom twenty-three are women. At a late examination, the fair students showed themselvs equal to the males. There is a dash of real chivalry about this which would make St. Paul very angry, but which delights the modern observer.

CHRISTMAS was two much for a couple of preachers in Georgia. In Cochran, in that state, the Rev. Mr. Griff, a white clergyman, became insane, and imagined himself to be John the Baptist. His hallucination furnished him with a diet of wild locusts and honey. In Macon, the Rev. George Goodwin, a negro preacher, grew insane after reading in the scriptures the Christmas legend, divested himself of his clothes, and went about declaring himself to be John the Baptist and a forerunner. That was too much for the risibles of the white folks—John the Baptist black! The most original ideas of the year 1883, it seems, were left to be evolved in its closing days.

MOODY and Sankey, having failed to convert Chicago and tried Limerick with a similar result, are now doing England. They are rather more gorgeous than formerly, but not quite enough so to capture the nickel-plated circle. Texas Siftings advises them to imitate Mgr. Capel, who was recently discovered writing a sermon on the poverty of Jesus in a ten-dollar-a-day hotel.

GOVERNOR-ELECT HOADLEY, of Ohio, having been asked whether he still insists upon omitting the usual inauguration display, replied: "I am opposed to it on principle. To me it appears utterly undemocratic. There is no tenable reason why the civil governor of a state should be inducted into office with military pomp. It may be admissible in the case of the president of the United States, but that is open to debate."

THE Minneapolis Sunday Morning Call asks, "Is it breaking the Sabbath to own stock in a railroad that runs Sunday trains?" and the luminous Mr. Peck answers: "By George, we don't know. If the railroad pays a big dividend on the stock, it does not seem as though it is breaking the Sabbath to own the stock, but if it is one of those railroads that don't pay, the sooner a Christian gets rid of the stock, the better it will be for his conscience."

Puck remarks that the man who givs a barrel of flour to a starving family never puts his name down for a thousand dollars for the renovation of a popular church, in order that it may appear in the public prints. And it may also be said that the man who makes it his business to donate sums of money to churches and cyclone sufferers, and puts his name down for publication, and not merely as a guarantee of good faith, never sends a barrel of flour to a starving family. And the moral of this little fact should teach us that there is a great deal of difference between genuin and autograph charity.

"A LECTURER is announced with a lecture entitled 'American Hell.' Why a man should spend his time talking on a subject of this kind is a thing no one can account for, unless it is for the half a dollar a head his audience pays to hear him talk. The 'American Hell' is found in a bottle, and every man who investigates the contents of that bottle is sure to hav more or less hellish experience. There is no need of a lecture on this subject. If the man who is going about has had the 'jim-jams' he is entitled to pity, but not entitled to make a man pay to hear him tell about it." The foregoing remarks are from Peck's Sun. It seems that the fame of the celebrated Prof. Vaughan, of Virginia, who is the author of the "American Hell," has reached the wild West.

"THE attendance at the Bartholdi Pedestal Fund Exhibition, last Sunday," says the Times, "was so large, and was composed of elements so unmistakably drawn from the working people that it cannot be said that there is any longer any doubt as to the success of this experiment. The people who went to the Academy of Design on Sunday were not wholly moved by idle curiosity. They were workers who might possibly hav gone to church if the exhibition had been closed, but who certainly were no worse for having spent a few hours in examining articles in which they had a special interest. The visitors did not wear blouses and paper caps, and therefore simple-minded and ignorant persons may hav suspected that these were idlers disguised as reputable artificers and their families, arrayed in their 'Sunday best,' like decent people as they are. The prejudice that exists, to some extent, in the community against all semblance of Sunday recreation, however remote, is entitled to respect. It is not fair to stigmatize as cant opinions that are the outgrowth of years of habit and education. But in this city there is certainly room for places of Sunday resort which shall do for men and women something that is not done for them in the free church or in the free rum-shop. The success of the Sunday opening of the loan exhibition settles that." This must must be something rather bitterer than wormwood and gall for the members of the Sunday Closing League.

A RUMOR comes across the water that the Viceroy of India, "Lord" Ripon, has made arrangements to hav a bill introduced in Parliament for the disestablishment of the church of England in India. This of itself would not seriously affect that church, but along with any stir in Parliament over disestablishment in India would be sure to come a motion for disestablishment also in England. With the feeling abroad that Bradlaugh's illegal and tyrannical exclusion from the House of Commons has created, the clergy fear discussion, and will undoubtedly exert themselvs to smother "Lord" Ripon's bill. But they will hav great difficulty in advancing any valid argument for the saddling of a state church upon a people, not one in a thousand of whom believes in the religion taught by its preachers.

THE Bartholdi statue is made of copper, strengthened by an inner skeleton of iron. For each piece a center or mold was made of wood, on which the copper could be worked and fitted. The sheet copper epidermis of the figure is made of two hundred pieces, and weighs 178,000 pounds, while the iron frame weighs 274,000 pounds. When finally erected the molded sheets of copper will be riveted together by copper bolts, and the iron skeleton will be secured to the masonry by twelve great foundation bolts. The variations due to the temperature are provided for by elasticity in every part, and corroding will be checked by painting with red lead whenever iron and copper are in contact. It is reckoned that the pressure of wind upon the statue, which will be 150 feet high, may go as high as 190,000 pounds.

THE Salvation Army prayed for a Philadelphia reporter thus: "We hav a reporter here—a miserable reporter—a sinful servant of the unholy newspapers—a good young man gone wrong. Satan has made him obstinate, and he will not yield to persuasion and be saved. Oh, help the wicked reporter. The devil holds the fort in this reporter's brain. He's going to h—. Hallelujah! Oh, may he join the Salvation Army, oh! Giv him repentanc. He is a type of all reporters, and they are all a wicked lot." The lieutenant stopped, to giv the reporter a chance to kneel. The men and women soldiers shouted: "Save the reporter!" "Help the poor reporter!" "Down with the devil!" "I was wicked once, but now I am pure!" The lieutenant then began again: "Oh, kill this reporter; kill him. Take him away, that he may do evil no more. He is too obstinate to yield. He knows he ought to, but he is proud—all reporters are. Oh, strike this reporter down; he is the devil in disguise."

THE beauty of a state church is well shown in the following commercial transactions over an English living: The living of Camberwell was purchased in 1846 for $60,000 by the Rev. Mr. Williams. The gross income was $10,900, and he had no difficulty in borrowing the money needed for the purchase. No sooner had he taken possession than, owing to some dispute with the persons who lent him the money, the living was sequestrated for the payment of the $60,000, in addition to which there were debts owing which brought up the total to $100,000, among the vicar's liabilities being a premium on a sum of $12,500 advanced by the Commissioners of Queen Anne's Bounty for the erection of a vicarage. Mr. Williams was not in residence for any length of time from 1846 till 1870, and the state of affairs in the parish was so scandalous that a petition from the parishioners was presented by Lord St. Leonards to the House of Lords, in 1858, and a debate took place on the subject, without, however, any practical result. When Bishop Wilberforce was appointed to the See of Winchester, he endeavored to arrange this unpleasant business, and proposed with the help of local subscriptions to appoint a curate in charge with a salary of $1,000 a year and the vicarage as a residence. Mr. Williams, however, did not allow the bishop to carry out his original intention, for as soon as the scheme was settled he presented himself, insisted on his right to the residence, defeated the bishop, and became his own curate in charge, retaining the position down to the time of his death.

Mr. Herbert Spencer, of whom Mr. John Fiske is a disciple and expounder, has himself contributed to the confusion of thought which makes all knowledge to consist in classification. I quote from memory, but I am sure that he has said, virtually, that we only know things by being able to class them, or to place them in connection with something else similar, which we know. How, then, can we ever begin to know anything? Mr. Putnam is quite right in insisting, contrary to this sweeping assertion, that there is a fundamental and primitiv kind of knowledge, which we obtain through the senses, and which is the condition sine qua non of our ever attaining to the kind of knowledge which constitutes classification. If I were writing for the learned, merely, I should say that we first hav gnition (knowing, pure and simple), and then co-gnition (knowing with, knowing by association, by putting in class with other things known). What Mr. Putnam is seeing, and trying to say is both true and important, and is what Spencer, and Fiske, and Wakeman, and the common usage of the English language, which has failed to supply the word gnition, while it has adapted the compound word cognition, hav all overlooked or denied. I am glad, therefore, of the opportunity to stand by him as against that powerful combination; if he again would sufficiently study exactitude of expression, so as not to involve me, while defending him, in another class of absurdities. If he would simply see, and admit, and affirm with me that this first form of knowledge, pure and simple, is not scientific, but natural or common knowledge; that only classified knowledge is science; that classificatory knowledge—knowledge of relations, science—is also knowledge, as truly so as the other kind; and even of a higher or a more advanced order (while not so primitiv or fundamental), and that knowledge is knowledge of whatsoever kind it is, he and I would get on famously together. His thought here is really so good and important that I feel sorry that it should be marred in the presentation by anything slovenly and contradictory in statement. I think he will perceive that the main difference here between us goes to the matter of correctness and exactness in the use of terms, rather than to the fundamental idea. Why should he not abandon the untenable ground of endeavoring to confine the use of the term knowledge to one kind of knowledge when the exigencies of literature and his own definition of science, compel him, at once to use the term knowledge with another and more inclusiv signification.

But by far the best and least exceptionable portion of Mr. Putnam's present labor is what he has said so brilliantly and so truly about the relations of Induction—the reasoning from facts to principles; and of Deduction—the reasoning from principles to facts; and about science as allied with Induction and particulars, and philosophy with Deduction and generalities. True, most of these aphoristic statements could be culled from "The Basic Outline of Universology" itself, where, perhaps, they hav not been less carefully or correctly stated; but they are not for that reason any the less true or important. He should, however, to hav given any real thoroughness to his presentation of the subject, also hav introduced and adhered to my discrimination in "The Basic Outline," between two kinds of Deduction, one prior to Induction (fanciful, diffuse, unreliable), and the other subsequent to and derived from Induction, which is the ulterior logical result of Induction itself, and is part and parcel of science, as much so as Induction. For want of noting this all-important and crucial distinction, Mr. Putnam becomes, unwittingly, merely a slanderer and total misrepresenter of me and of Universology, by classifying it as purely deductiv, which is false; and then wherein it is deductiv, with the pseudo or imperfect kind of deduction, which makes it doubly and trebly a false representation, calculated, though doubtless not intended to put me in a false light before the world; to intensify naturally existing prejudices; and to hinder the progress of the knowledge of my discoveries. The truth is exactly the opposit of this whole statement on the part of Mr. Putnam. Universology is distinctivly and characteristically Inductiv; rigorously and defiantly Baconian; challenging the attention of all competent minds to the investigation of that assumption. It is simply that Mr. Putnam does not know Universology; that he knows merely something about it, as he has caught it on the wing, without either the "new birth" or the "sixth sense," which, as I hav characterized them, are indispensable to the understanding of anything scientific. Of all branches of study ever submitted to the human consideration, universology derives its entire existence from the most minute and exhaustiv examination of particulars. If we, as Universologists, are ever dragged aside to discuss the finite and the infinit, God and the world, Which is first, matter or mind? and other such broad generalizations of the vague philosophizing mind, it is because such random thinkers as Mr. Putnam will never let us off from doing so. They are the last questions that we should ever spontaneously arrive at. It is he that is philosophoid, generalizing, and deductiv while talking about science; but while having really, as I believe, no appetite for scientific particulars; and it is we, of all people in the world, who are more thoroughly immersed in particulars, most strictly analytical, most thoroughly inductiv. Universology is nothing but the pushing out of modern scientific induction to its own logical ultimates. All this has been said, insisted on, repeated, illustrated, and demonstrated in the literature of Universology, and is simply and rigorously true; and Mr. Putnam is, as I hav said, unconsciously, no doubt, elaborately slandering and helping to obstruct the greatest triumph of the very method in science of which he thinks he is a champion. All this he does simply and truly because he lacks the "sixth sense," the sharp-edged appetite and appreciation for minute particulars, failing to discover in them the source of a new order of generalizations.

Our place of beginning is with one and two, the lowest elements of number; with point and line, the lowest elements of form; with thing and process, the lowest elements of concrete being; and with the perception that there is a common element of likeness in these three fundamental discriminations. Our peculiarity is simply that we look more closely into the common subjects of science than the scientific specialists hav as yet been trained to do, and that all of our generalizations are derived from these minutest particulars of science; and the difficulty with Mr. Putnam and others is that they lack the "new birth," the "sixth sense," the awakened keenness of perception which should enable them to gain insight of the immense scientific significance which is wrapped up in these seemingly trivial particulars; but I think he might perceive that they are particulars, and that they belong primarily to the scientific, and only secondarily, and by a long range of analogy, to the philosophic domain.

Nevertheless, Mr. Putnam is quite right in his intimation that thinkers—and this is alike true of both classes of them—are in constant danger of generalizing upon a too narrow basis of ascertained facts. He is quite wrong, on the other hand, in assuming that all the facts of any domain of thought must be known inductivly before a science can be established. It is not a millionth part of such particulars that are ever so known in any science. Enough must be known to induce a virtually irresistible conviction that the laws of the subject are such as they are claimed to be, in the science, new or old; but this is only a mere sample of the whole. If it were otherwise, what would be the use, where would be the place for deduction?

True, no man's individual life would be long enough to gather and test all the facts required to constitute the science of Universology, if that had to be done; but, in addition to what has been said, the difficulty is overcome in this case by two facts: first, that the particulars here needed hav been being accumulated, during the ages past, by the philosophers and scientists on all hands, leaving, in a great sense, the mere work on hand of arranging them and seeing their meanings. In the next place, the new particulars, being elementary, are virtually in a nutshell.

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

Abuse of Liberty.

Let a man look upon his own son in the agony of delirium tremens, and then giv his opinion as to whether or not society has a natural inherent right to protect itself against the rum-traffic by the enactment and enforcement of prohibitory laws. What will be his opinion under such circumstances? In the face of this horrid reality, Mr. E. C. Walker's sophism about the inalienable right to get drunk vanishes into thin air. The mind which cannot distinguish between the right to express one's honest, sincere opinion upon any subject, and to make that expression known by means of the public press and the public mails, and the right to destroy by this accursed traffic the brightest youth of this and every other country under the sun, is certainly an unsafe guide. No wonder the possessor of it feels abused every time reference is made to his inconsiderate and illogical roving on the subject of prohibitory liquor laws.

In his last fiasco we find the words "sumptuary laws." A man who used that phrase in reference to the crime-traffic is simply an ignoramus or a dishonest defender of the "crime of crimes." I know this will be referred to as personal abuse. I know Mr. Walker will turn livid with rage and fill a page or two of THE TRUTH SEEKER with kind words intended to show up the fiendish and malignant character of all those who would save their fellows from the debasing results of dram-drinking. Sumptuary laws were entirely different from that which is now suggested by the the words prohibitory laws.

Perhaps a little authority as to the use of words might be respected by Mr. Walker, notwithstanding his general disregard of all authority. If he is to hav a new definition for his words he will oblige his readers by accompanying his articles with a revised dictionary.

Bauvier's Law Dictionary contains this passage:

"SUMPTUARY LAWS. Laws relating to the expenses of the people, and made to restrain excess in apparel, food, furniture, etc.

"They originated in the view that luxury is, in some of its degrees, opposed to public policy, and that the state is bound to interfere against it (Montesquieu).

"In modern times, legislation is not resorted to in respect to this object; but the subject is frequently discussed in connection with the laws for the prevention or punishment of intemperance, which is so direct and fruitful a source of crime."

How different the words and teaching of a thoughtful, discriminating writer from our E. C. Walker, with his luny notions about liberty! The law book teaches us that laws aimed at luxury are sumptuary laws, and that those aimed at crime are prohibitory laws. Mr. Walker, in his steam-shovel style, tosses them all in a heap together and covers them over with his great label, "Sumptuary laws; beware of the dog!"

It is difficult, I will admit, to write with a clear, unruffled spirit on a subject of so great importance, when you discover your opponent has a system of sophism, which is made to appear subtle and sufficient because it persists in comparisons with that which you hold in common with your adversary, and which comparisons you suspect he knows to belong to the illegitimate order, and necessarily leading to false conclusions. Yet this is Mr. Walker's method of dealing with this matter of prohibition. He persists in the claim that prohibition of the sale and manufacture of alcoholic beverages is an unwarrantable interference with personal liberty, because such laws make it difficult for one who uses intoxicants as a beverage to get a drink of rum just when he thinks he would like it. He misuses the words, "personal liberty" just as he does the words, "sumptuary laws." When his attention is called to these things he talks back like a great, peevish, wilful, overgrown boy. He imagins, or makes believe he does, that he is abused. Yet the language he applies to others would indicate that he was far from possessing a feeble stomach on this score.

I don't know anything about it, still I strongly suspect that Mr. Walker is the direct, or indirect, author of the disgraceful seventh resolution passed at the Congress of the National Liberal League. Perhaps we are to look upon this as one of the specimen bricks from that temple of liberty and equality the believers in the inalienable right to get drunk are endeavoring to erect, with the death-dealing crime-shop for the corner-stone.

Who knew that such a resolution as that was to be offered at the meeting of the National Liberal League? Who supposed these people could not be trusted to act with moderation and with respect for the opinions expressed over and over again in the columns of every Liberal paper by hundreds of earnest and faithful Liberals? What right had these sticklers for the right to debase, degrade, and destroy oneself, one's family, and one's community, to push, in an unguarded moment, their wicked, shameful, and immoral proposition before the world as the opinion—almost the religious dogma—of thousands who hav vehemently denounced it? Are we to be patient and calm when introduced to the world, to all the immeasurable future, as a society founded upon the right to get drunk? If the deepest and darkest of vices must be defended—must be reared upon the pedestal of principle and right—before liberty can flourish, then away with liberty. If we are, indeed, such miserable creatures that we cannot be moral and decent unless controled by some authority, let us, in justice to ourselvs, hunt up a master and submit ourselvs unto him.

I do not believe the case to be so bad. I believe that, had due notice been given, that seventh resolution could not hav been passed. I hav that faith in the moral principle of the National Liberal League to believe that another year will see it stricken out. This is not a society the members of which accept matters of opinion on authority, not even of a majority of its own numbers. In matters of action the majority must control. When opinions are to be regulated by vote, it is time it adopted the name of "church," and got itself some sacred symbols.

LIBERTA.

"Straws Show Which Way the Wind Blows."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: While visiting friends in Virginia last summer, I heard the following story: A Mr. G. had been preaching to small congregations in his neighborhood for some time, and concluded he would like to introduce his peculiar religious notions in a strange community. So he sent an appointment to an adjoining county. The appointment was announced by an Episcopalian minister as follows: "Mr. G., a Dunkard preacher of Augusta county, will preach in this house on next Sunday morning, at half past ten, and I would advise you all to stay away, and not go to hear him, as he is an Infidel." On the day appointed Mr. G. was on hand, and to his utter astonishment, not only the house, but the woods were full of people, who had come from all quarters to hear the Infidel preacher.

Birthday Celebration.

The Bennett Meeting.

We append a brief synopsis of the speeches at the meeting held in honor of Mr. Bennett on the 23d ult.

In calling the assemblage to order, Mr. Putnam, President of the Bennett Liberal League, said:

Death is full of pathos—but it is not a terror. It is the inevitable mystery of human life. There is no escape from its all-embracing darkness. We must accept this destiny with manly courage. We must conquer death, and not let it conquer us. We must make it the crown of our lives, and not a defeat.

In the old religions men hav looked upon death with dismay. They hav trembled before the infinit gloom and sought refuge from their fears in the promis of a supernatural heaven. We hav no such promis, and we need no such refuge. In the light of science there is no terror in this common lot of all. Sorrow there is, for life is ever precious and beautiful, not our own life only, but the life of those we love; and to sunder the links that bind us together in this visible world is an unspeakable tragedy. No philosophy and no religion can make that tragedy other than it is, and the promis of science, although it stands with dumb lips over the graves of the departed, is as authentic as the voice of the most potent priesthood.

We need no promis of heaven to prepare us for the dreamless slumber of the dead. We need only the honest conscience. We need only that we be true to ourselvs. If one is unfaithful to his highest conceptions of right, he might be afraid of the dark shadow from whence no human word has ever come; but if one has lived his life manfully, clearly he can hav no dread of any hereafter; death cannot be to him an enemy; whatever it may bear, it can bear only serenity and triumph.

We come together to celebrate the memory of a noble friend, of one who fought bravely for human rights, and death therefore hath not destroyed, but made more living, his memorable service. We come together, not as without hope, but with a noble faith in the progress of all that is best, and that in this great onward tendency of the human race our friend is one with us; his life is still throbbing with our own life; his influence is still flowing on. In this meeting to-night we bind the past with the glowing future. Both memory and hope we make effulgent. We would gather inspiration from those who hav gone before, and like them look ever onward.

The supreme purpose of this meeting is not simply to honor the heroic dead, but through our thoughts of him to be better fitted for the great task which still lies before us. The battle is going on. More and more are we thrust to decisiv issues. We cannot escape the ever deepening conflict, and we look back to the past in order to be more ready for the future.

This is pre-eminently the coming religion; it is the binding together of our universal humanity, the past, the present, and the future. In one word, it is consecration—the consecration of the individual to the world-wide interests of the race. This is the only religion worthy of our regard; that which brings us out of our narrow self into our broader and higher self, which leads us to labor, not for our own personal welfare, but for others—for the millions that toil upon this planet.

I hav faith in the triumph of this noble religion. I believe that in the future the altruistic spirit so nobly portrayed by Spencer will prevail, although I can plainly see that the pathway of man is by no means one of roses. With the keen insight of the scientific observer, Dr. Maudsley, in his last book, said: "The universe makes no sign of feeling under the least obligation to make man realize his ideal. Alongside a process of evolution there has always been a process of degeneracy, and the simple question is, whether the latter process will not eventually gain the upper hand." This may be so, and we should not be so optimistic as to think the ideal for which we seek can be won without the most untiring effort on our part. There will ever be a struggle, and it depends at last on man whether he wins the goal or not. The universe givs us a fair chance; it is for us to improve it.

Against this purely scientific outlook I would put the insight of the poet as voiced in the wonderful Christmas story of Bret Harte, published in to-day's Sun, wherein amidst the lights and shadows of the poet's soul, this great moral conflict is pictured. Here we see the rude, hard selfishness of man for the moment triumphant, to be melted finally in the undercurrent of generosity and manhood that touches even the lowest. I think it will be so in the history of man. There is an immense amount of selfishness and rudeness and hardness—yea, injustice—to be overcome; and many a time it will seem as if the world was given over to absolute chaos of evil. But the subtil, tender, deep forces of good are flowing in the heart of humanity; they will not be extinguished; they will not be destroyed; they will not yield. I believe in the future of man that truth and justice will triumph; that generosity will be enthroned; that the individual will liv in the universal, and thus achieve immortality.

D. M. Bennett labored in the inspiration and joy of this mighty hope; he still speaks to us with the boundless energy of his life. He has passed into the darkness, not to be forgotten, but to be a star in the undying past.

Mr. Wakeman, who needed no introduction to an audience of New York Liberals, then ascended the platform. He spoke as follows:

My friends, we may congratulate ourselvs that we hav lived so long—long enough to meet with one another this evening upon a very great occasion. It is the occasion of the last of the more important war centennials of the American Revolution. One hundred years ago to-day George Washington met the Congress of the United States assembled for the purpose of enabling him to properly return to them the commission which he had received some eight years before, as the commander-in-chief of the American army. That was, indeed, an eventful occasion. It was one that had been looked forward to by the whole world as a thing that might not possibly occur—that the great general who for eight years had been practically the constitution of his country, the only power that had held it together as a unit, should resign that power, return to private life as a simple citizen, and leave his country a disbanded lot of colonies, without any center of unity whatever, was a thing that the great statesmen of Europe thought would be impossible. Not only his friends here, but his patriotic friends of the old country, even, said that if he relinquished his influence and his authority, the colonies would become a wreck like shattered fragments of a political chaos. When that man trusted his countrymen he trusted to the spirit of liberty which carried him through the war. It is proper in connection with the subject which we hav met to discuss this evening to call attention to the final words which were spoken on that occasion. His final sentences, and the final sentences of Miflin, the president of the Congress—Thomas Miflin, of Pennsylvania—a man not so well known as he should be, but one of the stalwart men of that day, who sustained, as few men could hav done, what remained of the authority of the country. The concluding words of the great general were, "Having now finished the work assigned me, I retire from the great theater of action, and bidding an affectionate farewell to this august body, under whose orders I hav so long acted, I here offer my commission and take my leave of all the employments of public life."

How simple! And the last words of Mr. Miflin were even more important. He said: "Having defended the standard of liberty in this new world, having taught a lesson useful to those who inflict, and to those who feel oppression, you retire from the great theater of action with the blessings of your fellow-citizens. But the glory of your virtues will not terminate with your military command. It will continue to animate remotest ages." Mark the words, "Having defended the standard of liberty"—to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselvs and to our posterity—were the words of the preamble to the Constitution, which summed up the labor of Washington and the results of the great Revolution itself. Liberty in their view meant political liberty. And that was the great object of the struggle in which they had been engaged. For one hundred years the idea of political liberty had been the great object to be worked out in this country.

Men like Jefferson and Paine had demonstrated the capacity of the human mind to think and to know without any restraint whatever. This object was one to them as dear as that of political liberty or liberty in activ life. But liberty of thought and action is not of itself a clear victory unless to it is added liberty of feeling, of emotion, of art. To gain liberty in the activ world; to gain liberty in thought, or the mental world; to gain liberty in the emotional or artistic world, are the great liberties which must be co-ordinated together in order fully to maintain the standard of liberty set up by our forefathers.

While we were gaining the political liberty, intellectual and moral liberty was left to take care of itself. And it did; and our country passed through a long period of intellectual liberty unexampled in previous history of nations. But the times changed. The great contest which broke down the slavocracy in this country called out elements which largely centralized the federal government, and among those elements came one called into power for the express purpose of correcting vices which existed at that time. Until one hundred years from the time this resignation of Washington occurred there had never been any attempt on the part of any theological society of this country to control the mails, and there never had been any amateur or theological societies outside of the regular authorities to dictate to a man as to words he might speak or publish, or what pictures he might paint or exhibit. Until one hundred years this republic enjoyed the liberty of thought and the liberty of feeling, and of artistic expression; and the question arose finally whether that power which had thus been left to the people should be taken from the people—should be placed in the hands of a committee who should pass upon what should be sent through the mails, or whether we should leave the thing as it had been, in the hands of the secular authorities of the government, responsible to the people. This question arose about the time Mr. Bennett became prominently known as the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER; and the reason why I am ready to honor him, why I stand here to giv my testimony to the great value of his life, is because he was among the first of our public men who saw distinctly the issue, who predicted what would be the danger, and who himself suffered and showed what the remedy to be called forth was. His death may be the means of calling that remedy forth and making it effectiv. When he was first arrested at Watkins he said to me, when walking down to his hotel from the place where the convention had been held, that he for the first time realized what this thing meant. That little pamphlet he cared nothing about—had never read—for which he was ostensibly arrested; but as soon as he got back to New York he would put in the paper a notice that he would sell that pamphlet. He would do it and see who was the master in this country; whether the people were to be the masters, or whether the church and Anthony Comstock were to govern. And he came to New York, and he did it. If there was to be an irresponsible theological censorship in this country, it was time the people knew it.

The American people hav never fully perceived this issue. They hav most unwisely allowed their consciences and their thoughts to be overwhelmed by the clerical cry of obscenity, that spirit of puritanical prudery which puts calico drawers on the legs of a piano. Until they realize this there will be no safety for liberty. Our fathers who raised that standard of liberty will never hav the cause they had at heart thoroughly carried out until we are able to hav that issue understood by the people at large. There never can be any liberty under the church censorship. Mr. Bennett fought it, he died in it. Whatever else he may hav done good and noble I shall leave others to speak of; I merely want to follow up the point I hav made by saying many who ought to hav seen the issue of secular government ought to hav seen that they were the very ones who went back upon and practically became traitors to liberty. The church raised this cry, and it has frightened some of our friends from co-operating with us. But throughout the general community they hav raised a general impression and suspicion that there is danger unless we let some responsible party hav this tremendous power. But liberty will take care of itself if you once giv it a chance.

In regard to the liberty of thought, does what I think hurt you? Shall Comstock or anybody dictate what I shall think? No. I don't hurt you by my thoughts. Let every one of you think. We can realize universal mental liberty, and can it hurt anybody? Let us think all we can and in every way we can, and learn all we can, and we shall be larger and nobler men. It seems to me that we may say of art as we do of music—that it sanctifies everything it touches. There can be nothing obscene if the alembic of art touches it. It removes it into the spiritual world, where everything is pure, because everything becomes lifted up. If we are to hav any art at all, the one thing that taken from it would be like taking the sun from the landscape, is to take the beauty, the glory, the dignity of the human form from art. In those beautiful words in Hamlet: "What a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! how infinit in faculties! in form and moving, how express and admirable! in action, how like an angel! in apprehension, how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals." There is no such thing as reverence for humanity; there is no such thing as real worship unless man learns to respect himself, and to know that he is the temple of the Holy Ghost. If you wish ever to hav womanhood and nature lifted up, we hav got to hav this done by using the symbols of womanhood, for they are the only symbols that can express the greatness, the beauty, the purity by which the ideal world can be realized. Let us, then, hav confidence in human nature. Let us say to art, You shall be free to use anything in nature as the symbol to express the higher domain and thought and feeling of the human heart. Unless this is done there can be no art in this country.

I strike at the principle, as Mr. Bennett did, and say this whole thing is out of place in this democratic country, and we should never let a chance go by without decisiv protest against the principle involved.

Mr. Chamberlain spoke with much fervor and earnestness, substantially as follows:

We hear wails coming up from all sources that Protestantism is a failure, that Christianity is not doing the work it should be doing, etc. The people hav lost faith in the doctrins of the church because they hav found that the church is not honest. No act or thing ever accomplished in our country has done more to make the profession of the Christian religion contemptible than the outrage upon D. M. Bennett. The book, the mailing of which was the pretext upon which he was got into prison, started a discussion which is now very general. It was in no sense obscene. It was written with an honest, earnest purpose. Just before the trial the word went forth from the Young Men's Christian Association that "a certain class of Freethought publications is about to be stamped out." The speaker then reviewed the trial and pointed out many particulars in which it was unfair and unjust. He then said that after the trial a leading representativ of ecclesiastical fanaticism in this country got up in the Young Men's Christian Association Hall and chuckled and exulted over the fact that they had succeeded in getting Mr. Bennett into prison. If such trickery and rascality as this is the outcome of Christian teaching the speaker wanted none of it. "By their fruits ye shall know them." He enlarged upon the danger to liberty from the first encroachment, and congratulated himself and the Liberals that Mr. Bennett's case was understood by the people, and that there was honesty enough in the people of this country to resent the outrage.

Mr. Henry Stone said:

I would not hav you think, owing to the lateness of the hour, that I shall occupy your attention for much length of time, I hav only a few words to say. Were the time more reasonable, perhaps I might speak more at length. But when I came here I had no thoughts of saying one word. I knew Mr. Bennett for forty years, and knew him to be an honest, pure, and noble man. His value, his labor, his honesty, his devotion to principle, hav been dwelt upon more ably than it were possible for me to do. It is to the proud distinction of which our friend Mr. Wakeman has spoken that I would refer principally. We all know this story and the experience of our martyred patriot. We all know that story, and it is well, perhaps, for us to hav our minds brought back once in awhile to it, that we may realize the duty that devolves upon us; that we may realize that we hav a work to do. Mr. Bennett commenced this work, and may we carry it on boldly to the end. The one point that he insisted upon was the maintenance of our inalienable rights, and that is the only point of necessity. Now the Catholic church numbers its children in our public schools at between eight and nine millions. This church is establishing its parochial schools for the education of the Catholic children, and the Catholic people, in this country, are not going much longer to pay taxes to support the public schools. Are we aware that this censorship is going to prepare the people for war? Unless we can get rid of the censorship of the church we are slaves, and there is no help for us. The one course for us to take, if we would maintain our liberty and our independence, is to fight this power, yes, to the last ditch and behind the last bulwark; to hold back and in check that power which would wrest from us and destroy our liberties. Let us, like our friend, Mr. Bennett, stand well to the cause, and never fall back.

Mr. Andrews said that he wished to call attention to a feature in the character of Mr. Bennett which had not been adverted to by those who had preceded him; and which peculiarly characterizes, as the speaker thinks, the higher order of minds. This is his capacity for entertaining more than one idea, in the fact that while he was the pre-eminent secularist, he was also a Spiritualist. To ordinary minds, this position of mental doubleness involves a contradiction, which, however, the more comprehensiv mind finds the means of reconciling. It is not my present purpose, continued Mr. Andrews, to endeavor to giv the ideal method of that reconciliation, but simply to call attention to the fact that this special assailant of superstition could lend at the same time the most hospitable and sympathetic attention to the slightest whisper of any reasonable and positiv evidence of an after life. I knew him somewhat intimately, and I knew that he gave more attention and credence to spiritual phenomena than might be inferred from his more public utterances, although they were unequivocal. He had that loving and gentle character which would patiently wait on baffling and unsatisfactory mediumistic manipulations, to endeavor to sift out the modicum of truth which might lie at the bottom of these wierd phenomena. It was not his method to pre-judge and decide unfavorably upon matters which appeared unaccountable or mysterious.

But my present object, said Mr. Andrews, in introducing this subject is a practical one. It resulted from this characteristic of Mr. Bennett that he had two distinct classes of friends—the Materialistic and Positivistic class, and the Spiritualists. Both of those sorts of people are here to-night. And also this characteristic of Mr. Bennett favored the formation of that remarkable union which now exists among the reformers of this country under the name of Liberalism, of two parties, working together as one, differing in extremes as to their doctrin; but agreeing and endeavoring to unite on this common basis of individual freedom of opinion, resistance of spiritual aggression, and love of progress. He opened his paper quite impartially to the views of these two parties so combined in one party, and in his own personality he exhibited the possibility of a certain reconciliation and harmony between two opposits.

In this manner, and from other causes, there has sprung up a Union Reform movement in this coun-ry, in which it may almost be said that the basis of of our unity is our differences, rather than our agreements. But this unique movement involves the necessity of a new code of social ethics—of the study of mutual courtesy, and in some sense of a reform among reformers. It will take us some little time to get the hang of it, and to learn to accommodate our language and our manners to the new conditions. For instance, it is no longer appropriate for a speaker, addressing one of these mixed assemblages, to assume that all of those present agree with him and his particular group of co-doctrinaires, and so to say, We believe so and so, when the belief mentioned is notably dissented from by many. Our chairman of this evening sinned a little in his opening speech in that way. It is an ungracious thing for me to criticise him, for he was especially generous in his kind allusions to me in the same speech which I complain of. But, as somebody says, "What is the use of having friends if you can't abuse them?" And Mr. Putnam is always provoking me, I fear, by his extreme good nature, to be a little ugly to him. To make clear what I mean: If a Spiritualist had happened to preside here to-night, and there was nothing to prevent it, and if he had said, in the course of his remarks, assuming to speak for the whole meeting: We believe in the Rochester knockings; we believe in the summer-land; we believe that ghosts exist, and that they are coming back nightly among us and re-materializing, etc., everybody would hav felt shocked at the incongruity.

That might be all right in a conclave of Spiritualists, but it would be out of place in a Union Reform or mixed Liberal meeting. The Agnostics hav a perfect right to determin whether they will enter into a mixed movement along with Spiritualists; but if they do so, under the joint banner of Liberalism, as they are doing, they should endeavor to remember that they are not in a separate meeting of their own. The fault is a mere slip of the tongue, from old habit; but one which should be corrected. Simply to say, I believe; or, I and those here who agree with me believe, would make it all right. It is not that anyone should suppress his opinions, or not be as outspoken in one class of meeting as in the other; but that speakers should cultivate a chivalric and courteous manner toward allies, and not, in a seemingly supercilious manner, ignore them.

True Liberalism is very broad, and is a great attainment. Negativ affirmation is no more Liberalism than affirmation pure and simple. There are four great governing forms of opinion or castes of philosophy. There is first an affirmation; then a negation, or denial, which is a negativ affirmation; then eclecticism, which keeps the middle way, taking a little from the right and a little from the left hand side, cautiously avoiding extremes, its motto being in medio ibis tutissimus (in the middle thou wilt go safest). In fine, then, it is Integralism, which boldly goes to the extremes, right and left, compasses them both, goes beyond every other, both ways, bringing all back to the middle, and finding the method of reconciling opposits, in concrete spheres, and so of being the whole truth. This last will be found in the end to be the highest achievement of Liberalism.

What Mr. Bennett inaugurated in the way of opening THE TRUTH SEEKER, on equal terms, to the two opposing schools of Liberals, has been carried out, even more extensivly and successfully, by the present editor, Mr. Eugene M. Macdonald. He seems quite competent to drive four or six in hand, pulling a little occasionally on this rein and a little on that, and holding all well in check over the rough road of controversy and mutual recrimination. It is not, I presume, that he has not definit opinions of his own, and perhaps very decided ones; but that an editor, in such a chair, holds a sort of judicial position, his business being to see fair play between others, more than to make specially prominent his own views on the points under discussion.

A call was made for the sculptor, Mr. Wilson Macdonald, who said that, though he was not wont to decline invitations to address Liberals, he would ask to be excused on this occasion. The chairman, Mr. Putnam, said that inasmuch as Mr. Macdonald had spoken to us so forcibly through eloquence of his art, perhaps we could afford to excuse him.

The chairman read the following letter from Louis F. Post, who had promised to be present and speak, but who was unavoidably prevented:

NEW YORK, Dec. 23, 1883.

MY DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I had fully expected until this moment to be present with you to-night at the meeting in honor of Mr. Bennett's memory. I find now that it will be impossible to go. Nevertheless I am with you all in spirit, and want to be counted with those who join on the anniversary of his birth to keep alive the memory of his work.

He served in the beginning. It may be the good fortune of some of us to serve even to the end; but none can serve better than he did; none can ever sacrifice more. Had I been with you I could not hav said more than that the life of D. M. Bennett is a mile-post on the pathway of liberty and his name and fame worthy of perpetuation while time shall be. And that I say now. I am, very truly yours,

LOUIS F. POST.

At the close of his remarks, and before the unveiling of the medallion, Mr. Putnam read this telegram from Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., who was obliged to visit St. Louis to fulfil a promis made to his aged mother to spend Christmas with her:

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 23, 1883.

S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: As evidence that D. M. Bennett has lived, I will inform you I hav made Sunday reading of a paper called THE TRUTH SEEKER as an evidence that, though dead, he still livs. I contemplate with pride your memorial meeting to-night. DR. E. B. FOOTE.

Before dismissing the audience, the chairman gave notice that on the 29th of January the League would meet again to celebrate the birthday of Thomas Paine. Until then the meeting stood adjourned. Thus closed the first of a series of Liberal gatherings which it is hoped may be held on each recurring anniversary of the birthday of D. M. Bennett. The meeting in impressivness and dignity was worthy of the man in whose honor it was held. Too glowing mention cannot be made of the beautiful appearance of the medallion, as ornamented by the ladies of the committee, Mrs. Macdonald and Mrs. Britton, chosen for that purpose. Crowned with his own work, THE TRUTH SEEKER, wreathed in laurel, and draped with the Stars and Stripes, whose honor as the emblem of liberty D. M. Bennett did so much to uphold, nothing could hav been more appropriate or impressiv. Mr. Putnam, as the moving spirit of the occasion and chairman of the meeting, performed his duty with thoroughness and ability, and all those who contributed to the success of the gathering deserve the thanks of the Liberal world, which we are sure they will receive. While laboring for the present and the future, it is a graceful thing to turn our thoughts backward once in a while to honor our heroes dead, whose lives will be forever, as Mr. Putnam has said, "a star in the undying past."

THE BOSTON CELEBRATION.

Was deferred on account of the intense cold (15° below zero) of the 23d, which prevented an audience assembling. The regular meeting of the Thomas Paine Fraternity on the 30th, therefore, was made the occasion of the service commemorativ of the birth of Mr. Bennett. The audience was fair in size and appreciativ in demeanor. The Fraternity makes congregational singing a leading feature, and the selections from Kneeland's Hymn Book were sung with spirit last Sunday. The Fraternity also maintains a Sunday-school, which precedes the regular lecture. Before the society John Storer Cobb is delivering a series of discourses on the "Martyrs to Free Speech." His tribute to Mr. Bennett was the first of these. Next Sunday, Jan. 6th, he will take Socrates as his example.

Mr. Cobb's address last Sunday was as follows:

Last Sunday was the sixty-fifth anniversary of the birth of D. M. Bennett, the founder of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, one of the most earnest and arduous workers in behalf of mental liberty, and the latest martyr which the malignance of the Christian hierarchy has furnished us.

I hav no respect whatever for the old aphorism, which says de mortuis nil nisi bonum. I rather think that greater good will be done if, in speaking of the dead, we say, nil nisi verum. There hav been people upon this earth of whom it would be almost impossible to say any good, and yet whose thoughts and actions hav exerted so powerful an influence upon the lives and destinies of their fellows that it would be an iniquity to relegate them to obscurity. In these cases the good would not be the true, and therefore would be wrong. In all instances, even in speaking of the dead, the elucidation of the truth should be the object of our endeavor.

Fortunately for us, in the case of the brother of whom I am now speaking, the good and the true are one. We hav no difficulty whatever in complying with the original injunction, because of this dead it would not be possible to say anything but good. I do not wish, for one moment, to be understood as signifying that he had no faults, or that every action of his life was above criticism or reproach. To attain to such condition would imply possibilities higher than the human, at any rate under any existing environments and structure.

When a life on earth is ended, it is as a unit that it must be considered. We hav it no longer in mere detail. No one act is nearer to us than another. All must be taken together, the balance cast, and whether that balance be in favor of the good or the evil wrought must be made known. Thus applying with impartiality the scales of justice (not blind, but open-eyed, far-seeing, close-discriminating justice), we find the good of our brother's life so far down-balancing the bad, that the latter becomes practically an infinitesimal quantity. As soon as he had worked himself free from the influence of the superstitious teachings of his youth, and saw that man was the proper object of man's endeavor, he dismissed the tyrannic God before whom he had been taught to kneel and tremble, and set himself nobly to the lask of universal man's redemption.

He was not one of nature's pampered sons, or possibly he might hav been as useless as such beings, with the physical forms of men, usually are, and we should not be here to-day to commemorate a life heroically devoted to other lives' advantage. Born of humble parents, nevertheless of stock possessing innate qualities of heart and mind and body which were transmitted to him, his youth was not one of ease and luxury.

His mother was a Methodist, and by means of the Sunday-school attached to the church of which she was a member, the mind of the son was well supplied with material for the onslaughts which he was destined to make upon the Christian faith and the book upon which that faith is founded.

The period spent among the Shakers had a very important effect upon the whole of Mr. Bennett's after life. The useful knowledge gained, added to the stores of memory before acquired, formed a magazine of ammunition of quantity and quality precisely adapted for the war in which he afterward entered with religious superstition; while the mental and physical disciplin of the community qualified him for the conduct of the strife in the way which proved so highly effectiv. To this Shaker exercitation was also, in great measure, to be attributed that tenacity of purpose and elasticity of bodily strength which enabled him, although his literary career was not commenced until a comparativly late period in life, to complete so extensiv an encyclopedia of debate and information as has been left to mark his untiring devotion to the cause whose service he espoused.

It was but a natural consequence of the dialectic character of his mind that his whole road from superstition's close embrace to the free pure air of reason's realm, should be polemically marked and attested. It was not sufficient for him that he himself could sift the false from the true, and, casting error from his path, walk free from its noxious influences. He must teach other men what he had learned. He must even go further than this; he must wage relentless war against those who continued to uphold the claims of falsehood. Hardly had he traveled beyond the first stage of this mental and spiritual journey before he was engaged in a discussion with two clergymen, which I believe was his introduction, as an actor, into the literary world.

"Now then," he says, "if you hav the blessed assurance that your words will be heard, why not accept Prof. Tyndall's challenge, and, if you win, then away with Dr. Walker's Vinegar Bitters, Helmbold's Buchu, John Bull's Sarsaparilla, Old Mother Winslow's Soothing Syrup, and last, but not least, Dr. Green's All-Sticking Balsam! Away with M.D.'s and their institutes of learning. Giv room to the 'man of prayer,' for it is he who hath the balm of Gilead and can heal our wounds. But if you do not succeed in relieving the suffering by prayer, what then? Vice versa. But hold, reverend sirs; before you proceed, would it not be well to let the voice of reason whisper to you a moment, asking you to crack the following theological nut:

"Does not the being who made the world govern it by laws that are inflexible, because they are the best?

"If this being did change his established laws to please an individual, a community, the inhabitants of this world, or the countless millions of worlds, would he not be a changeable being? And if he governs the world by special and local exercise of his almightiness, and has the power to effect all things, other than through the course of natural law, why does he not displace sin with good, slavery with justice, poverty with plenty? Why does the deity permit famin, disease, and woe?

"But, on the other hand, if God does not govern the world by special and local exercise of his almightiness, but by laws which are eternal and unchangeable, what good will your prayers do?

"Would it not be far better if you would learn what God's fixed laws are by studying physiology, philosophy, science, etc.; and then teach your intelligent audiences what those laws are, admonishing them to obey those laws if they would be happy, either here or 'over the shining river?'"

These questions, as may be well imagined, his clerical disputants found it difficult to answer. Our valiant champion had had but little experience in making attacks upon the pet notions of sectarian religion. He supposed that his Christian opponents would deal blow for blow in fairness given, and when beaten acknowledge their defeat. He was surprised when he found that he was unfairly treated. He was irritated at the discovery that, by having the sympathy of the press proprietors, his antagonists had over him an advantage which they did not scruple to use dishonestly when upright, even-handed methods failed.

How glad we feel that such effect was produced upon his mind, for to this is owing his determination to hav a paper of his own, to this we are to-day indebted for the weekly visits of our TRUTH SEEKER.

The spirit which persecuted him even unto death, that gloried in the fact of having been his murderer, is alive to-day and as ready to pursue its villainous course wherever can be found a man or woman who thinks and dares express the thing that's thought. Nay, more; the very same agent that manipulated the outrages in his case, is still in honor among the bigots of the church, and still the despicable tool of their detestable schemes. But worse than all, because from these is derived the power and all the resemblance of right, under which these practices are possible, the laws under which all these modern persecutions hav been organized and carried out are still upon our statute books. Until these are repealed, safety is beyond realization. It is folly to simply objurgate the agent of the wrong. It is imbecility to content ourselvs with bemoaning the fact that the spirit of intolerance still livs. If we destroy its power to act it may liv as long as it pleases, and employ what agents it may choose. Our business is to agitate for a repeal of the laws from which all the power for harm is derived, and not to fold our arms and cry peace, until not one remains even as the dead letter of a law. We shall gain nothing by crying out upon the ferocity of the wolf. Its teeth must be drawn, and then its disposition to bite may remain. It will be harmless, and we need not care at all how hard would be its bite if its power were not destroyed. Not until these enactments are all annulled; not until it is impossible for a man or woman in this land to be injured for the plain expression of an honest opinion, shall we hav shown a full appreciation of the life and labors of him who was the last, under the iron heel of this despotic power, to lay down his life in the service of humanity.

With these remarks, which of necessity comprise but the hasty throwing together of a few unconnected thoughts upon a subject which it would take a volume to exhaust, I now leave the matter to be handled in a more able and efficient manner by those who hav so kindly come forward to aid in making this occasion worthy of the purposes to which it has been devoted.

Jay Chaapel, one of the editors of the Golden Age, followed Mr. Cobb. He said:

It givs me great pleasure to appear before you to-day, in this hall dedicated to one of the bravest and noblest men that ever helped to turn back the army of superstition, to say a word in commemoration of D. M. Bennett, and in commemoration of his sixty-fifth birthday.

When he first saw the light of this planet, the churches had a firm grip upon the people of these United States, and forced upon us a long list of silly, superstitious, and degrading rites. The Boston Investigator, born in the same year with myself, with those brave men Mendum and Seaver at the helm, fought for many years almost alone the bigotry and sophistry of the priesthood. All honor to them and their handful of supporters.

In 1873 D. M. Bennett came before the public with his TRUTH SEEKER. It was a monthly, quite unartistic in its make-up, and came sailing across the Alleghanies from an obscure town in Illinois. The clergy, and many of the Liberals, looked upon it with contempt, and thought it of no consequence whatever. It soon dealt such heavy and telling blows on the tender and vulnerable places of those proud and over-confident fellows that they began to reel and cry out for help from their supporters. Immediately an army of bigots were at their backs to support them and ready for any cruel work. This brave man Bennett kept steadily on in his course, never once faltering, but at each issue of his sheet he sent his hot shot into their very midst in utter defiance of their haughty bearing and overwhelming numbers.

What a disgrace it was to this nation to send such a man as he to the Albany Penitentiary for a year. Yet through all that agony of suffering, how bravely and calmly he bore up under, not only the persecutions of the church, but the derisiv scoffs of those he had reason to expect to befriend him.

The immense amount of work he did under adverse circumstances was very remarkable, and if I believed in miracles I should certainly think he performed many; but back of every effect lies a natural cause, and this truth is one that the Christian world need to learn, as well as quite a large number of our Liberals. It seems, at times, as strange as sad that these bold and fearless men like Mr. Bennett, who struggle so hard to get down to the bottom of human misery, and who tear into shreds the cruel wrongs that so hinder our growth, should be so often singled out to undergo such bitter persecutions from many who in after years would be glad to be called their friends.

Our friend Bennett was one of the army of martyrs. The cold and ruthless hand of orthodoxy grasped him, and though he did great and mighty work and broke their pious grip, his steps were much impeded, and as a brilliant success was crowning him he gave way and sank into the sleep called death. It is a great pleasure to all his friends, and of much gall to his enemies, that the last years of his eventful life were so full of usefulness and triumph over the bigotry and shallow conservatism that swaggers with such an air of superiority over every man or woman. He did a great work, and his name will shine brighter and brighter as truth and justice are better understood. His work, as you all know, was not of that polished kind like James Anthony Froude's, Ralph Waldo Emerson's, and James Parton's, but was it not quite as effectiv? The latter gentleman was his warm friend, and gave him his earnest sympathy in his desperate conflicts with the church. He reached a larger number of persons than any of the above named, and showed them the falsities and absurdities of the Christian teachings in a way that few others could. He spoke from the depths of his soul and with a fearlessness that challenged competition. He has sent the car of progress a long ways ahead, and it will never fall back into the old ruts, but we all must help to keep it going. Let us do as Mr. Bennett did, accept any truth in whatever form, and reject any error though dressed in priestly robes or Liberal garments.

Liberals are sometimes engulphed in as deep an abyss of bigotry as our church friends, and can see nothing Liberal unless the word religion is connected with it.

Mr. Bennett was a Spiritualist. I think it was in the year 1877 that he became thoroughly convinced of the philosophy through Mrs. Lord and Dr. Henry Slade. He recognized the phenomena, and as opportuuity offered investigated all its phases. On his return from around the world in 1882, I spent several days with him in Rochester, N. Y., and attended during that time a seance with him, and we had much conversation upon that subject.

In a private letter to Mrs. Colby and Smith, written from the Albany prison in 1880, he says, "I believe that spirits do exist, and that they are organized forms of highly developed and subtilized matter." In 1878 he wrote me similar words. I say these things because many hav thought him a pure Materialist.

Let us honor the name of our departed friend, and endeavor to cherish his noble qualities of heart and mind.

Mr. Horace Seaver said, in substance:

Every one whose life has been devoted to the development and promotion of mental liberty and equal rights deserves to be respected while living, and held in grateful remembrance after he has passed away. Mr. Bennett was a tireless and effectiv worker in this good cause for many years, and hence he has contributed to the progress of the Liberal movement of today. All such men are benefactors of the race, because they maintain and defend the right of free thought, free speech, a free press, and personal liberty, so far as it is reasonable and just. It is self-evident that to men of this character and disposition we are indebted for the measure of civil, political, and intellectual freedom that we now possess, because we learn from history that before their time in past ages there were but very few Freethinkers or Liberals in existence, and even those were tortured or murdered on account of their opinions.

Five hundred years ago, or even two hundred and fifty, here in New England, there was no mental freedom worthy of the name. It was the age of faith rather than the age of reason, and the authority of the church was supreme—the rights of conscience being entirely set aside by the iron rule of religious bigotry, superstition, and priestcraft. This was the state of things before Liberalism appeared and obtained a foothold; and then, like an angel of mercy and deliverance rising on the world, it said to Catholics, "Stop your persecution!" and the dungeons of the Inquisition were closed, and the fires of Smithfield where heretics were burnt at the stake were quenched. It also said to Protestants, "There must be no more tyranny over the human mind, for all hav the right to think and speak their thoughts," and now a brighter era is dawning upon our race, for it is destined to enjoy in the future the blessings twhich Liberalism imparts, but which were unknown during the ages of ecclesiastical rule.

In these days the cause of Freethought is gaining, and as our departed friend Bennett labored diligently in its behalf, let us all imitate his good example in that respect, and never be found wanting in our endeavors to sustain and promote the great cause of universal mental liberty.

At the conclusion of Mr. Seaver's remarks a stranger from the region of the Rocky Mountains, who said that he was visiting friends in the city whom he had not seen for years, was invited to address the meeting. He said that he was not personally known to Mr. Bennett, but had for several years been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it pleased him to hear Mr. Bennett and his work spoken of as they had been at that meeting, the remembrance of which would giv him pleasure in his Western home.

To Enforce Secularism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been thinking that it would be a wise plan on the part of the League to send some person into every school district, and hav him liv long enough in said school district to become a citizen of the district, and then hav each appointed man or individual serve an injunction on each school board, restraining them from reading the Bible and praying in school during school hours. Cannot you print your views in the next TRUTH SEEKER? Yours, R. M. J. VAIL.

Our opinion is that every legal, peaceable, honorable means should be used to compel the maintenance of secular public schools, in which there shall be no official reference, pro or con, to religion of any sort, nor any reading from any religious book whatever. There are few school districts in which can not be found some Liberal who, if morally and financially backed up by his friendly neighbors, would not be willing to test the question in the courts. School houses are erected for specified purposes; any extra use of them during school hours, or at any time without the consent of a majority of the people in the district, is an illegal usurpation. We are in favor of activ proceedings to enforce the Nine Demands of Liberalism in all their length and breadth.—ED.

Waifs and Wanderings.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

CHAPTER I.

Cupples "Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace."

A slight noise attracted his attention. He could not account for it. It might be burglars. With great presence of mind he awoke Mrs. Cupples. They both listened intently, and Mrs. Cupples became convinced that some one was trying to break into the house. She wanted Cupples to get up, but he argued that it was the cat and there was need of getting up. Mrs. Cupples insisted, and her eloquence became so overpowering that Cupples at last emerged from the restless billow of her talk, not much like Venus from the sea, and stood like an apostrophe, in a questioning attitude, with considerable trembling; for it was cold, and there might be burglars. In hunting for his clothes, he overturned several chairs with quite a racket; so that if anyone were about they might realize their danger, and escape before the valorous Cupples was upon them. The latter did not want to hurt anybody unless he was obliged to. It was his rule to give a man a chance to run away, and he had so admirably succeeded that he had never yet shown his fighting capacity. No doubt in the present instance he would have frightened off any who, with mischievous spirit might have been hovering about the premises, for those chairs did "volley and thunder."

While he was dressing, Mrs. Cupples, with her usual volubility, offered innumerable suggestions as to the occasion of the noise, none of which tended to soothe the perturbed Cupples. She sat up in bed, her night-cap somewhat awry, and giving a weird look to the eager curiosity expressed in her face; in fact her night-cap looked like a line of breakers on a dark and stormy coast, and her eyes danced like lanterns on some heaving ship. Mr. Cupples sat in a chair, holding tightly to the candle, and trying to catch some sound during the pauses of the other's impetuous monologue. During a somewhat longer interval than usual, owing to the fact that Mrs. Cupples' curiosity was getting the better of her tongue—the only thing that ever did—a wail was heard that not only made Cupples's each particular hair stand on end, but almost turn a somerset. He valiantly recovered himself and gasped out, "It's the cat, Mariar!"

But "Mariar" said, "No cat ever screeched like that. It is a burglar. Go right down cellar, Cupples, and catch him."

Women think that the cellar is the first point of attack. They have an idea that every burglar is engaged in a "gunpowder plot."

"But a burglar wouldn't make such a noise as that, Mariar."

"Yes, he would," cried the female logician; "they are up to all manner of tricks nowadays. Go down cellar."

This is the substance of a woman's argument, "Do as I tell you."

Between fear of the known—Mrs. Cupples—and fear of the unknown—the burglars—Cupples hardly knew what to do.

"I'll get the poker," said he, and started for the kitchen.

Another sound, tremulous, long-drawn, and exceedingly piercing.

Cupples was at once convinced that it "wasn't cats," and Mrs. Cupples was convinced that it "wasn't burglars."

Both cried together, "It's a baby."

It is seldom that the Cuppleses were so unanimous.

Cupples almost wished that it was a burglar; for a burglar could be scared away, but a baby, never. Every baby is a Cæsar—"I came, I sobbed, I conquered."

Cupples opened the door and brought in a large basket, in the midst of which was quite a commotion, and, to use his own language, "an infernal noise." Mrs. Cupples was by his side, peering into the unfolding "sound and fury."

A baby, fresh as a rosebud, dewy with tears, and most beautiful, though it was making such a hideous outcry. The light of heaven was upon its velvet face. Cupples couldn't help admiring the precious monster.

But he was puzzled. Babies were to him an unknown genus. He had hardly kissed a dozen in his life, and as for holding one, he shuddered at the bare suggestion. He was afraid he might murder it unwittingly, it seemed so like a "bubble in the air," ready at any moment to burst and vanish in a cloud of drapery. He had persistently kept clear of babies, and now,

"In the dead waste and middle of the night,"

To be confronted by one, was as if Niagara had suddenly plunged upon him. He stood, like Teneriffe, immovable for a space; but, unlike Teneriffe, he had no heart of stone, and so could not resist the crying waves that beat upon his breast. He himself became like a "wave of the sea," running to and fro, yet hardly accomplishing much. Mrs. Cupples looked on with dignity and curiosity. To stop that "everlasting yell," as Cupples expressed it, was his first endeavor; but, like a panic-stricken general, he could not arrange his forces, or determine what point to attack as the enemy came thundering upon him from ambuscades of infantile ingenuity. Mrs. Cupples cried, "Give it the bottle." He did not understand this, for he saw no bottle, and he could not imagine how to "give it," unless he used it to crush the "little giant's" head; and this he thought was quite too cruel. At least it should be a last resort, and he would try milder remedies to begin with. He might perhaps smother it with a pillow. Meanwhile Mrs. Cupples had fished out the bottle, with its snake-like coil, which Cupples had never before seen, and he was quite amazed at the contrivance, and at the way Mrs. Cupples thrust it into the child's mouth, as if she meant to choke it. He was still more astounded at the marvelous change that followed; the sweet placidity that swept over the tempest; the baby-face shone "like a lily in bloom." When Cupples understood it, he burst out, "Well there I'll be ——"

If Cupples's word was to be taken, he was —— about forty times a day; nevertheless, he, thrived upon it like a —— mill-pond.

"The milk's most gone, Mariar; is there any more in the house?"

"Not a bit; perhaps she'll go to sleep if she don't have the colic."

This earthquaking possibllity almost persuaded Cupples to dress and go to the shop and stay the rest of the night. But before he reached any conclusion Mrs. Cupples was in bed and asleep, and the infant was in balmy slumbers, watched over, it seemed, by faries. Cupples felt that for the time being he might trust to fortune, though he earnestly wished for morning that he might be released from further responsibility.

He tossed and tumbled and could not sleep, for he felt that something would happen, and something did happen. The baby began to cry. Cupples dived under the clothes, stopped his ears, and held his breath. But he could not keep up the battle in this way. He sprang from bed and gave the bottle to the baby. There was silence. But the bottle was empty, and Cupples did not know that he had armed the enemy with the materials of war, nor what the next moment would bring,

"With its stored thunder laboring up."

The storm came like an "elemental strife." Cupples was completely unmanned, and the domineering baby took the helm, a liliputian Glendower that could "call spirits from the vasty deep." He might almost gulph the little thing like an oyster, a la Thackeray, and he was tempted to do so. He tried to think of what mothers did in similar circumstances. He flung the baby to the ceiling; he laid it across his knee; he patted its back; danced it in the air; sang to it; shook his fist at it; murmured soft words to it; put it down and swore he wouldn't take it again; but did take it, up as a louder blast than usual laid seige to his ears. Then the baby became silent and blessed slumber sealed its eyelids. With wondrous care and tenderness he put it down and darted off to bed. But scarcely was he in when a new peal took him captive and ordered him to the front. Again there were intervals of rest,

"When silence became music,"

And then outbursts. The stars looked down with an Emersonian smile, as much as to say, "Why all this trouble, my little man?" But they gave not a twinkle to help the "little man," and of course he must "trouble." I guess if the stars had to take care of babies, they would not find the universe quite so serene a place after all. It's doubtful if they'd "make haste slowly." When at last the baby dropped into a profound sleep, Cupples looked like a wreck stranded upon the shores of morning. The baby was like a tiny Hebe, while he was like a wild-eyed Sesyphus, who, having got the stone at rest, expected every moment to see it start off again. Mrs. Cupples dressed. They ate breakfast in silence; a marvelous experience in their united career. A great burden was on their minds. What should they do with that baby? There it was, "fresh as the morn and brilliant as its star," but Cupples knew it would shed "disastrous twilight." It must be provided for before the sun set.

In times of trouble Cupples had been taught to go to his minister, and in such an extremity as this, to whom else could he go? Only a "miracle of grace" could save him, and that was the parson's business—who talked of it as a pedler would of his tin-ware, as something that could be easily furnished "all bright and shining."

As Cupples hurried off he gave a last look at the sleeping little one, and his heart beat quick, for it was one of the handsomest babies ever born into this world. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

DESTINY; OR, THE FREE AGENCY OF MAN.

In all ages, from the earliest in which man (as man) lived and thought, to this hour, he has been harassed, haunted, and terrified by that specter, the offspring of his imagination, called conscience, and which has no existence save in the vagaries of his own brain.

Every particle of matter in the universe influences every other particle, because each is a part of one stupendous whole. Hence, no particle is independent of "the great natural laws" (so called), nor can it, by any possibility, rise above or beyond them.

If it ever appears to do so, we may feel certain it but exchanges the control of a set or order of laws, with whose action we hav become familiarized, for another set or order beyond our present comprehension.

When this occurs the vulgar cry, "A miracle!" but the Intellectualist knows that the majestic chain of cause and effect is never broken; for in that instant the universe would crumble to chaos, the myriad suns forsake their mighty orbits, and life in its multitudinous forms become a name.

Man, body and mind, is but a link in this vast chain. Priests and metaphysicians speak of spirit as distinct from matter. No error is more easily disproved.

That which exists without either weight or dimension (as spirit is claimed to do) can, by no possibility, influence matter (which has both), as no points of contact exist through whose influence (the one upon the other) they could become mutually conscious of each other's existence.

I trust I make this clear.

Myriad ages before you and I appeared in our present form upon this planet, the adamantin laws of cause and effect had mapped out (intelligently or non-intelligently, we know not which) every breath, every thought, every word, every act, between our cradle and our grave.

Step by step, through ages well-nigh too remote for realization, has each individual brain-structure been eliminated, through types and races, from the primeval life germ, far, far back amid the shadowy aisles of time.

The theologian unhesitatingly assures us that man is "a free moral agent," responsible to heaven for his every act. One brief glance will serve to dispel this illusion in those who cherish it, if indeed they will but reason, and not consider the exercise of their nativ intelligence to be a crime.

The brain is the organ and the measure of the mind. Can this vaunted freedom of the will measure the thoughts of a Shakspere, a Byron, or a Shelley, into your brain or mine? Emphatically, No!

And why not? Because only the brain of a Shakspere, a Byron, or a Shelley, can think a thought of so great a size and so fine a quality.

So far we are agreed. Let us proceed further.

We hav clearly seen that the size and quality of a man's brain determin the size and quality of his thoughts. Many thousand dissections prove this fact physically.

A great mind was never found to be coupled with an inferior brain—never!

The brains of Cuvier, Byron, Webster, and a host of others, attest to the validity of the above fact.

I am aware that a certain deficiency in brain-size may be counterbalanced by unusual fineness of material, and that not all equally great minds are found coupled with brains of precisely the same size and weight. This does not, however, militate against the general application of the principle I hav herein laid down. The brain of the first Napoleon (one of the finest and heaviest ever weighed) forms a striking proof of the truth of my assertions.

Every human being comes into this world with a brain-structure, resultant of a vast chain of ancestral causes, which find their expression (or effect) in his or her physical organization, including the brain.

No two brains ever precisely resemble one another in every particular; hence, their products (thoughts) can never be precisely similar, under similar circumstances.

This is clear.

For instance, a man with that portion of his brain largely developed, through a long line of ancestral poets, which evolves, or secretes, ideality, must and can think thoughts of an ideal character. These thoughts could not possibly exist in, or be comprehended by the brain of another man, lacking, also through ancestral causes, this particular physical brain development. This, too, is clear.

Each man, then, thinks such thoughts, and only such, as "fit" his brain.

How, then, can he possibly be free to think what he chooses?

The character of brain inherited, coupled with impulses received from persons and things without (i. e., outside of) ourselvs, are the two, and the only two, causes which determin our thoughts, and thereby our acts; in other words, "heredity" and "environment."

But one motiv can ever govern a man at one time. This motiv is invariably the strongest motiv, be it what it may.

What would to me, under any given circumstances, appear the strongest motiv, and therefore necessarily decide my course of action, would—on account of our diverse brain-structures—in no wise constitute the strongest motiv with each of a thousand other men, selected at random, and their course of action would therefore inevitably be different from mine.

It therefore is made clear that the acts of each individual depend solely upon what, in his particular brain-structure, constitutes the strongest motiv.

Even the violently insane form no exception to this universal law, for in their maddest vagaries they but follow what, in their incoherent reasoning, constitutes the strongest motiv.

Thus, examined by the searching analysis of pure reason, vanishes the crude chimera of what is known as "man's free will!"

Before dismissing this subject, which has been for centuries a "bone of contention" between philosophers and among divines, let me giv a practical example of the fact that man is not free to act as he pleases, or rather, that he is not free to please.

It shall be a conclusiv argument between us, and if you perform the feat I propose to you, then I will acknowledge my grievous error.

Well, then, I herewith place in your hand a loaded pistol, saying to you, "My friend, you cannot possibly point this weapon at your heart and then pull the trigger."

This will, in truth, be the case, but you will "beg the question" by replying, "I could, if I wanted to." That is exactly it—you cannot want to. And why? Because you necessarily always follow the strongest motiv; and, in this instance, the many and powerful motivs which impel you to liv constitute in the aggregate a vastly more powerful motiv than the trivial one which would impel you to die, viz., the desire to convince me that you could please to pull the trigger.

But, on the other hand, should it chance that you cared so little for life that this single motiv of proving to me that you could please to pull the trigger overbalanced the motivs which impelled you to liv, then your death would prove that my judgment as to which was your strongest motiv (under such circumstances a very pardonable error) was at fault, but would prove, none the less conclusivly, that you followed your strongest motiv.

We will now consider a case in the other extreme—a most trivial matter—and we shall see that the same immutable principle holds good.

You stand upon your door-step—you hesitate as to whether you shall proceed up or down town.

As you hesitate, your mind is revolving the pros and cons of either course of procedure.

On the one hand, by proceeding up the street, you will be enabled to call upon a lady of whom you are much enamored, and avoid the probability of meeting with a creditor whose haunt lies in the opposit direction.

But then you reflect that you hav on your old clothes, and that by calling thus shabbily clad upon your inamorata you will run the risk of destroying the favorable impression which you flatter yourself you hav already made upon her susceptible bosom.

Upon the other hand, you reflect that, by proceeding down the street, you will be enabled to transact business of importance, which (with a pang at your rapidly fading prospects of being able to call upon your dulciana residing up street), in the face of this unfortunate fact, you feel that you cannot afford to neglect, owing to the present embarrassed state of your finances.

You also reflect (and with a faint flush of returning hope) that the sky presents almost certain indications of rain, and that should you proceed up-street and call upon the houri of the hour, you could (should it really commence to rain) borrow an umbrella of the above mentioned divine creation, and thereby forge a very tolerable excuse for making a second call upon the following evening to return the article in question to its fair owner; but, just here, a vision of your declining bank account strikes upon your exultant spirit like a falling barometer, and, the strongest motiv prevailing, you sullenly pocket your disappointment, and proceed down town.

So much for the boasted "Free Agency of Man."

It has been frequently claimed that to convince man of the truth of fatalism would destroy in him all motiv for action, and that he would rest supinely, allowing events to take their course, assured that no effort of his could influence destiny.

This would, indeed, be true, could man ever become convinced that supineness were his destiny, but this cannot occur.

I, myself, for instance, believe it my destiny to complete this essay.

Why? Because it appears to me as well-nigh certain that such is the course marked out for me by fate (i. e., the necessary effects of causes anterior to this writing).

Again why? Because I can with reasonable certainty count upon length of life sufficient to complete it and upon the continuance of my present desire to do so.

Belief in fatalism, then, will never paralyze the energies of any intelligent man. If any sink supine beneath the iron wheels of the car of destiny, then, indeed, was their doom, together with their pitiable weakness, inscribed upon the mysterious pages of the dark and inscrutable book of fate!

SHALL WE PUNISH OFFENDERS, SEEING THEY ARE GUILTLESS (BECAUSE IRRESPONSIBLE)?

I answer, "Yes! Necessity compels it!"

The good of the one must ever be held secondary to the good of the many!

Law and order must reign, that person and property may be secure.

For three reasons must the guiltless criminal (guiltless because irresponsible) be punished:

First. For the good of the community at large.

Second. As an example and a warning to others.

Third. For his own good.

MIND AND MATTER.

It will be recollected by my indulgent readers that I hav elsewhere demonstrated in these essays that mind and matter are both necessarily possessed of weight and dimension, and hence are material, but existing in different degrees of attenuation.

That we can neither see, hear, touch, nor taste mind is no proof that it lacks dimension, and hence weight.

We cannot even see the particles which compose common atmospheric air, which, set in rapid motion, produces the mighty cyclone, dealing death and devastation upon all that lies within its path.

Much less can we hope to see that subtile fluid to which we apply the name of electricity. Yet witness its terrific effects!

Projected through space by that majestic force men hav called God, and imbued with human attributes, it cleaves the solid granit mass of "the everlasting hills," with the same ease with which it pierces a film of fleecy vapor.

It is a common error of the ignorant to deem those substances the most powerful which present the greatest resistance to the touch; this is but so in the lower department of physics.

Rising higher and higher in the scale of matter, we find ourselvs at length compelled to pause in the presence of this same august force, which, to our crude sense, appears as weightless, yet which with tireless, tremendous energy, speeds the ever onward, rushing planets about their mightier suns.

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

The Land Question.

J. H. COOK TO J. HACKER.

MY VETERAN BROTHER: As you wish, I respond with all my mind and heart to your last article in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been a land reformer since 1840. Like you, I hav an intense hatred of all monopoly and slavery under every form and name. I hated chattel slavery with Garrison forty-eight years ago, and ever since I hav, in poverty, persecution, mobs, and perils, fought all kinds of oppression and tyranny, till now I am, like yourself, struggling to liv, suffering with infirmities, in want, etc.

That the land is a free gift of Mother Earth to all her children is a self-evident proposition to all who hav heads to think or hearts to feel for homeless, landless humanity. Still, it will be, it must be discussed, must come to the front. Free land to all in usufruct, with no monopoly or title-deeds, is the paramount factor of human justice and salvation. It is that basic truth, the keystone of a true humanitary society, and a scientific sociology. It goes without saying, that the landless are slaves to the land-owners.

If this be true, then, nine-tenths of the people in Europe and one-half in the United States are, directly or indirectly, more or less, slaves. A million of people in New York, and a few thousand own, legally, all the land upon which is based rent and usury. There are two hundred millions owned by railroads, twenty millions owned by Europeans, in large tracts, and many millions held by individuals and companies, with which to oppress and rob the poor.

Can this boasted "land of the free" (?) continue under such a policy, under such laws? No, a government under which one can accumulate a hundred millions and make a hundred thousand paupers and tramps is self-destructiv. "A government that will make paupers and then punish them for being paupers ought to be destroyed." "The people be damned," said Vanderbilt, and on Evacuation Day no flag waved from his closed palatial residence.

British landlordism, and Irish tyranny, oppression, and starvation, will soon be repeated here if the laboring, landless people do not use their moral and civil power to stop the land-robbers in their inhuman greed. You do well, my noble brother, in your last ssue to call the attention of all classes and kinds of Liberals to "come up to the help of the '— of toiling and starving humanity' against the mighty." But is not this land question made prominent, and debated in our public meetings and conventions? Why is it not a plank in our free platforms? Is it because a large majority of Liberals are themselvs land-owners and monopolists, or because they hav not yet opened their eyes to this important subject. Some think that when they hav rejected orthodoxy their work is done. What are Freethought and Liberalism worth if they do not free and supply human bodies? My head and heart are full, but I must stop. Sixteen years ago, I reported your soul-stirring speech at our great convention at Ancora, N. Y. Wright, Townsend, Haskell, and other veterans who were there are gone, and you and I will go soon. Let us go, saying "The land for the people" has been our living and is our dying sentiment. Brother, "Lo! I am with you to the end."

Columbus, Kan. J. H. Cook.

The Root of It.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Being a constant reader of your invaluable Truth Seeker, verbatim et literatim, from beginning to end, every number that arrives safe to hand (some having latterly gone astray, perhaps hied away to the customs office), of course I see all that is said for and against prohibition, which I pronounce useless, senseless, worthless, and occupying space in your columns that might be occupied with other matter that would be more beneficial to your numerous readers. It is true it may be judicious to giv most subjects, and the views and opinions of the various writers upon them, ventilation to the public, as by so doing we obtain knowledge therefrom both scientific and philosophical to those who hav minds to comprehend it. But the subjects discussed should be in some degree sensible and rational, which I contend is not the case with the prohibition question.

Being in a position which not one in ten thousand is in, viz., not having drunk one glass of intoxicating liquors since old enough to distinguish them from other articles, I am not prejudiced pro or con in the matter, and therefore would presume to discuss the subject, if at all, from real facts. As I understand the numerous writers on the subject of prohibition, it is the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors they are aiming at. That being the case, it is useless to discuss the subject from that point of view, as nothing short of the prohibition of the manufacture of the article (which is the only prohibition I advocate) will be of any consequence whatever; for, if it is manufactured at all, those who hav an appetite for it will surely seek and find some way for obtaining it; therefore it may as well be left alone to take its own course, notwithstanding it is the greatest curse which has ever befallen the human race.

But some will say, We must hav alcohol in some form for chemical purposes if for nothing else. I dispute that assertion, for our chemists of the present time are aware of articles, if not quite as convenient, which would take the place of alcohol for chemical purposes.

Then again others will say that it would be quite impossible to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. I quite agree with them, but that don't obliterate the bona fide facts in the matter, that (to repeat) if the article in its various preparations for catering to the appetite is manufactured, it will be sought for and obtained, and in the use of it produce misery, wickedness, and degradation beyond all human imagination—all possible legislation to the contrary notwithstanding. As ever,

Some Biblical Criticisms.

This Bible is the work of God, or else has no authority. We see the work of God in sun, moon, stars, and in all nature. In no instance has the Almighty attempted to compete with man in his performances except in the authorship of this book. Books, like houses, machines, roads, etc., are works of art. The book itself ought, with such an author, to speak for itself. And if there is any portion of the book more especially God's exclusiv work than any other, it is the part known as the four gospels, that testify of the birth and life of its author's son and heir. But, saving perhaps the Acts of the Apostles, these gospels are the most imperfect, obscure, contradictory, of all the parts of the scriptures. We come now to speak of the other and only witness, Luke, seeing that Matthew has testified himself out of court by his foolish reliance on a dream told by hearsay. Luke's testimony is suspicious, and puts him out of the case at the start as an eye-witness. He says, "As many hav given accounts of these matters believed among us, even as they who from the beginning were eye-witnesses, and ministers of the word, delivered them unto us, it seems good to me also, as I hav had perfect understanding of all things from the first, to write to thee, O most excellent Theophilus." As to St. John's gospel, it were more properly called John the Baptist's gospel, so far as internal evidence is concerned (John i, 19). What if some of the events mentioned did occur after his death? We are treating absurdities, and there are no degrees among them. In vain will one search among these books for evidences as to their authorship. We are now left to but one gospel beside Matthew's that treats of the very gist of the Christian religion, namely, the birth of Jesus Christ of the Virgin Mary. Luke sets out by telling us of a certain angel, of the name of Gabriel, who, in the days of Herod, the king of Judea, began to fly around among certain innocent, simple folk of that country, first appearing to one Zacharias, striking the old man dumb, and telling him he was soon to be a father of one who would be a great personage in the sight of the Lord, drinking neither wine nor strong drink, but be filled with holy spirit, and prepare the way of the Lord. Six months after that he appeared to a virgin espoused to an old gentleman of the name of Joseph, and told her a wonderful story also of what this Holy Ghost was going to do for her, and also that the same kind of affair had already happened to her cousin, Elizabeth. Then Mary arose and went to the hill country, where her cousin was hiding, and wonderful things happened, and Elizabeth and Mary are quoted as making eloquent speeches (after the manner of old historians who put speeches in the mouths of their heroes). Then John is born, and whether it is he or his father begins to talk on the eighth day thereafter is not quite clear. The people were astonished, anyhow, Then his father, a priest, prophesies that this child "shall be a prophet of the Most High, to prepare his way." Now, it is clear that this John was the real messiah, and that things got mixed afterward. The managers confounded this occurrence, brought down the date, and tried to make a literal fulfilment of the words, "Prepare his way." They fixed up their fable and tacked it to an older one, and hav blundered grievously. Matthew has told us Christ was born in the days of Herod the king. Luke tells us that "it came to pass," etc. (read it) "long after Herod's death."

If the "taxing" mentioned by Luke was first made when Cyrenius was governor, then this journey was made some time after Cyrenius had been appointed, and so Christ was born after that. How could Christ be born while Herod was king, and yet after Cyrenius was governor? Josephus carefully tells us that Herod died a night or two after the eclipse of the moon. This eclipse has been calculated back hundreds of times, and found to hav happened in March. 4 B.C. Herod was succeeded by his son Archelaus (Matt. ii, 22), who reigned just ten years. Then Judea was attached to Syria; Cyrenius was made governor, and after that Christ was born. Josephus, who is very careful, tells us this, as do others. We know the history of that time better than any period of antiquity, and as well as that of Washington's day. "Here, then, Luke, is a terrible discrepancy between you and Matthew, the only two pretended witnesses. O friends, go out of court quietly while you may." Here you hav come to us with the most extraordinary tale ever imagined. You appeal to our reason and add, "Believe or be damned." Yet all your evidence depends on a dream and a hearsay report that flatly contradicts the relater of the dream. Matthew puts it in King Herod's day in order "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken" by various prophets. Luke puts it twelve or fifteen years after Herod's death, thus contradicting Matthew, and confounding the prophecies. Worse and worse! And we do not know that Matthew or St. John ever put pen to paper, and they are the only two pretended eye-witnesses claiming to hav ever seen Christ. According to Matthew, the only sayings of Jesus Christ that amount to anything, his Sermon on the Mount, were delivered before he even knew such a being lived.

This sermon is the be-all and end-all of Christianity. It is given by Matthew alone. Yet, some time after that, in another country, as Jesus saw a man named Matthew sitting at the receipt of customs, he said: "Follow me." What shorthand reporter had taken down that sermon and given it to Matthew? Every one of these gospels, as every commentator declares, was first written out and published between thirty-five and ninety years after Christ. What sort of evidence is this? What credit would you giv to a young man who came to you professing to be a son of an old acquaintance deceased, a son whom you had never seen, and who came asking the loan of ten dollars on the strength of a letter of recommendation from some other person who declared he was satisfied from his dreams this youth was your old friend's son. Still less would you believe the relator of the dreams at second hand. And yet if the theory of Christianity as to God's plan of salvation be true, you are risking your immortal souls on such flimsy pretexts as these.

Granted there ever could be such a plan of salvation as Christianity offers and declares, I say the probability is altogether against this Jesus Christ being the true Agnus Dei, appearing so late as he did, on the strength of a dream of a blindly credulous, confiding, uxorious old man. The Christna of India, who appeared ages before him heralded by prophets, priests, and seers for long prior ages, virgin-born, god-descended, converting hundreds of millions in ages and among populations far more enlightened than those of 1800 years ago in Judea and all Europe, and who to-day has three followers to one of the Jewish Christ, is far more likely to be the true one.

Well may the priests of this religion declare that reason is of the devil; a very little of it is devilishly fatal to all its claims. Singular how respectable a little age makes the most absurd pretensions! And yet, when real antiquity is considered, how modern is Christianity. He who has lived sixty years knows how short is a century. What are eighteen centuries? Our newly-born nation has not yet lived a century. In 1887 will be our national centennial. Ten years are passing like yesterday. Ten such brief yesterdays will be, and lo! another centennial. Why, a thousand years are as nothing to him who can remember back half a century. How very old must earth be in comparison! Trees, the Boabab, are standing and waving their aged boughs covered with greenery that shook in the blasts of antediluvian tempests. Excavating below them, we find buried, far beneath the mold that wraps their roots, the stumps of ancestral trees to those now living, whose concentric rings inform us they, too, had measured thousands of years ere they sank beneath the weight of time. And beneath these are still more venerable remains, giving us assurance that at least fifteen thousand years ago earth was adorned with foliage much the same as now. And so if we delve beneath the site of the ruins of most ancient cities, each stratum tells its tale of prehistoric occupancy by busy, activ human beings. "All that tread the globe are but a handful to the tribes that slumber in its bosom. Go where the Oregon rolls and hears no sound save its own dashings—yet the dead are there."

"Thou canst find no place whereon no city stood." All the mountain tops hav once been isles of the ocean; all the plains of earth hav once been beds for seas. Ten thousand years are but one wink of Time's eye, one beat of his pulse. Consider the immensity of space, if you can, with its infinit systems of worlds Contemplate the grandeur and illimitable variety of nature as she is disclosed even on this little theater of earth. See what glimpses you get of Truth's infinitude in every science. Reflect as you can on the mighty, yet ever harmonious, processes of that power which stands so near and yet so far. Thus catch, if you can, the painted gleam of that light that blazes upon the brow of Omnipotency. Know the creator through his works if you can know him in any sense. But seek him not in the fetiches of beastly savages, the idols of semi-savages, the Urim and Thumim of priestcraft, or the bungling fables and dreams of books.

From Over the Wabash.

About four miles east of Strasburg stand two churches, "monuments of love and charity." Within a mile of them livs a small family—a father and three children, the oldest a girl of fourteen, who has kept house for her father for the last four years. Five or six weeks ago she was taken sick, supposed by her father to be a bad cold; but as she grew worse for two weeks he called in a doctor, who, with other instructions, ordered a change of clothing. About this time a widow that livs in the neighborhood came in, and she was requested to superintend the change of clothing, when it was found the poor girl had no clean clothes to put on. The widow, who has a large family and supports them as best she can by sewing for neighbors, said maybe her girl that works out by the week had some clothes that she could wear, and did find enough for a change. How many of the neighbors knew before this that the girl was sick, and the true condition of the little family? The widow heard it that morning, and hastened to see if they needed anything, leaving a little babe of two years at home with the other children.

Now, dear readers, you may want to know something about this sick girl's mother. She is in the asylum, hopelessly insane, while the father has worked and kept his little family together in hopes that some day that fond mother might return. Imagin, if you can, the father returning from the post-office with a letter, and sitting down by the fire in the little log cabin, when a feeble voice asks where it is from. He replies, "From the asylum," and commences to read. Presently he comes to where it says "hopelessly insane," the sick girl moans, "She won't come," and turns away, while the father folds the letter and lays it away. Now, if the people of that neighborhood could all hav worshiped and procured tickets for heaven at the brick church, and had just taken the interest on the money expended in the new church, how many changes of clothing they could hav bought for poor children who are worse off than orphans, and how many little shoes and stockings Santa Claus could hav given to the orphans of the neighborhood; and then how much better they could enjoy heaven (if they get there) when they meet the smiling faces of those they made happy while on earth. But as it is, when they meet, one will say, "I built a church;" another, "I almost froze because we were poor and sick."—Windsor (Ill.) Advocate.

Making their Purpose Plain.

That Mgr. Capel was well-informed and spoke authoritativly when he uttered his defiant boast that the Catholics would soon establish parochial schools in this country and demand for their maintenance a share of the school fund, is shown by a dispatch from Rome where the bishops are in conclave. The correspondent givs among the resolutions adopted by the council one ordering the establishment of Catholic seminaries in every diocese, to be conducted "according to the principles established by the Council of Trent," and another ordering the beginning of a system of parochial schools, to "be governed by the principles of the first period of the Middle Ages."

Talking upon this latter point, the Rev. T. J. Ducey, pastor of St. Lec's church in East 29th street, this city, explained to a Herald reporter what was meant by the "principles of the first period of the Middle Ages." He quoted a French historian as to the time called the first period. It was, he said, "that part of the world's history which began with the third period of the church's history. The Middle Ages take in the period between the settlement of the barbarians in the Western provinces of the Roman empire in the fifth century and the literary Renaissance in the fifteenth century, which givs it a duration of ten centuries—from 476 A.D. to 1494. The face of the world was changed. Historical events appear upon a new field when the action of Christianity takes a special form."

The public schools of these Middle Ages, continued the Rev. Mr. Ducey, "were directed by learned clergy, recognized from that time to the present as men of genius and scholarship, and were conducted purely and strictly in a religious spirit. The question has been agitated by many of the bishops and priests whether it would not be a wise move to hav at the head of our parochial schools a priest of recognized scholarship and large judgment—qualities so necessary for the proper training of Catholic youth. This plan was followed at St. Michael's school, on Ninth avenue, in this city, when Bishop Spaulding, now bishop of Peoria, presided over and directed the studies at that institution. This was the course followed in the first period of the Middle Ages, and I take it that this was principally what was meant in the dispatch by the statement that the 'principles of the first period of the Middle Ages are to be borne in mind.'"

Further along Mr. Ducey warmed to his subject, and divulged the course the church would take to support these schools. It is exactly the course we pointed out in connection with Mgr. Capel's lurid threat. "As a Catholic priest," he said, "I see the conscientious obligation of educating our children in Catholic principles. The constitution of our government, national and state, permits us to exercise liberty of conscience. I think it is unwise and not the spirit or intention of the church to attack any institution of the government. It would be very desirable for us if the city or state saw fit to make us an allowance from the school fund for the education of our children. If we cannot obtain this, we are, nevertheless, bound in conscience, no matter what the sacrifice may be, to educate our children to become loyal citizens of the state and loyal servants of God and the church."

This is the matter in a nutshell. The reference to the Middle Ages is explained. The schools are to be purely religious, and the state is to be asked to support them.

The people of the United States ought to feel obliged to Monsignor Capel, the pope, the Council of Bishops, and Father Ducey, for telling them what to expect. And knowing what to expect, they should know how to meet the emergency. It remains to be seen whether they do.

That Art Exhibition.

As was expected, the Sabbatarians are in full cry after the managers of the Bartholdi Art Exhibition, which was opened to the public on the 23d ult. at a reduced price of admission. The secretary of the "Sunday Closing League," Mr. S. H. Provost, backed by the clergy, has addressed a letter to the police commissioners asking that the directors be arrested, and coupling the exhibition with the low saloons that make the streets perilous and the nights hideous with noise and rioting. As a specimen of mean fanaticism, his letter cannot easily be excelled. Taking the police to task for their past derelictions, he exhorts them to preserve the "sanctity of the Sabbath" in these dictatorial terms:

"GENTLEMEN: We wish to call your attention to the gross violation of the Sunday law by the managers of and the employes in variety shows in Chatham street, in the Bowery, and at the hall of the Academy of Design, Fourth avenue and Twenty-third street. Sections 263, 265, and 267 of the Penal Code were violated last Sunday in these places, and no doubt will be violated again next Sunday if not prevented. Officers on the force in these districts cannot hav the face to profess ignorance of these violations, as they were and are a matter of public notoriety. As each member of the force is by police regulations furnished with a manual, the excuse cannot be offered that they are ignorant of the rules which require the enforcement of the penal laws of the state. One year ago the captains of police were each supplied with a copy of the Penal Code. It would be well that they unearth them, brush off the accumulated dust, and read the sections referred to to their subordinates, and al so the police rules which relate to them.

"Your printed regulations are good. They require of the force prevention of crime and the detection and arrest of offenders. So far as the Sunday law is concerned these rules are a failure. There is a profusion of machinery in the force, and it is expensiv enough, every taxpayer can attest; but the power behind it is what scientists would call latent. The power is too reactionary—too many cut-offs in the steam box. One officer on the force remarked, 'We are damned if we won't do our duty, and damned if we do, and we are shoved if we do.' A grave fault lies at somebody's door. We ask that no obstacle be put in the way of the enforcement of the law, that the force be reminded of this dereliction of duty, and that you in your requirements of subordinates use stones if tufts of grass fail. Respectfully, S. H. PROVOST."

Mr. Provost's society intimated on Saturday evening to Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith, the art director of the exhibition, that he would be arrested for violation of the Sunday law if he opened the exhibition Sunday morning and caused tickets to be sold. Mr. Smith said that he believed it was lawful to open the exhibition on Sunday, and that he should do so. It was arranged that in case of his arrest the secretary should take his place, and if the arrests should continue, others of the committee should follow. But when Sunday came the League either repented or became convinced of the uselessness of further effort in the face of the decided public opinion, for no arrests were made, nor was there any interference in any way.

The galleries of the American Art Association, at 6 East Twenty-third street, were also opened last Sunday from 2 to 6 o'clock P.M., having on exhibition the private collection of American paintings owned by Mr. Thomas B. Clarke, and lent in aid of a fund for a permanent prize to be given annually hereafter for the best figure composition shown at the National Academy of Design. The managers, in giving their reasons for this course, said that they considered it desirable to giv the largest number of people an opportunity to see this remarkable collection of works by American artists, as well as to make the fund as large as possible. They also wished to lend their aid in driving home the entering wedge started by the Bartholdi Exhibition, which they hoped would result in opening all our public galleries, museums, and libraries on Sundays.

The successful opening of the Bartholdi exhibition has called attention to the art galleries of other cities, many of which welcome visitors on every day of the year. The Boston Museum of Fine Arts is an instance of the good done in this way. Six years ago the managers of the museum decided to open its doors on Sunday, believing that many persons who had no leisure for study, recreation, or sight-seeing during the week would avail themselvs of its advantages on their single day of freedom from the shop, the factory, and the store. The results, says the Boston Herald, hav abundantly justified this belief. The Sunday attendance is always greater than that of any other day. Casting an eye over the columns of the book in which the record of attendance is kept, it is found that five, ten, and sometimes twelve times as many visitors appear Sundays as on any other day. On one Sunday 4,000 people were counted, and the attendance varies from that large number to 1,200 and 1,000—rarely falling far below the latter figure. The board of officers has always acted with a purely educational purpose, and has never allowed the matter of religious prejudices and beliefs to interfere with the effort to reach the greatest number of people at all times.

The Sunday visitors, who are admitted free of charge, are largely representativs of the poorer classes—persons who could not afford the price of admission. They are artisans, mechanics, and laborers, who come with their families to enjoy the rare collections, and are often poorly and roughly clad. But they are always orderly and quiet, infringing none of the rules, unless it be the command to "touch not, handle not," which is not always remembered by the more cultured visitors. The managers say that they hav never known of any opposition to keeping the museum open Sunday, but, if there should be any complaint, it might be easily answered by referring to the record of attendance, the good conduct of the visitors, and the fact that the opportunity of entering the museum undoubtedly keeps many persons from hunting unwholesome places.

It seems strange, when one thinks of the loud professions Christians make to doing good, that any churchman can object to these intellectual treats. Close the places up, and the people will find other and deleterious amusements. Recreation they must and will hav of one kind or another. Public opinion is in favor of it, and all the laws church bigots can enact are powerless to prevent it. If they be guided by enlightened leaders to the higher plains of living and thinking, the country will be benefited. On the other hand, if nothing but saloons and low concerts be open on the one day available to the laborer, he will spend his time in them, forming vicious habits, and sinking lower and lower in besotted ignorance. For the preservation of society it seems to us not only necessary that all the intellectual amusements possible be offered the ignorant, but that they should by every means be induced to frequent them. An art gallery or reading-room will save more men from becoming drunkards than ever Murphy or Dow rescued by all their preaching. We must, then, conclude from the actions of the pious people of New York that their professions of aiding the laborers are but selfish endeavors to drag them into the fold of the church. Failing in this, every poor person in the country might go plumb to hell for all the ministers care. And if there ever could be a hell it would be just such a place as the five and six-story tenements of New York, with their reeking rum-shops on the ground floor filled with drunkenness, cursing, and rioting, which must be the only resort of the laborer and mechanic if the church locks the doors of all reputable places of amusement. In the following from Sunday's Truth the animus of the Sunday Closing League is, we think, truthfully shown. It is a matter for rejoicing that the secular press is nearly all in favor of freedom in these matters. Truth says:

"The Sunday question, as it is presented by the protest of the Sunday League in opposition to the opening of the Bartholdi Loan Exhibition to-day, is nothing more nor less than the purpose of its promoters to revive the old time Puritan Sabbath.

"In this precious document the Puritans do not argue—they demand.

"With the revived Blue laws behind them, they boldly insist that the power of the state shall be used to enforce the intolerance which was born of bigotry. They ask that their view of the Sabbath shall be the pattern of every man's conduct on Sunday, and talk of 'dereliction of duty' on the part of the police force because it is not used to enforce the exploded notions of a narrow religion.

"Shall the bigots hav their way, and the great body of people be compelled to walk in it?

"With them it is simply a question of religion.

"With the rest of the community it is a question of right.

"Every man is entitled to enjoy his religion, whatever it may be, but no man should be allowed to force his creed or its observances upon others. It is true the penal laws of the state recognize this wrong, but the better sense of the people rejects it.

"Even the Leaguers acknowledge that in practice the Sunday law is a fuilure.

"They fail, however, to understand the philosophy of this failure. If they must be told they must—it is because Protestant Christianity is a failure, except in the narrow grooves to which it is now confined. When religion was made to appeal to the reason it lost its hold upon the heart. Faith and superstition go hand in hand—when the one is extirpated the other dies. And what makes the failure of Protestantism as a religion absolute is the fact that it is not warred against—it is too lifeless a thing for passion, and is strangled by the indifference of men to its feeble teachings and absurd observances.

"Catholicism prospers while Protestantism decays, because it is the religion of glamour, of pomp, of sublime music, and of a grand ceremonial—the religion which appeals to the emotional nature of man through what he sees and hears rather than what he believes.

"But in the Roman Catholic church there is no Sabbatarianism—Sunday is a day for recreation and merriment—a day for amusement as well as worship.

"Protestantism, on the contrary, when it threw off the yoke of Rome, took on that of Jerusalem.

"It is the Hebrew Sabbath in manner and dogma, for the enforcement of which the penal laws of the state provide. In getting away from Romanism the reformers got back to Judaism. They were narrow men, and the narrowness of the Hebraic law suited them. They were stern men, and it gave them pleasure to see others groan under their revival of the requirements of a disused dispensation. A religion of love and merriment was not to their taste, and so Calvin and Knox had reinstituted what Jesus had abrogated, and placed Moses above Christ.

"This is the law which the little Calvins of to-day are seeking to impose upon free men.

"They cannot do it.

"What they can and will do, however, if they persist in their childish endeavors, will be to teach the masses of mankind to hate them for their stern and narrow bigotry."

The Sunday Mercury supplements the foregoing with these sensible words:

"The constitutional fanatics who compose the Sunday Closing League hav recommenced their efforts to make the first day of the week as dreary as John Calvin could desire. That body of meddlers hav addressed a communication to the Police Board in relation to the keeping open of certain side shows on the Bowery and Chatham street and the Loan Exhibition at the Academy of Design. Instead of tabling the protest, it was referred to Superintendent Walling. Nobody, perhaps, cares what becomes of the side shows, but the entire public is interested in the success of the Loan Exhibition, which is to add to the fund for the completion of the great pedestal on which is to be mounted Bartholdi's colossal statue of Liberty Enlightening the World. The Academy of Design was crowded last Sunday with an eager and delighted multitude of working people, whose only opportunity to see the splendid works of art on loan is the day on which they are free from toil. The admission was reduced to half price, that the Sunday exhibition might be successful. The League pretend that the penal laws prohibit any such exhibition. It must be a strained construction indeed which can include the opening to the people of such institutions as the Academy of Design, the Museum of Arts, and the Museum of Natural History. Rigid as the law is, it was not intended to prohibit the people from the enjoyment of art and science on Sunday. Such are not places of personal ownership or lesseeship, but belong to the whole metropolis. They do more than amuse—they instruct, refine, and elevate. Perhaps in a lifetime another such chance of seeing so many grand, beautiful, and costly works of art will not again be afforded the people who labor during the six days of the week as are now to be found at the junction of Fourth avenue and Twenty-third street. It is their right to see and enjoy them, and if to-day there is any tampering with it by the police, the courts are open, and an injunction is the remedy. In any city of continental Europe no such a pestiferous body as the Sunday League could exist. Public opinion would sweep it into oblivion. And in New York the same battery should be opened upon it. That which at this moment makes the League doubly odious is its protest against the right of the working people to see an unusual collection of art works on the only day they can spare, and the unpatriotic attempt to cut short the fund to finish a pedestal when Bartholdi's statue is lying in Paris ready for shipment to this port when Bedloe's Island is in a condition to receive it."

These are plain and hard words for the clergy and their followers to read, but there is a vast deal of truth in them. Protestantism is going down; Catholicism is going up. Instead of fighting irrational battles with the rationalistic spirit and tendency of the age, the Protestants should join in resisting the encroachments upon our institutions of the Romish church. There would be an infinit deal more of common sense in the latter course.

Another New Feature.

In this the first issue of the new year we begin a Freethought romance entitled "Waifs and Wanderings," by Mr. Putnam. The success of his "Golden Throne," "Gottlieb," and other stories is a guarantee of the interest this will excite. We hav not read further than the first chapter, being sure that anything he writes will be full of fine imagery, broad humanitarianism, keen wit, and common sense.

The publication of this novel is in response to many letters requesting that such a feature be added to the paper; and the many encomiums showered upon the Children's Corner encourage us to believe a good Freethought serial story will attract new readers to THE TRUTH SEEKER and add variety and spice to its columns.

With a "Corner" for the youngsters, a story for the older youths and maidens, and philosophical essays for the old folks, certainly THE TRUTH SEEKER ought to be a welcome visitor in every Freethinker's house. But in the midst of our diversions let us not forget that we hav a grand work to do in breaking mental shackles and winning for every Infidel equality before the law and justice in the administration of our government. Our institutions must be secularized; that end must ever be kept in view.

The Salamanca Convention.

Our special report of the Salamanca Convention does not reach us in time for this issue, but we see by the Associated Press dispatches that the gathering was an influential one in numbers and ability of the speakers. On Saturday evening the following resolutions were adopted:

The Freethinkers of western New York, in convention assembled at Salamanca, respectfully announce to their fellow-citizens the objects they hav in view, and the means by which they would obtain them. We seek:

First—By free discussion to place before our countrymen, and on an immovable basis, the natural, sacred, and inalienable right of all men, as men, to exercise entire freedom of thought and freedom of speech on all subjects of human interest, without dictation either from the state or from the organization known as the church. We would defend by arms, if necessary, the rights of all religionists, from the pope down to the Salvation Army, to believe and worship as they please; and this right, which, in the spirit and letter of the national constitution, we so cheerfully accord to them, we claim for ourselvs, and will exercise to the fullest extent in our war upon the superstitions of the church, and her claims to prescribe to all men what they shall believe and do. The only weapon we use or wish to use is that of free and fair discussion.

Second—The government of the United States being purely secular, and the United States constitution ignoring all religions and all religious oaths, we aim to bring the constitutions and governments of the states in the Union, respectivly, up to the same high level. In some of these states, if the lives, liberty, property, or reputation of a score of American citizens depended upon the president or any other member of this convention, that testimony would be rejected in the courts of justice, and these interests would all be sacrificed, because he did not believe in a set of absurd and exploded religious dogmas. This discrimination against a worthy citizen of one state by the laws of another, is an outrage upon the national constitution, as well as upon the citizen himself, and the guilt and meanness of it both lie at the door of the church.

Third—We desire to enlighten the consciences of our church friends so that they will see the injustice of exempting ecclesiastical property from taxation, which exemption, amounting to scores of millions of dollars, increases the taxation to that extent of the great majority of citizens who take no stock in religious corporations, but are compelled to support them. For the same reason we protest against the expenditure of public money in paying the salaries of chaplains in the army, the navy, and the two houses of Congress, officers which are entirely unknown to the constitution of the United States, and whose employment and pay are therefore illegal.

Fourth—We aim by criticism and argument to weaken the confidence of our fellow-citizens in the Bible as a purely inspired revelation from heaven, containing an infallible rule of faith and practice, believing that the book itself sets forth no such claims. Our position on this subject is all the more important because the practice of polygamy in the territory of Utah is an anomalous fact in American civilization; and we confess our apprehension that the idolatry of a book which glorifies polygamists and holds them up as model saints is the greatest hindrance in the way of settling the question which is raised by it without resorting to a civil war. The Mormon, planting himself behind the ramparts of the Bible and the example of our foreign missionaries, who, with the approbation of the churches at home, hav admitted polygamists into their mission churches, conquers in debate any religionist who attacks him. The politicians try to curry favor with the religionists who vote, and propose the old and favorit church remedy of persecution. This naturally and inevitably increases the zeal of the Mormons, and makes them grow in numbers; and this complication of circumstances threatens to precipitate another civil war, which, if undertaken by the government, will never cease till every Mormon is exterminated in his own blood, and will giv additional proof that the multiform body which calls itself the Church of God has been the cause and the occasion of shedding more human blood than any other organization of men upon the face of the whole earth. While Mormon polygamy is a Bible institution, we, as Freethinkers, repudiate and condemn it as a violation of the law of natural morality, and we wash our hands of the guilt of persecuting by fire and sword, and would meet it, as we do all the superstitions of the church and Bible, by sound argument, by the monogamic tendencies of our modern civilization, by free schools, and by railroads.

Editorial Notes.

THE Christian directors of Girard College hav reformed to the extent of declining to hereafter lease any property to be used for barroom purposes. There is as yet no indication of their possessing honesty sufficient to carry out the instructions of the founder of the college by excluding ministers from the grounds and buildings. The receipts of the college for eleven months of this year reached $423,168.50. The institution is educating 1,098 orphan boys.

FATHER LINEHAN received a Protestant minister and two other followers of Luther into the church. The minister is widely and favorably known throughout Iowa as Parson Adams. For many years he had charge of a church in Boston and other eastern cities. Until two months ago he was pastor of St. Mark's Episcopal church at Fort Dodge. This makes twelve converts the same priest has received into the church during the last month.—Western Watchman.

We predict there will be a good many more of these "conversions." There are two forces working in the Protestant church; one is conservativ and retrograding, the other progressiv and advancing. Protestants occupy an illogical position midway between Rome and Reason, and must finally abandon it. Then will come the tug of war of this country.

THE committee on the Freedman's bank made a final report, memorializing Congress to reimburse depositors and denouncing a former act of Congress in creating a commission of $5,000 a year each to settle the affairs of the institution. In support of the adoption of the report Mr. Murrill said that "the Freedman's bank was the most disgraceful and sinful swindle that ever stained earth or shocked high heaven. The commission appointed at $5,000 a year each was like a hyena devouring a carcass, and then like a lion smashing its bones and sucking the marrow therefrom; and furthermore, a Republican Congress made the commission the pall-bearer of this same carcass."—Washington Dispatch.

The high and mighty mover of the Freedman's bank was General Oliver O. Howard, a notoriously fervent Christian statesman. The World is authority for the statement that it is his opinion that these disturbers ought to be branded with red indelible ink.

THE Morpeth Herald, says Mrs. Besant, is very angry with us for welcoming Mr. Ramsay on his release from prison. It says that as only three hundred persons welcomed him out of a population of three millions, the minority sympathizing with him is so small that it "cannot expect freedom to run amuck against the political, social, moral, and religious institutions held in reverence by the vast majority of the people." In the first place, no effort was made to obtain a numerically large demonstration; the Freethought London societies sent delegates, and did not go en masse. Secondly, does the Morpeth Herald think that minorities ought to be persecuted as long as they are small? If so, the Jews were justified in persecuting the miserable minority who called themselvs followers of Jesus, and who outraged the holiest convictions of the Jewish nation, and "ran amuck at their political, social, moral, and religious institutions," to a greater extent than do Freethinkers against Christian.

IN a discourse delivered before the Society of Spiritualists, of Providence, R. I., Henry Kiddle, of this city, said:

"It is true, and I think sad as true, that there are persons preaching Atheism as the offshoot, or identical with, modern Spiritualism. Recently a prominent Spiritualistic lecturer enunciated the Atheistic principle that the 'universe is a self-existing automatic entity,' which is very far from, as I hav found, the doctrin taught through the best mediums and inspirational speakers. On the contrary, the spirit utterances through these recognized God as a self-conscious person, having a personal relation to his intelligent, self-conscious creatures—that is, a parental relation. The attributes assigned to him are infinit love and wisdom, as well as ubiquity and omnipotence."

We think there are several thousand Spiritualists in this country who will disagree with Mr. Kiddle's views as expressed in the above paragraph. They will, however, concede the truth of the following utterance on the same occasion:

"Human slavery always found its strongest apologists among the Christian clergy, who had an armory of scriptural weapons to defend it; while a Christian bishop was so zealous that he defended it with carnal weapons."

THE creedal hair-splittings of the various sects hav afforded several whose appreciation of a joke was greater than their reverence for the picayune verbalists who concocted the differences between the brethren an opportunity to display their wit. Samples of some of these hits hav been gathered by the Independent, which enjoys a joke even if it be at the expense of its religion. The difference between "High church" and "Low church" was once explained by the pastor of a floating bethel, who, when asked whether his was High or Low, responded that that depended entirely upon the tide. An English caterer distinguished them otherwise. When desired to prepare an entertainment, he required to know whether they were High church or Low church; "because," said he, "if they are Low church we eats 'em; if they are High church we drinks 'em." The difference between old school and new school Presbyterians was described by some one who said he believed it consisted in this: that the old school stood up when it prayed, and the new school stood up when it sang. The difference between a Universalist and a Unitarian was wittily expressed by Starr King while still belonging to the former body: "The Universalists believe that God is too good to damn them, while the Unitarians believe that they are too good to be damned." The difference between a Methodist and a Baptist was set forth by the concluding remarks of a spirited discussion between two members of those denominations, when the Baptist remarked, "I don't like you Methodists anyhow, for you hav too much machinery about you;" to which the Methodist brother promptly retorted, "I don't care if we hav; we don't run it by water."

Spiritualism.

I am surprised at Prof. LaRoy Sunderland's last article on the above subject—surprised he so confidently writes on a subject which from his own confessions he can hav seen so little. He says he has been "plying these wires for sixty years, and had not yet been able to find out who was at the other end—either gods or ghosts!"

Spiritualists sincerely commiserate his bewilderment; but we would bid him not despair, for there are many (I regret to say) in much the same fix; and when I think on Tom Winter, Elmina, and Bob Ingersoll, my eyes begin to moisten. But then the immortal Paine says, "Incredulity is no crime;" hence, it makes but little difference in regard to beliefs.

The professor, with the rest of skeptics, will know when his time comes. One of the beauties of Spiritualism is the impossibility of good, moral, benevolent people signing away their day of grace—a decided improvement on Christianity.

Sixty years! Well, that is a long time. Of one thing I am certain: he evidently has not seen what I hav in the way of spiritual phenomena and intelligence, or he would not talk so mournfully. It would occupy too much of your valuable space to ask a repetition of what you hav already published of mine in the way of spiritual phenomena. And again, it would do little good. Spirit phenomena and spirit intelligence must be seen and comprehended to be of much importance. I could say with truth that I hav seen spirits, heard them, reasoned logically with them, auricularly; shaken hands with them; listened to their singing; had the benefit of their prescribed remedies in my own dwelling; had forewarnings of dangers, and prudential cautions against untrustworthy associates. I could also describe manifestations of the most horrifying, diabolical orgies to which I hav been witness and listened, and the most malignant, reckless, barbarous, indecent, vulgar blasphemy that ever struck the ear—apparently from miscreants fresh from the gallows.

All these events I could narrate; but their recital would read like a romance. To be believed these things must be witnessed; and in the face of so much fraudulent mediumship skepticism is quite excusable. And here intervenes another difficulty: no one can command the proper conditions necessary for their reproduction, and hence the evidences of this mystic domain must of necessity be fragmental and cumulativ. as it were, piecemeal.

The eloquence of the rostrum is of great importance to draw public attention to the mysteries and liberalizing tendencies and claims of Spiritualism; but with me four lines through the tippings of a common toilet or kitchen table, with a good medium, are of more importance and more convincing to a skeptic than hours of inspirational talk. 'Tis a court of inquiry.

I hav great respect for science; but her votaries are too much inclined to affect aristocracy, and delight to stalk around, as it were, on stilts—an unwise elevation, indeed, in prospecting for superior knowledge, and the modest jewels of truth lying but half hidden beneath her insensible pedals. Alas! it too often occurs that the greatest discoveries and suggestions originate from obscure but sensible matronly ladies and unpretentious thinkers; but they are seldom received into public favor until some pedantic collegiate institution givs them a theologic or classic indorsement.

The professor's chapter on faith is good, but is hardly applicable to the case of one who in early life was employed in reading proof, in the year 1815, of the first Bible, then being stereotyped by Messrs. D. & G. Bruce, for the American Bible Society, New York. This occupation not only familiarized me with the contents of this obscene, immoral, and enigmatical volume, but brought me into intimacy with the sanctified parasites and "wire-pullers" of this aristocratic and now powerful institution, and the whole Christian brotherhood. The result was, from that period until the (so-called) Rochester knockings began to excite public attention, I was a hopeless Atheist—a total disbeliever in a continued existence.

From the above, can it be supposed that he who had for years withstood the orthodox bombardment of blind faith, could adopt the truths of Spiritualism, with all its oddities and apparent absurdities, without critical examination?

There is truth in the remark of Mr. Paine. that "a lie oft repeated and never contradicted will after a while pass for truth." How true is this as applied to Spiritualism. Its opponents love to belittle everything intellectually emanating through its mediums as the veriest twaddle, platitudes, asinine, wanting in originality, correctness of diction, and grammatical construction, etc.

I thought it would be pleasing to many of your readers—lovers of truth—to get a specimen of what came through the agency of a toilet table a few years since at my house.

The company, consisting of four gentlemen, had assembled with the exception of the medium, and the subject of meteors had been under discussion—one having recently passed over the city. remarkably luminous and of peculiar formation. The medium, an elderly gentleman of plain education and quite unpretentious, soon arriving, the party was complete. The medium and one of the gentlemen placed their hands upon the table, the rest of the company sitting in quietude near. We, as a rule, allow the spirit intelligence to commence in its own way, without dictation or solicitation of its name. In this instance the spirit (or "What-is-it," the professor would probably conclude) had evidently overheard our conversation and felt a disposition to put in a word; it commenced abruptly: "You want to know what an aerolite is. The aerolite is a fragment of a planet that once rolled about the sun coincident with the other planets. The sun will sometimes himself explode. I mean only that sort of explosion known as volcanic. You know what this earth is said to be composed of; the same elements compose the sun and other bodies in the great illimitable space. Omnipotence no doubt controls the mighty maze. Every convulsion of nature only proves the goodness of God. You will yearly see simultaneous displays of meteoric phenomena until the source of planetary supplies is exhausted. I learn that the sun sends out of its stores of planetary matter its contributions to the universal system of created things."

Once I chanced to be in company with my intimate acquaintance, Professor Vale, at a rapping seance. The professor was a hard-headed skeptic. We were obtaining a message purporting to come from our mutual departed friend, George H. Evans, brother to the elder. "Bruce, why will you call them spirits?" "Why, professor, this is what they call themselvs; but," I continued, "if you are so particular, no doubt they would accommodate you should you call them 'Barbarrosa' or 'Mr. Electricity'—would you not?" I said, addressing the still remaining influence in the direction of the medium. We had in response one unusually loud rap, signifying "no." I must admit I was much surprised. "Oh, think it over once more—that is, just to please the professor; a professor of navigation, you know." A signal was given for calling the alphabet, which on being registered spelled out, "Bruce, stop your trifling nonsense."

I don't know that the professor ever became a convert, but he always liked to talk on Spiritualism. He, however, declared Professor Faraday had destroyed the reputation of a lifetime. DAVID BRUCE.

Williamsburgh, L. I.

Fruits of Land-robbery.

In my last, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 1st, I gave some account of the effects that land-robbery in Ireland had had, not only on that country, but the evil result of it there on this country in times of famin caused there by land-grabbers. I now propose to speak of the fruits of it here.

Thousands—aye, millions, of young men who would hav been willing to go into the wilderness and make themselvs farms, if they had not been robbed by our government of their right to land, hav been driven by that robbery into all other branches of labor, until the labor market is so overstocked with hands that they hav no voice in setting a price on labor, but hav to underbid one another to get employment, and work for just what the capitalists choose to offer.

If a man goes to buy land of a land-robber, the robber can set his own price on the land, and the customer must giv that price or remain landless.

If a poor man wants to hire money, he can hav no voice in the rate he is to giv for interest, but must pay whatever per cent the Shylock pleases to fix on; and so in all other dealings between the capitalist and laborer, until the latter wants to sell his labor, and then, instead of fixing his own price, as the capitalists do on what they hav to sell, he is forced to stand back and let the purchaser of labor fix the price, and if he is not willing to work for that price some other man who has been robbed of land, and whose family is nearer starvation, is ready to step in before him.

Thus land-robbery has crowded the market with labor, and placed nearly all laborers under the grinding heel of capital.

Thirty years ago, when conversing with the president of a car factory, I asked him how many men they employed. "One hundred and fifty," he replied, "but we are not fairly under way yet. When we get all our machinery in we shall hav over two hundred men. It is easier to get men than machines, for we hav to wait for machines to be made, while men are plenty everywhere."

Think of that, ye landless men, who hav been robbed by your own servants in Congress! Men more plenty, cheaper, and easier to be obtained than machines of iron and wood. And all because you hav been robbed of your right to land, and driven thereby into the market to underbid one another in selling the strength of your sinews! Human beings more plenty and cheaper than machines, and thrown into the pauper house to die among thieves and harlots when worn out or broken down, while the machine is carefully repaired!

I could write over quires of paper on the evil fruits of land-robbery, but desire to be as brief as possible and not intrude too much on space in the paper. In brief, I can trace full two-thirds of all the poverty, rags, hunger, drunkenness, prostitution, theft, pauperism, and criminal court and prison expenses to land-robbery as their cause.

What means the great number of tramps? Land-robbery. What mean all the strikes we hear of among the working classes in all parts of our land? They mean land-robbers—aye, and a great deal more. They mean that if this great wrong is not righted, the time is not far distant when the dwellings of rich land-holders and monopolists, their factories and mills, their railroad stations and banks, will be blown up with dynamite and their owners with them when asleep. Remember, I am not encouraging this vengeance—only warning the nation of what is as sure to come as the sun is to shine, unless this great wrong is righted. The American people are not of that class that will forever consent to be slaves, and to stand idle while thieves and robbers rivet chains and fetters on the necks and limbs of their children. As soon as they learn what their rights are in regard to land—as soon as they know they hav as good a right to land enough to raise food on as they hav to life itself, they will demand the right of their rulers, and if their demands are not granted they will take the law into their own hands, and woe! woe! to those that are in their path!

I hav said a sure remedy for this greatest of all evils with which our country is cursed is in the hands of the working classes, and will point it out in my next. THE WORKERS' FRIEND, J. HACKER.

Berlin, N. J., Dec. 1, 1883.

The Clergy.

From the Winsted Press.

Now and then a goody-good sort of well-meaning person (generally a woman, for men are usually better informed than women in the ways of the world) expresses surprise that the press has no more reverence for clergymen than for rumsellers, for example. A notion is still quite prevalent among fairly sensible people who hav not yet gotten their eyes open to the impressiv facts, that pulpiteers and that sort of tricksters and sanctimonious vampires are of some little good use to society still; in other words, that they are not absolute nuisances and in a moral way worse than nothing; and so they are generally voted by the ill-informed as at least necessary evils which somehow or other a mysterious providence has projected upon society.

Perhaps it is no wonder that a considerable percentage, say, ten or fifteen per cent, of the present generation in New England regard the preacher with a respect tinged with a shade of reverence; for it is within the memory of our grandfathers that great outward respect was manifested to the minister and priest whenever they appeared in public. People now under seventy years of age tell us, as they laugh over their juvenile superstitions, in their childhood it was the custom for school children and nearly everybody else to take off their hats when meeting the minister and bow or "curtsy" to him as being nothing less than sacred; for the children were taught and did seriously believe (verily, we hav no doubt, absurd as the statement now seems) that the minister had been "set apart from the world by God, for divine offices" and was really quite above his fellow-mortals in moral worth.

But now save among a few simple people, no importance attaches to the "sacred office." The intelligent and well educated of society everywhere either sneer at the ministerial pretenses, or laugh in their sleeves at the self-elected "saints."

But nevertheless it has not, we presume, occured to all the intelligent members of society that the preachers' profession will not bear investigation as to the immoral effect of the calling upon the preachers, since a majority of the most intelligent persons of any given community would, we suppose, be inclined, on first view of the matter, to consider that the preachers' trade would have no serious ill-effect upon the pulpiteers themselvs. But people are not really entitled to hold an opinion upon a pretext which they hav not studied; and the activ business men of a community seldom hav time to study current matters of the day which are a little out of their life line, and may be astonished to be informed that investigation into the "crimes of preachers" for the last ten years disclose through comparison of statistics that the clerical profession furnishes a far greater percentage of criminals than any other.

At first this seems almost impossible, but figures are reliable, and reflection comes to their support, with the suggestion that to a great extent "priestcraft is beggary. Priests are the most insolent mendicants. No beggar is so despicable as he who is clothed in shining vestments, the fruit of his trade" (to borrow the effectiv language of another). The corollaries of the above suggestion will occur to most readers—the temptations to do wrong which such a despicable calling begets are multifold and the minister or a priest easily becomes a criminal.

And this leads us to speak of a remarkable little book, entitled "Crimes of Preachers in the United States and Canada, from May, 1876, to May, 1883," by M. E. Billings, which work ought to be in the hands of everybody, and might easily be, since it costs but 25 cents,

It is an unanswerable work, and contains a fearful array of the divine rascals who in the period of seven years hav been, in this country and Canada, detected in the commission of crimes of every shade of horror. As it is a deduction from statistical facts that only one crime of the clergy in sixteen comes to light, it is claimed with great plausible force that over 28,000 of the 71,000 ministers and priests in the United States belong to the criminal classes.

There seems to be something in the clergyman's profession which either negativly weakens him as a moral man, and so permits him to commit crimes of which he would not be guilty were he a farmer, for example, or prompts him affirmativly to deeds which he would not be bold enough to attempt except under the mask of his "holy religion!" The little book we refer to is a stunning argument against the moral pretenses of the clergy, and ought to hav a place by the side of the Bible in every well-regulated Christian family; and in order that our readers may possess themselvs of it, we will undertake, without remuneration of profit, the ordering from the publishers and mailing of a copy of the same to everybody who will send us 25 cents, the price of the work. Though so cheap, it would make a very valuable and appropriate Christmas present.

In conclusion let us ask, Does Christianism, per se, conduce to good or bad morals?

Letters from Friends.

MURRAY, O., Dec. 16, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: As my time as a trial subscriber has expired, and as my opinion of the paper is too high for me to think of reading it even for a week on credit, I inclose $4—$2.50 to be applied as subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, the balance for the inclosed list of books. I received "Trial of D. M. Bennett" some time ago and hav just finished reading it. I consider it the most partial, unfair, and dishonest trial I ever heard or read. It is a disgrace to the history of this—a free—country. In my estimation, if D. M. Bennett was guilty of violating the law, every publishing house in the country that deposits in the mails the Bible, with all its obscenity, is just as guilty of a like offense, and should be punished accordingly.

I received "The Bible Inquirer," by A. Jacobson. I consider it excellent, and heartily recommend it to all Liberals and those who desire to be free. I try to disseminate Freethought in this country, but the soil is poor. I trust, however, it will yet take root and eventually bear fruit. A great many in this place shun Freethought as if it were poison; but there is a poison by the name of alcohol they approach with parasitical affection.

Hoping that Liberalism will eventually hav predominance, I remain Fraternally yours,

D. E. LEWIS.

WAUSHIP, UTAH, Dec. 1, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: The "Saints" are very energetic here just now, trying to kill what influence my Liberal literature may hav created, and are making some very fanatical youngsters; but I am very proud to say I hav got seven or eight young fellows to subscribe for H. L. Green's Directory, enrolling their names, and they hav very nice certificates stating they are members of the Freethinkers' Association of New York; and I do not think they will ever return to the "evil ways of church people."

I find there is quite a Liberal element in the air, and in fact when I go to church I find them preaching evolution and ridiculing the Bible fish stories. But they are quite certain the big chief Jehovah makes our leaders an occasional visit, and givs instruction as to the manner of conducting the business, and I must say the Mormons are an extra-well organized society, and must hav some very able leaders to pilot them through their congressional troubles, and to extract the tenth part of the people's earnings—both of which they hav been very successful in doing.

I wish the Liberals were a quarter as energetic in propagating the truth, and it surely would not be as hard to make converts to reason as to superstition; but I suppose we inherit Christianity as hogs do a propensity for rooting.

Thanking you for your trouble in regard to the books, I remain Yours truly, WM. REYNOLDS.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL., Dec. 13, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: The object of these few lines is to inform you that Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage gave a lecture here last night (Dec. 12th), entitled "Reply to Ingersollism." I, a truth seeker, attended the lecture, from which I was able to glean a few of what I call his absurd and false statements in regard to Infidelity. A few of his assertions are as follows:

"Ingersoll says the Bible is a pack of lies from beginning to end."

"Voltaire shrieked with horror when his last hour was approaching, and requested the officiating services of a minister."

"The audience that cheer Ingersoll on Infidelity in a congregation are a set of idiots."

Talmage furthermore offers $1,000 reward to anyone who will show and prove to him where the Bible has made even one cruel person. I am a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I advocate its cause. What I want to see is truth and justice. I ask you to make a reply to these few remarks of Talmage. Everyone who heard the lecture will corroborate the above. Hoping that I may read his reply in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I close.

Yours with great respect, F. D. LOWE.

[Mr. Talmage's wild shrieks are hardly worth noticing, but we may say: 1. Ingersoll never said the Bible was a pack of lies; 2. Voltaire's death was peaceful. For a true account of his last days see Parton's "Life of Voltaire;" 3. None but a fool, or one who thought he was talking to a set of fools, would say that Ingersoll's audiences are idiotic; 4. Talmage would not pay the $1,000 if he had proof piled higher than Pelion on Ossa that the Bible has made millions of murderers. Time is wasted in paying attention to the Brooklyn mountebank. He can lie faster than the earth can travel.—ED. T. S.]

BATTLE CREEK, Dec. 17, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: The communication from S. D. Moore in last week's TRUTH SEEKER brings to my mind the early effort of the Presbyterian church to seize and convert the state university then in course of erection at Ann Arbor. This was in August, 1838. M. W. Baldwin, of Philadelphia, Pa., was sick at the National, now the Russell House, where he lay many weeks. I was his only attendant. He was a strong Presbyterian in his religion; and one of the best hearted, charitable men I ever knew. During his long sickness, E. P. Hastings, of Detroit, being a deacon in the Presbyterian church, often came to pray to. or with, or for, Mr. Baldwin. At one of those visits Hastings made a long prayer in which he gave praise to the Lord for the erection of a college that would inculcate religion of the church and so imbue the young and tender mind with the true faith of the Presbyterian church. At another time, he said, "Brother Baldwin, our prospects are bright; we hav a majority of our society in the regency, and we hope to keep control of the university and thus secure it for the worship of our Lord and savior Jesus Christ." Those were his identical words. I hav, scores of times, spoken of that early effort to bind the people of Michigan to a church creed that, in my opinion, would, if they had the power, adopt the blood-thirsty tyranny of that fiend and murderer, John Calvin, who ordered Michael Servetus burnt at the stake over a slow fire, just because Servetus differed in opinion from that infernal demon. Yet, with those damnable acts of cruelty staring them in the face, millions of human beings worship at the shrine of that incarnate fiend and seek to hoodwink the tender mind of the student in our state university, in order to bind our people to a creed which our state constitution forbids. I, for the last forty-five years, hav watched the wily serpent as he crawls, seeking whom he may charm and beguile with his infamous hypocrisy, and calling on God to aid him in his efforts to save souls through the church. A more perfect violation of a will was never made than that of Girard's. It proves that Christianity will resort to any infamous act to support their church and gain power over the people. H. WILLIS.

RUSSELL, KAN., Dec. 17, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Knowing that your paper favors the producing classes, I send you a few lines in regard to the work we are engaged in. We hav been nine months in this state, for the two months previous to that in Illinois and Missouri, and before that in Chicago, in all of which we worked organizing the Knights of Labor. We hav done this in sixty-five cities and towns.

The Knights of Labor is an organization that embraces within its folds every department of productiv industry, making knowledge a standpoint for action. All thinkers can see that something must be done, or the wealth of the country will soon be in the hands of the few. Land and machinery will soon be in their hands, and the more machinery the greater the curse to the producing class under the present competitiv system, as it throws labor out of employment; while under the system that the Knights of Labor are working for (co-operation), the more this system has been introduced the greater has been the blessing. The hours of labor are to be lessened each day, so that more will hav employment.

There are millions of acres of land that should come back to the people that the railroads unjustly hold. Such land, and other land that is controled by the government, should be used for co-operativ colonies. The poor people could be put on such land, the government putting the best of superintendents over them, and lending them money to start with, which could be paid back to the government without interest. Railroads, telegraph lines, and other great industries like those of the mines, foundries, and factories should be controled in the same way. Then those that worked would get the results of their labor. For one day's labor at a certain thing would get the results of some one else's labor. Thus no one would accumulate at the expense of others. By co-operation we can obtain such results. All great works are carried on by co-operation. Large farming is thus carried on, yet those that do the work in such a way merely eke out a scanty existence. The society of the Knights of Labor teaches that we should start and work in such a way for our own benefit. If any in this state or Missouri would like to hav me giv my lecture, "Cure for Labor Strikes," and hav an assembly organized, please drop me a line to Halsted, Harvey co., Mo., from whence it will be forwarded to me. Yours for Liberalism in all ways. J. H. WHITE,

TWIN MOUND, KAN., Dec. 8, 283.

MR. EDITOR: With your permission I would like to offer a few words in reply to A. W. Shuck, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 1st. He says: "We will proclaim it from the housetops, that if the Walkerites, 'or any other man,' are bound to render aid and comfort to the more than infernal liquor oligarchy, they must step down below Liberalism to find a name behind which to hide, and let every Liberal in the land who is sufficiently pure-hearted to believe that man has no moral right to do wrong, join us." Which means that the Walkerites nor anyone else has any moral right to think and act different from A. W. Shuck, for has he not already decided? He may perhaps be as competent to determin what are the moral rights of E. C. Walker, myself, and thousands of others, as anyone else, but until he or some one else defines precisely what our moral rights are, and what is required to make us "sufficiently pure-hearted," he will perhaps excuse us for choosing each for ourselvs what our moral actions shall be.

"They must step down below Liberalism to find a name behind which to hide." Now, I leave it to A. W. Shuck, who is the most entitled to the name Liberal—E. C. Walker, who believes that every man and woman of intelligence has a natural, as well as moral, right to think and speak their own thoughts, however much they may differ from him, or A. W. Shuck, who charges the Walkerites with being "miserable, selfish fanatics," and who is seeking the aid of legislation in order to force others to accept his standard of moral rights, demanding that Mr. Walker shall step down and hide himself behind the lower shelf of Liberalism, while he claims the right to perch upon the top shelf and thank the Lord for a much larger share of holiness than the Walkerites? Say, friend Shuck, which is the most Liberal? My good friend A. W. Shuck's over-zealous article seems to contain a degree of the same spirit that burnt the heretics a few hundred years ago.

Now, if the policy of the prohibitionists contains all the truth, unmixed with error, then all the arguments of the Walkerites need giv no offense. I do hope that in the future when Liberals hav arguments to offer on this very important question they will present them in such a kind and friendly spirit as will unmistakably prove their right to the name of Liberal.

Yours for the moral right to think and act different from A. W. Shuck or anybody else.

HENRY HIATT.

NEW ALEXANDRIA, O., Dec. 3, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Failing to mail my letter till the present, I in the mean time resolved to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I am to-day entering upon life with my own bark, being 21 years of age.

My intention is to remain a subscriber till the disputed grounds are fully placed aright in my own mind. Nor shall I through life discontinue my subscription so long as it remains as good, to my fancy, as it now is, and my circumstances continue to warrant it. Strange to me is the fact that persons, after having time and again been driven from their most trusted strongholds of belief, will not awaken to a spirit of investigation, but will instead fall back into the same old fortification, knowing that he knows not how to defend such an awkwardly-built fort, but trusts to his genius to escape attack. On finding the defense of a station impossible, I'm one of the first to "git out of that."

And again: They cannot possibly be ignorant of the fact that they are defeated, for they invariably show marks of irritation, though every mark of respect be shown to them and their arguments, and the highest air of sincerity worn that can be commanded. And all know that the triumphant are not the wrathy, for they hav no cause to be.

In a paper of this week I saw a letter from a missionary to India. It was from an old fellow-student whom I very highly respected, and of course it excited a feeling of interest, and I read it. Firstly came in glowing strains a description of his reception; next, of the city of Calcutta, the inhabitants, their customs, and then, in wailing, plaintiv words, he describes his sorrow to find that in their belief there is no clause prohibiting social intercourse with others of different religions, and calls it a "most odious institution, quenching the spirit and virtue of patriotism."

Poor fellow! He's forgotten his Bible has prohibited "casting pearls before swine," as they call those at home, in the Christian Advocate, which he no doubt failed to receive, and which number should be forwarded at once.

At a glance they can see the pitiable state into which the followers of the Koran and others hav fallen, but, in spite of all arguments, cannot see even a possibility of a similar fate of their own.

My friends "pity" me and feel "sorry" for me, as they hav expressed it. By returning this I close. I not only send you my heartiest wishes, but if I can do you a favor I shall, and with pleasure.

Very truly yours, M. H. RALSTON,

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5—$2.50 for renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $2.50 for a new subscriber to your excellent paper. I hav entered my 82d year; hav never believed in the Christian theology; hav outlived nearly all the friends of my youth; spend the greater part of my time in solitude, and hav but small means on which to subsist. I can not work very much, and am almost alone in the world. But I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think it is the best paper that is published. Good as it has always been, it is now better than ever. This is the honest opinion of

Yours in true respect, ANN CLARK.

LACROSSE, WIS., Dec. 20, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: With your permission, I would like to ask the people, one and all, who believe in gods, unnatural causes, ghosts, spirits, specters, universal powers—in fact, I want to hear what they know about metaphysics. For to my view all that speak and write upon these ideas that think they exist do not know what they are talking about. But if there are any who think they know something, I am one that would be glad to learn. I do not want to know what they believe or assert, but what they can prove. For, to me, all who talk and write upon this subject present the veriest twaddle that ever benumbed the human intellect. They remind me of two puppies—when they get together each one admits what neither can prove or understand. But, nevertheless, I would like to hear through THE TRUTH SEEKER what anyone can prove upon this subject. If this aged rock don't get positiv proof soon it will be too late, for he is very near 70 years old and don't expect to liv long. Mr. Editor, I am your well-wisher. J. PETTY.

FRESNO, CAL., Dec. 10, 283.

MR EDITOR: May I ask A. W. Shuck a few questions on prohibition? If A imports liquor and pays the government import tax, has A a right to sell to B? If so, can the sale of liquor be prevented? If not, then prohibition is a national evil, by allowing the export of gold for liquor. If there is one drunkard to one hundred people—let us say ten persons to one hundred—is it right to punish all because ten drink to excess? If ten doctors use malpractice, is it right to prevent all doctors from practice to cure diseases and save life? If ten per cent of medicin is dangerous to health and life, ought there to be a law to prohibit all medicin? If ten persons eat too much cooked flesh, fish, or fowl, ought all be forced to eat flesh, fish, or fowl raw? If ten women dress to endanger their health and life, must all woman dress be prohibited, and they forced to wear goat and sheep skins, and wrap a blanket around them?

Will you prove beyond a doubt that prohibition will not deprive anyone of their natural rights? If you cannot prove the above, forever hold your peace.

I am not a drunkard, as I hav not drank any alcoholic liquor for more than fifty years. I pity the poor deluded drunkard. He drowns his reason, disgraces his character, and will fill a drunkard's grave.

GEORGE PADDINGTON.

LEROY, ILL., Dec. 17, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I received the four volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and read them. I say D. M. Bennett is one of the best men of this age of this world, and he was trained in his young days in the Christian order. I was kept in the same way. If I picked berries Sunday they would whip me Monday morning. I hav got to be a Freethinker. I am most eighty years old. In 1857 my mind wandered, and a power took possession of me. I wanted to know how this world was made. It came to my mind it had been thrown off from the fountain-head, and took its place and rolled for millions of years. I wanted to see God; all I could see were men and women. There are now gods, devils, and hell—as mankind makes them. The Bible is a record of mankind, of good and evil works. I don't think it is best for us to quarrel over their quarrels. Priestcraft is the ruin of mankind.

THE TRUTH SEEKER givs me a chance to hear a great many different minds. I never read but one man that spoke my mind. He said magnetism and electricity were the soul and life of everything in the universe. I giv my papers away when I hav read them, and try to stir up orthodoxy a little. I tell them I don't fear all the devils in hell if they will keep their hands off me. D. NETTLETON.

Sustain The Truth Seeker.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER Sir: I am glad the subscription price of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to be restored to its former paying basis. It is cheap enough at that. It appears that the reduced subscription rates of the present year hav fallen short of meeting current expenses by about the amount of reduction.

I hardly think it just under the circumstances to take advantage of your generous offer, to all who pay in advance, to continue it another year, at the same ruinous rate, and thereby allow the paper to suffer in usefulness for the sake of getting it at figures less than cost. I feel indebted to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, at least, to the abount of reduction; hence I send $3.00 for 284, and 50 cents to make up a like amount for the present year.

Liberals cannot afford to allow that fearless champion of Freethought to languish for want of pecuniary support. Three dollars per annum is extremely cheap for such a journal, filled to overflowing as it is with practical common sense thought.

The Liberal Club.

Mr. Louis F. Post, formerly an editorial writer on the New York Truth, lectured before the Manhattan Liberal Club at its meeting on Friday evening the 28th. His subject was "Political Forces Afloat." Before introducing Mr. Post the chairman took occasion to invite those who are in the habit of attending the club to join it. Their pecuniary, moral, and elocutionary support was desirable.

The political forces which Mr. Post defined as floating were the Knights of Labor, Woman-suffragists, negroes, Communists, and Socialists. The Knights of Labor did not promis to become a great political power. The Woman-suffragists, who once sought the ballot for the sake of the ballot, now demanded it in the name of human equality. The negroes had been taken from a slavery peculiar to their race, and bound in another, common to all races. The words Socialism and Communism had lost their power to frighten. Between these various forces there is little prospect of any effectiv union. A new order of things is liable to come through some kind of revolution. The working classes are not now prepared to fight for their rights; if they had enthusiasm enough to do that, they would vote for them, and that would settle the matter. Yet the people are ready for a change; the magazine is loaded, and needs but a spark to fire it. Mr. Post's lecture was about thirty minutes long, but in that time he took the gloss off many of the popular political superstitions.

The critics were rather slow about getting after Mr. Post. This was because the most of them coincided with the views he had expressed. It is believed that this sort of lecture carries less satisfaction into the Liberal Club with it than one that is not so good, for the reason that the discussion which is bound to follow lacks the verve which characterizes it when there is more to differ about.

Mr. Cohen entered into an argument designed to annihilate the sophism that overproduction is an evil. He did not believe that, because there was plenty, therefore people should be starving. As to Communism, Christ himself taught that doctrin. Mr. Cohen admitted, however, that the teachings of the Nazarene were capable of a more "rational construction" than he had given them. There was some doubt here about the drift of Mr. Cohen's remarks, which was increased when he added that, "as the scriptures say, it depends on which side of the shield you look." It is painfully apparent that Mr. Cohen needs to brush up a little in matters of scripture.

Following Mr. Cohen came the Socrates of the club, Mr. Andrews. The spirit of the lecture, he said, was high and broad; yet, if he had any criticism to make, he should say it was not high enough nor broad enough. It related merely to the people of this country. It was altogether local. Politics, however, was planetary. All peoples, whether in America or Russia, or in the heart of China, were involved when political forces were considered. Mr. Andrews usually has some novel idea for people to take home with them and discuss. This time it was, that the center of the intellectual world is in the United States. A belt of country bounded on the south by a line drawn from Washington city westward to St. Louis, and on the north by Canada, contained the great body of reformers. The focus was New York, and in New York it probably narrowed down to the Liberal Club. Cut off the heads of about thirty people in this intellectual belt, and progress would practically be decapitated. This happy conceit of the Great Universal Preacher was very gratifying to the members of the club.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer was called upon unanimously for a speech. Mr. Palmer said that if the audience desired some stupid remarks from a man who felt particularly stupid, he would try and accommodate them. He then went ahead and made a good speech. Government, he held, was practically bottom side up. It had always come down from the gods instead of coming up from the people. This should be reversed. Our allegiance to humanity came before our allegiance to God, and our hope centered in the future of the race. Co-operation also must take the place of the selfishness of competition.

A short period of silence succeeded Mr. Palmer's remarks, which was relieved by Mr. Putnam, who said there appeared to be a vacuum, and as the Liberal club, like nature, abhorred a vacuum, he would try and fill it. He spoke of the solidarity of man, and of the planetary nature of politics. No man was a true reformer whose heart did not beat in sympathy with the downtrodden people of Ireland. In reference to liberty, he argued that a people were not fit for liberty until they were free. Liberty was the first requisit. It should be made the means, and not the end.

Mr. Wakeman, following, said that it had been suggested that the lecture was not broad enough nor high enough. He would say that it was not long enough. As for himself, he was given to long speeches, and so he had to compliment the speaker for his brevity. Mr. Post had omitted to mention one political force, and that was the Liberal League. That should not hav been left out. In considering the solidarity of the race, Mr. Wakeman continued, we should not forget the continuity of man which makes us the heirs of the past. Evolution is rolling on; we must go with it, whether we are willing or not. The race may be compared to an iceberg in the current of time; it must go with the stream or be melted away.

Mr. Post spoke briefly in conclusion, mainly touching the question of selfishness. The feeling of selfishness, he contended, was the result of environments, and would not survive the conditions which produced it. Let them be changed, and selfishness would vanish, because there would be no necessity for it to exist. As things are now, a man must be selfish. He had known an unselfish man who was once worth fifty thousand dollars. He was now a tramp, the result of his unselfishness. Let people do away with the cause of selfishness, and there was an end of it.

The next lecture at the club is to be by Mr. Andrews, on "Anarchy, Individualism, and Pantarchy." It is expected that the speakers for the last month will receive a general reviewing.

Book Notes.

SUNSHINE. Hanway and Home. By Mrs. Louisa T. Craigin. D. Lothrop & Co., publishers, Boston. Price, $1.25.

A milk-and-water novel, rather pretty in parts but full of sentiment of the usual sort found in the mixture of sewing-circle gossip and Sunday-school nonsense used by writers who depend on the publishers, instead of its merit, to sell their book. It belongs to Lothrop & Co.'s "Sweet Home Series," and by the class of people for whom it was written will be called "delightful." This is the notice the publishers send with it:

"From the time of the old English song of 'Dulce Domum' to that of the song of our own Payne, 'Sweet Home' has had no lack of homage in prose and verse. Nor can it hav too much, if all is of the quality afforded in the rare series of choice stories published under the title of the 'Sweet Home Series,' by D. Lothrop & Co. 'Sunshine,' the latest of these, is a most delightful home story for family reading. It is dedicated 'To the dear mother whose gentle spirit was ever the sunshine of our old home at the Cedars,' and is full of inspiring sentiment of the best sort. It is by one of the many charming writers introduced to the public by D. Lothrop & Co., Mrs. Louise T. Craigin, the Ellis Gray of 'Long Ago' and 'The Cedars,' and is perhaps her best effort."

NATURE'S HARMONY. By Francis D. Lacy. 16mo. cloth, pp. 165. New York: THE TRUTH SEEKER Publishing House, 21 Clinton Place.

The author has been led to write and publish this book from a desire on his part to supply substantial facts to occupy the ground hitherto held by dogmatic speculation. He realizes that the higher man ascends in the scale of wisdom the more readily he sees that the depths of the ocean of knowledge are unfathomable. For many years Mr. Lacy disbelieved in a supreme intelligence and in a future state, but having had his attention drawn to Psychometry, and other mental phenomena associated with Spiritualism, he gave them an honest investigation, and became convinced of their reality, and that those things which he had considered to be myths and falsities were great and mighty truths. Immediately the world, and all in and beyond it, changed from an illusion to a fixed reality; and, urged by some power greater than his own, he felt compelled to place his new views before the public, and has done so in this volume, which may be read with pleasure and profit by all.—Banner of Light.

A COPY of the third edition of "Crimes of Preachers," by M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa, is on our table. Without exception it is the greatest and hardest blow Christianity ever got. Mr. Billings has accumulated these facts from seven papers published in the states of New York, Ohio, Massachusetts, Indiana, Iowa, Illinois, and Missouri, only; and it is generally conceded that but about one-half the crimes committed by these rascals hav been collected. Mr. Billings is doing a great work, and should be encouraged in it. The Thinker published a list of crimes of preachers gathered by Mr. Billings which occupied forty columns and took five months to complete the list, and now the list is increased several hundred and still they come. It can be easily seen where the most crime is committed. Can any one read this lengthy list of crimes committed by preachers in a few of the states here in America, without arriving at the conclusion that this is where the bulk of crime is perpetrated? Can a similar list be found among Infidels? No, indeed. Can any one read this little pamphlet, and say at the conclusion, that we are not "priestridden?" Send to THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York city, for it.—Thinker.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

A Tale of Two Buckets.

Two buckets in an ancient well got talking once together,
And after sundry wise remarks—no doubt about the weather—
"Look here," quoth one, "this life we lead I don't exactly like;
Upon my word I'm half inclined to venture on a strike;
For—do you mind?—however full we both come up the well,
We go down empty—always shall, for aught that I can tell."
"That's true," the other said; "but then, the way it looks to me, However empty we go down, we come up full, you see."
Wise little bucket! If we each would look at life that way,
Would dwarf its ills and magnify its blessings day by day,
The world would be a happier place, since we should all decide,
Only the buckets full to count, and let the empty slide.

Mr. Trilobite's Story.

"Job, my boy, I wish you could hav a little common sense, and not be forever hammering and pounding the rocks and stones." Job's father looked perplexed, as he watched his son split stones with his heavy steel hammer.

"Why, father, maybe I've some uncommon sense. You'll think so when I find a gold mine!" laughed Job.

"So I shall; but you'll find it sooner on these shores by digging in a clam bed than by tugging away at those rocks. You'd better learn to build stone walls—it would be more profitable."

Job was not far from the Portsmouth coal mines, and he had become highly interested in the working of the mine, and in looking into the interior of the huge lumps of coal and slate that were thrown out by the workmen. His father walked away, and Job renewed his pounding and splitting of the rocks and stones. "I wonder if there's anything in this big junk of slate." He hit it three or four big whacks with his hammer, and it began to sliver and fall in flakes at Job's feet. All at once Job was startled by a smothered groan, as it seemed to him, followed by—

"Hold up there, young man! Hi yi! Oh Lord's sake alive, boy, you hurt a fellow, you do! Never mind, then, go ahead, and let me out!"

Job's eyes began to grow big, until they were like two little saucers, and they bulged out still more as he caught sight of something in the slate that looked like a form, and he struck the piece again!

"Je-ru-sa-lem, boy!—but you hav muscle, though! Whew! You hit my foot, and now I shall hav a sore toe. Oh, how nice the air is! G-r-acious! You'll break every segment in my body, if you thump me that way! Careful, now, and I'll soon be free. There! Yi, yi, yi! Good morning, boy! How do you do? And what's your name?"

"My name is Job Aiken, and I do very well, I thank you," said Job, trembling with fear and astonishment at the queer little figure that his hammer had evolved from the slate rock. It wasn't a lobster, but it looked some like one; nor was it a turtle, nor a king crab—or horseshoe, as the king crab is called.

"Scared of me, aren't you, Job?" inquired the curious creature.

"N-n-no!" stammered Job, surprised that it should address him so familiarly.

"You'd like to know who I am, wouldn't you?"

"Yes, sir, if you please," replied Job.

"Well, sir, my name is Trilobite, and I've been locked up here in an underground prison for several hundred thousand years, and I tell you I'm just a little glad to get out and get some air. I'm much obliged to you for breaking in my dungeon door. I feel like dancing a jig, I do, only I'm so cramped and stiff I can't move.

"Lity, di di,
Ti riddy i ti!

Can you sing, Job?"

"Some."

"Well, start up something lively to celebrate my freedom."

Job commenced,

"Lumps of pudding, and pieces of pie,
My mother gave me if I wouldn't cry."

"That'll do," said the newly released prisoner. "I don't like your voice very well. I'd rather hear a corn-stalk fiddle. Maybe you'd like me to tell my story, Job."

"Oh, that I would," said Job. "Do, Mr. Trilobite, please do."

"Ever so long ago—maybe a million years, for it is so long I can't remember—I had a little home down here in some shallow water; for where you now stand, Job, was once all water. There were none of your kind of animals on the face of the earth then, for the land was not at all fitted at that time for inhabitants of any kind; and what living beings there were had homes in the water. There were some oysters, however, and snails, and such as had their skeletons outside of them, you know."

"Outside?" said Job, with mouth wide open.

"Yes, their bones were outside of them, and the flesh inside—shells outside—can't you understand, Job?"

"Yes, Mr. Trilobite. But I don't see why other things couldn't liv as well as they do now."

"Why, Job, the earth wasn't fitted for them then," said Mr. Trilobite in a squeakiug voice. "You must know that once this world was a ball of fire, racing round and round in the air like all possessed, and there was heat, and steam, and metallic vapors; and, after whirling about a million years or so like a big whirligig—maybe longer—naturally the earth began to cool, you know, and then a little thin film, not near so thick as pie-crust, began to form over the ball of fire; but the gases kept jumping up as the old earth flew around, and would split open the crust, and wild fire would run down the sides like molasses. Of course there was steam going up, and coming down in the form of rain, and for thousands and thousands of years there was a high old time, Job, with the fire hissing and cracking, the steam puffing and blowing, and the rain falling in torrents, fighting with the fire, and trying to put it out, which it did at last. And then there was 'water, water everywhere,' which gradually settled away, Job, and some spots of dry land appeared. I s'pose you think the earth is now so cooled that it is solid 'way through. You're mistaken, Job. If you should dig down about fifty miles from here, you'd come to a pretty hot fire, sure as you liv."—How do I know? Why, I've been there, Job—not in my present state, but as a particle. We've all been there, as parts and particles, a few million years ago, you know. Ha ha! it's quite a joke, Job; it is, sure," and Mr. Trilobite laughed long and heartily.

"But you can see, he said, "that the state of the earth which I hav very imperfectly sketched was not a condition to maintain any organic life, can't you, Job?"

"Yes, Mr. Trilobite," answered Job, greatly interested.

"The greatest book that was ever written is the book of Earth," continued Mr. Trilobite; "and as you read page after page you become more delighted and interested. Unlike other books, you hav to commence at the last finished page, and read backwards till you come to the first paragraph; then read forwards, and you find it is as easy to read as A, B, C. But to continue my story," said the curious being. "All at once I found myself alive and stirring. I had a good hard coat on, and flexible, as you can see, so I could roll up in a ball if I wanted to. And you ought to hav seen my eyes—you can see how they stick out now, and each eye has a great many lenses, so we could see—our tribe could—all ways at once. Some of us had as many as six thousand lenses, or facets.

"What a funny idea!" said Job. "I never heard such a thing."

"Oh, yes, you hav. Didn't you ever observe the eye of the flies that buzz around the house? Well, every fly has fourteen thousand of just such lenses, and butterflies hav thirty-five thousand of them, and the dragonfly nearly double that number, all just as perfect and beautiful as can be. Talk about yourself being 'fearfully and wonderfully made!' Why, just look at your common house-fly—yes, and look at me!"

"I do not see how you could liv under water," said Job.

"Oh, ho, well enough, well enough, Job! I had swimming toes, or fins, once; but, being so long in prison, I hav lost them, all but a fragment of one, which you hit with your hammer."

"What did you liv on?" inquired Job.

"Oh, there were plenty of little mites of water insects. We ate them, and as we had a good many children, we used to eat them sometimes, when we couldn't find anything else."

"And were there no trees or anything in that time?"

"Why, no, Job; only a few sea-weed plants in the water."

"But how did you get into your shape?" asked Job.

"I grew into it, Job, by force of what was in me. How does a drop of dew grow round? By inherent power, Job. So, little by little, I grew to be a trilobite."

"Why are you called trilobite?" queried Job.

"Because I am in three parts—see: head, throat, and my lower body; I could double up, you know. My folks tried to be somebody else, but they couldn't; they are all trilobites. Job, don't ever try to be what you cannot carry out—it is foolish. Be yourself, always, and don't try to be anybody else. After a while the earth kept growing and growing, until things were so changed that we found we could not adapt ourselvs to new circumstances, and we just 'died out,' as the saying is."

"Are none of your folks now living?" Job asked.

"No, not one," sighed Mr. Trilobite. "All dead and gone—buried in the rocks of the earth; but we put them in tombs, so that such fellows as you might unlock the doors, and every time you let one of us out we will tell you a story, in our own dumb way—understand, Job?"

"Yes, sir; I read once that, 'the crust of our earth is a great cemetery, where the rocks are tombstones on which the buried dead hav written their own epitaphs.'"

"Who said that?"

"A man named Agassiz. He is dead now."

"Oh, yes; he knew lots of our tribe. He used to find us all cuddled up in our stone mansions, and many a talk we've had with him—that is, our family has. If you keep on, you will some time be as great a scholar as he was."

"I must go now," said Job; "and I will take you along with me, and show you to my father and mother."

"All right," said Mr. Trilobite.

Job's parents were delighted at the prize Job had found, and at the wonderful story it told. They said it was all true, and Job's father added much more information about the book of Earth. He said that, after all, knowledge is the true gold, and promised not to find fault with Job again for searching for it, and declared he would aid him all he could in his endeavors.

People came a great way to see Mr. Trilobite, and to hear his history, and the history with which he was connected. He said he was a happy trilobite, since he could inspire, in his dumb, still way, people to seek after truth and light; and Job takes solid comfort, and is never lonely or mischievous, since he

Little Nannie Green.

John Green, a son of the Emerald Isle, lived near the Allegheny river in Venango county, Pennsylvania, in 1798. Not satisfied with his location he made a "claim" and built himself a cabin in the woods, four miles distant from any habitation.

Now in order to prevent the claim from being "jumped," or lost to him, it was necessary to occupy the cabin daily for a stated period; but as John had business at the county seat, he took his little daughter Nannie, aged ten, and her brother Tommy, aged seven years, to the cabin, gave them possession and started to the town of Franklin, fourteen miles distant, intending to return before night. But "the best laid schemes o' mice and men gang aft agley."

At the town John met some good fellows, who, like himself, had "a very strong weakness" for grog. So, as the poet Burns says, "The night drave on wi' sangs and clatter," and all else was forgotten for the time being. Meanwhile, how fared it with little Nannie and her baby brother? All day long they amused themselvs as best they could, and as the sun began to sink behind the western hills she cast many an anxious glance down the blazed path, hoping to see her father approaching; and as the shadows deepened into twilight in the solemn woods, and her plaintiv voice was lost in their cavernous depths, she could not restrain her tears; while she strove to quiet her little brother's fears and repeated, "Why don't he come? Why don't he come?"

Night, with all its attendant horrors, closed in upon her, and still he came not.

But if her father and natural protector did not come, something else did—the wolves—attracted by the offal of a deer dressed at the cabin the previous day.

The situation was now a trying one, sufficient to make an older person than little Nannie quail. The wolves howling at the door—which there was no means of closing—no one to protect her, little Tommy to care for, and no means of escape. But under that homespun pinafore beat a brave heart, and Nannie was equal to the occasion.

Directing Tommy to put his arms around her neck, "hold tight and keep quiet," she climbed to the rude joists above, and sitting astride of one held her little brother between her and the wall, while he slept until near morning.

As the first faint rays of light streaked the east the howling demons left the cabin and retreated to their dismal dens in the forest; then brave little Nannie, almost fainting from exhaustion, came down, deposited her precious burden on the ground, and fell asleep.

When she awoke the sun had climbed high above the tree-tops and chased the gloomy night away. It was still three hours before her eyes were gladdenad by the sight of "the man approaching from the town."

Mrs. Nancy Bell is the oldest inhabitant of Meigs township, Muskingum county, Ohio.

She is the mother of twelve children, has sixty-three grandchildren, eighty great-grandchildren, and fourteen great-great-grandchildren.

She resides with Dr. Charles Hurd, her son-in-law, in Lytlesburg, and at the ripe old age of ninety-five, her eye will kindle, and her voice grow animated and strong, as she recalls with vividness the scenes of eighty-five years ago.

One scene is indelibly stamped upon the tablets of her memory. It is a little girl perched upon a pole, holding a sleeping child, and watching through the darkness the glaring eyeballs of the howling wolves that, just beneath her, gnashed their teeth and thirsted for her blood.

To-day her hundred and sixty-five descendants can ponder on "what might hav been," had "little Nannie Green" been less brave.

Charade.

There's a mournful sound in the summer air—
'Tis my First; hear its message of dull despair.
My Second's a portal, an entrance, a bar
'Twixt green, waving fields and cattle from far.
It is wood, it is bronze, or one solid pearl;
It differs as much as a clown from an earl.
Should anyone seek the most perfect seclusion,
Freedom from every tormenting intrusion,
To draft out an epic, or plan a campaign,
When quiet is needed for body and brain,
My Whole he must never venture to keep,
Or days oft disturbed, and oft-murdered sleep
Will be his; but with short conversation
On men and the weather, the crops and the nation,
'Twill not interfere; and then he can view
Grandeur roll by on the wide avenue.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to the mare plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) peronally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Poetry.

The Church Fair.

BY J. M. THAYER.

The devil sat in his red-hot chair
Watching the saints at a churchly fair;
For he knew that his interests, then and there,
Were being served with especial care;
And a chief conspirator always needs
To keep an eye on the net proceeds.

Ancient dames, of saintly mien,
Girls in pink and girls in green,
And matrons fair with smiles serene,
With maids whose ages were between
The limits of connubial hope,
Displayed their charms with ample scope;

The "nice young man," whose pious face
And mincing, ministerial pace
Proclaimed his proneness to embrace
Each cheap and proper "means of grace," (Unmindful, doubtless, of the graces
That smiled in beauteous forms and faces).

His doting sire, of high renown
In church and Sunday-school and town,
With scanty locks all plastered down,
To hide the baldness of his crown
And clothe with garb of thin propriety
That emblem of his "early piety;"

Staid deacons, with the solemn air
That well-bred deacons always wear,
Pastor and people, all were there
With holy zeal and zealous care—
Church veterans and new beginners—
To spare the saints and fleece the sinners.

Grab-bags and guess-cakes, games of chance—
Whatever promised to advance
The cause of C—ash and church finance,
(Except, of course, the "wicked dance,")
Were sanctified by consecration
To holy uses and—"salvation;"

"Hot coffee," which was neither hot
Nor coffee, but a doubtful pot
Of vile decoction, cheaply got,
With milk which, whether milked or not,
Revealed "miraculous conversion,"
With strong suggestions of "immersion;"

"Ice cream," in which some shrewd device
Of inspiration, over-nice,
Had utilized the cream of ice,
With rank extortion in the price
For samples of the cheap invention,
Which symbolized congealed pretension;

And "oyster stews"—a mongrel mess
Of concentrated "cussedness"—
With rancid butter and excess
Of condiments, which, ne'ertheless,
Betrayed the absence of the fish
Whose name was libeled by the dish;

"Sweetmeats," and other kinds of meat
Not quite particularly sweet,
And eggs boiled hard and hard to beat,
With those who relish the rare treat
Embodied in the unctious "sell"
Of still-born chickens in the shell.

What carnal soul could not with ease
His pampered appetite appease
By murder—passing all degrees—
On super-animated cheese?—
Whose wriggling substance made it plain
That cheese is sometimes "born again."

Kisses for dimes were freely sold,
So sweet that sinners well might hold
Them cheap at larger coins in gold—
Giv'n on the sly, outside the fold;
"Ah," quoth the devil, "That is good!
Such rare devotions warm the blood!

"And, on the average, you may take
Ten girls who cheaply kiss a rake
Ostensibly 'for Christ's dear sake,'
With all that it implies at stake—
And I will stake my throne that nine
Will do as much, or more, for mine."

But time and space would fail to write
The petty frauds, the "lies in white"
By pious maidens told that night
In forcing sales, or, to recite
The items in the ample bill
Of trash and consecrated swill.

At length the pious farce was played—
The proceeds on the altar laid
And careful inventory made;
The parson most devoutly prayed
That many more such fairs might come
To speed them on life's journey HOME.

The devil shook his shaggy sides
As one who wantonly derides,
Or, sees some salient point besides
The one intended, or, divides
The meaning of some obvious pun,
In dev'lish malice, or in fun.

"Yes, hasten 'HOME!'" he hissed and gleamed
Expectantly on those who seemed
The very cream of the redeemed,
And who, perhaps, had never dreamed
They did his work, and trembled when
He seized the cash with loud "AMEN!"

And, as he vanished through the floor,
A wrathful deacon ("boiling o'er")
Just seized his tail and tugged and swore
He'd hav that much, if nothing more;
And held, as chief result of sale,
About two yards of devil's tail.

It was proposed and settled there
To hold at once another fair,
With extraordinary care
To shun all fraud and every snare
And all appearances of evil—
With sole intent to "beat the devil."

LARGEST, CHEAPEST, BEST.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, AT $3.00 PER YEAR; $1.50 FOR SIX MONTHS.

33 CLINTON PLACE, NEW YORK CITY.

Among the reforms THE TRUTH SEEKER aims to effect are:

Total separation of church and state, including the equitable taxation of church property; secularization of the public schools, abolition of Sunday laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

Its sixteen large pages are filled every week with scientific, philosophic, and Freethought articles and communications by the ablest Freethinkers in the country. It gives all the Liberal news, and keeps its readers posted on current secular and theological events. It is the armory from which hundreds draw their weapons in contests with priesthood. All the Liberal papers are good, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is

THE BEST AND LARGEST.

It is conducted in a broad and truly liberal spirit, and gives everyone a hearing upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the human race.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER
Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the anthor in Vol. I. and each volnme illustrated with forty-seven cnts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, anthor of "A Truth Seeker in Enrope," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circnmstances nder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great anthor were for the fonrth volnme which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethonght in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire nd Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

Heavy, toned paper, good margins; large type, widely spaced; extra cloth, black and gold side and back stamps; 12mo., 319 pp.; $1.50.

A VERY APPROPRIATE GIFT BOOK.

It tells you what physicians should tell their patients, but do not: How to avoid contracting "doctors' bills;" how to hav good health without taking medicins. Hints on every subject pertaining to the health of women and children.

PURPOSE OF THE WORK.

The author's design is to giv a general outline of the laws and conditions of health, with directions for the prevention of sickness and care of the sick. She considers Animal Electricity, used as directed in this book, a very important curativ agent.

Although written primarily for women, this book will be found almost equally useful to all. Most persons cannot be too frequently reminded of the truth of the old proverb, "An ounce of prevention is worth more than a pound of cure." The first step in the cure of disease is to remove the cause; then, in nearly all cases, Nature will remove the difficulty without other aid.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

Gems of Thought.

THE one form of sentiment inadmissible to the scientific mind is that which clings to a belief as true because we desire or enjoy it, or feel traditionally bound to believe it; and this sentimental-ism is no element of religious freedom, any more than of scientific mind. And, on the other part, will you call any worship "free" which does not recognize law as supreme, universal, divine? If religion can properly introduce miracles, then there be no science. The very possibility of science lies in the postulate that law is universal, a harmony that can not anywhere admit the slightest break. Freedom, then, can no more permit religion to be separated from science as sentiment, than from philosophy as faith.—Rev. Dr. Sam. Johnson.

"WHEN a soldier," said I, "and it please your reverence, has been standing for twelve hours together in the trenches, up to his knees in cold water, or engaged," said I, "for months together, in long and dangerous marches, harassed, perhaps, in his rear to-day; harassing others to-morrow; detached here, countermanded there; resting this night upon his arms, beat up in his shirt the next; benumbed in his joints, perhaps without straw in his tent to kneel on; he must say his prayers, how and where he can, I believe," said I, "for I was piqued," quoth the corporal, "for the reputation of the army, I believe, an' it please your reverence," said I, "that when a soldier gets him to pray, he prays as heartily as a parson, though not with all his fuss and hypocrisy." "Thou shouldst not hav said that, Trim," said my uncle Toby, "for God only knows who is a hypocrit and who is not."—Sterne's Tristram Shandy.

THE Stoics assert that all offenses are equal; but Antiochus energetically resists this doctrin. At least let me consider before I decide which opinion I will embrace. Cut the matter short, says he, do at least decide on something. What? The reasons which are given appear to me to be both shrewd and nearly equal; may I not, then, be on my guard against committing a crime? for you called it a crime, Lucullus, to violate a principle; I therefore restrain myself, lest I should assent to what I do not understand; and this principle I hav in common with you.—Cicero's Academic Questions.

THE canon was apt, on a good many points, though by no means a combativ and disputatious man, to differ considerably from the opinions that passed current in the world around him. Christianity, he held, would never be a supreme power in the world until man's duty was taught as distinctly and urgently as its founder himself had taught it. Not ove to the invisible God alone, but love to the visible neighbor, too, must be the rule of life; and every nest of foul, dilapidated houses, in which the helpless poor were lodged, every pauper orphan, shut out from the charities of a home, every sixpence aken for drink served out to a drunken wretch, should be as the groan of the man lying by the wayside, stripped and robbed and wounded. And if the priest and Levite passed him by, woe be to them! for at their hands his blood should be required.—A Sylvan Queen.

IT often happens that an important principle is vaguely apprehended and incidentally expressed long before it is reduced to a definit form or fixed by regular proof; but, while it floats in this state, on the surface of men's understanding, it is only of casual and limited ability; it is sometimes forgotten, and sometimes abandoned; seldom pursued to its consequences, and frequently denied in its modifications. It is only after it has been clearly established by an indispensable process of reasoning, explored in all its bearings, and exhibited in all its force, that it becomes of uniform and essential service; it is only then that it can be decisivly appealed to, both in controversy and in practice, and that it exerts the whole extent of its influence on private manners and public institutions.—Bailey.

IT is only when digested in a clear and natural order that truths make their proper impression on the mind, and that erroneous opinions can be combated with success.—Dugald Stewart.

PATIENT study and perfect impartiality must precede rational conviction, whether ending in faith or in doubt. Need it be asked how many are capable of such an examination?—Sharp's Letters and Essays.

OH, wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!
It wad frae many a blunder frae us,
And foolish notion;
What airs in dress an' gait wad leave us,
And e'en devotion. —Burns.

BUT past, who can recall, or done, undo?
Not God Omnipotent, nor Fate. —Milton.

Odds and Ends.

"YOUR father is worth at least half-a-million," said the choir-leader to a jealous soprano. "That is true," she murmured. "And yet you doubt my love," he replied, in an injured tone.

"GONE To Bury My Wife; Will Be Back In Thirty Minutes," was a notice found on a door in Michigan. He probably wanted to see her decently put away before he forgot it.

TALMAGE says that the church-members embrace three times as many women as men. That is probably correct. There is not more than twenty-five per cent as much fun in embracing men as women.

JUST because Anna Dickinson remarked that she thought she was "born for a warm climate," the wicked New York Commercial jumps up and asks: "Has Anna been converted to the doctrin of predestination?"

"AUNT JANE," said an exasperated wife, "I wish it was a custom for women to trade husbands, as it is for men to trade horses." "Why, my dear?" "Because, if it was, I'd cheat some woman dreadfully before sundown."

"SAVE the Sweetest Kiss for Mother," is the title of a recent new song. The author evidently overlooks the fact that the young man's precious time is so completely occupied in paying his respects to the daughter that the old lady stands a mighty slim chance of getting any kiss at all.

EARLY next month a "Negro Minstrel Festival," of one week's duration, is to be held in Cincinnati, and already aged and decrepid jokes—gray-haired, toothless, and tottering—are hobbling on crutches towards the Paris of America, so that they may arrive in season for the opening night.

AN English psychological society is racking its brains over the conundrum, "Are angels ever sleepy?" Not very often, but when you hear a bootjack rolling down the front stairs you can make up your mind that the angel's father is sleepy, which practically amounts to the same thing.

IT was a rural music-master who said very affably: "Now you see, my dear pupils, in a march we always hav four beats to a measure, to accommodate the step; for I don't know anything that has three feet, except a milking-stool." "Or a yard-stick!" cried a pert girl on the back row.

EVERY night before retiring the head of a St. Louis household taps at his oldest daughter's door and says: "Are you there, my dear?" "Yes," is the reply which generally comes back. "All right," cheerily sounds the old man as he starts for his room, "I thought you might be missing."

TEN CENTS AND A MORAL.

Here is a silver dime, my son;
Looks like lead it is blackened so;
Not a bit like the shining one
I dropped in my pocket a week ago.
Dingy? Yes. Don't you think it strange
It should lose its sheen in so short a time?
Would you like to know how came this change
For the worse to a brand-new silver dime?

The cause is simple and easily told,
But lay it to heart, O son of mine!
See if it does not a moral hold
For a bright brave boy with a wish to shine.
I draw from my pocket a copper cent—
See, there is the secret; the silver dime,
Dropped in this pocket by accident,
Has rubbed against copper all this time.

And the cent is never a whit more white
Nor improved at all by its company,
While the silver dime comes out less bright,
And its value is questioned, as you see.
Now the moral for boys is very clear
You see it, my son? Well, lay it to heart;
And see, I drop the silver here,
And the copper there; let them be apart.

[THE BOY'S SOLILOQUY.]

Oh, yes, the moral is clear as day,
But I thought I was going to get that dime;
He givs me the moral—that's dad's way—
And pockets the money every time.

HURRAH FOR THE NOSE.

There's the nose that turns up and the nose that hooks down,
The Roman, the Grecian, the pug;
There's the nose of Adonis, the nose of a clown,
And the nose like the ball of a jug.
The jolly red nose, and the thin, taper nose,
The nose that's been knocked out of place,
But the funniest nose, as every one knows,
Is the nose that spreads over the face.

Hurrah for the nose, the flat-footed nose,
The nose that is broad at the base!
The sugar-bowl nose, the summer squash nose,
The nose that spreads over the face!

There's a girl whom I know that has just such a nose,
A broad-shoulder nose, to be sure;
She carries it with her wherever she goes,
This nose that is never obscure;
Her nose when she blows it sounds like a bass drum,
It is freckled from ridge-pole to base;
It makes her down-hearted, and serious, and glum,
This nose that spreads over her face.

Hurrah for the nose, the web-footed nose,
The nose that is easy to trace!
The plum-pudding nose, the flattened-out nose,
The nose that spreads over the face!

There's a nose that is piquant, audacious, and bold,
There's a nose that but seldom obtrudes;
There's the nose of the vixenish, red-headed scold,
And that queer, pulpy nose of the dude's.
But the nose of all noses, that captures the cake,
The nose that's ahead in the race—
The nose that first money forever will take,
Is the nose that spreads over the face.

Hurrah for the nose, the Jumbo-like nose,
The nose that no snubs can efface;
Colossal old nose, stupendous old nose,
The nose that spreads over the face!

"What a Piece of Work is Man!"

WHAT A VALUABLE JOURNAL IS "MAN,"
THE EXPONENT OF THE PRINCIPLES OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

It is Published Weekly at one dollar per Annum.

T. B. WAKEMAN and T. C. LELAND, Editors. Elizur Wright, Parker Pillsbury, James Parton, Courtlandt Palmer, S. P. Putnam, Osborne Ward, H. B. Brown, Dr. T. S. Lambert, Mrs. H. S. Lake, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, and other well-knowh writers, contributors.

MAN is every inch a man, and dares to say and do whatever becomes a man.

MAN is a man among men, hail fellow. honest, above board, and encourages other men to the same high standard.

MAN is a live man; works to raise up more live men, promotes the interests of live men, and has no mission nor message for the dead.

MAN is a friend of the poor man—"A man's a man for a' that" and takes the side of the Man of mills against the man of millions.

MAN is an honest man; carries in his pocket of principles the "Philosopher's Stone"—PAY AS YOU GO! and demands that churches, ministers, and millionaires shall pay their taxes as honest men do.

MAN is a free man, and demands equal rights in the public schools and equal privileges on the first, seventh, or any day of the week.

MAN is a temperate man, but proposes to be so on his own motion, not on compulsion—because he knows enough to be so himself, not because the church is inspired from on high to force him.

MAN is a man of the world—this world—and one world at a time. The whole planet is his interest, his constituency, and his care.

MAN is a fearless, determined man.

"Whether on the gallows high, or in the battle's van,
The fittest place for man to die is where he dies for man.

But this MAN—our MAN—though "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," was not born to die. He tried recently, and couldn't. He was slightly slain "in the battle's van," but he came to life again; and now, dear reader, he asks you for a dollar for your instruction and his support.

MAN is the special organ of organization. He teaches organization, preaches organization, and works for organization as the chief ark of safety for laborers and Liberals, and the strongest force with which to meet the old organizations for the promotion of theology, tyranny, and the dissemination of useless knowledge.

MAN includes woman; is the best friend of woman, and works for her development, her just position.

In short, among the "New Political Forces" MAN is one of the Forces, and is armed for the organization of a new party and the coming struggle with the old parties.

Every reader with the least reform and progress in him should send at once for MAN. Every reader with none at all, should send and get some in him, and start right on the road to progress.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 11. No. 2. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, January 12, 1884. {33 CLINTON PLACE.} $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE people of Georgia hav a standing committee on reception for Mormon missionaries. It is composed of aged and weary hen fruit.

LAST Saturday's fire in Cleveland impartially burnt a theater and a church. The incident, therefore, furnishes no moral against the church.

THE deaths in the tenement houses of this city last year aggregated 18,041. There are 25,946 of such houses, containing 201,733 families, estimated to number 907,000 persons.

WHEN uncle came to dinner he always said grace before meat, and the little truth seeker of five years asked, "Papa, why don't you go to sleep and talk before you eat, same as uncle does?"

MME. CARLA SERENA, the explorer and writer, who has been made an honorary corresponding member of the Geographical Society of Marseilles, France, is the first woman ever thus distinguished.

MRS. LIVERMORE has declined to act as vice-president of an organization to secure a prohibitory amendment to the Constitution because a recent meeting in Boston refused to indorse woman suffrage.

IN erecting a statue to Harriet Martineau the Boston people hav honored a splendid woman, a noble Freethinker, and a stanch advocate of equality of the sexes. She was the Annie Besant of her day.

THE Rev. A. J. Bray, pastor of Zion Congregational church, Montreal, was charged with heterodoxy by his congregation. He sent his resignation to the trustees, and will devote his time hereafter to journalism.

BARBARA FREITCHIE'S clock is said to be in existence yet, with its hands fixed at 10 o'clock, the hour at which its pendulum was shot away by a soldier's bullet. Its final destination will be the Smithsonian Institution.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY is reported in the London Times as saying in a late address that "the world is not constructed upon any plan which, upon attentiv consideration, produces amiable feelings in the breast of the philanthropist."

DR. JOHN HALL affirms, on the authority of a prominent publisher, that ministers purchase the largest part of the scientific books written by speculativ writers. If this be so it partly explains the recent deluge of heretical preachers.

A CHAPLAIN in the army has been found guilty of duplicating his pay accounts and sentenced to be dismissed. Is this practice common among the men of God, and is it because one has been caught that the rest are asking for an increase of salary?

IN Miles City, Mont., the Methodists place contribution boxes in the drinking saloons, and the Christian patrons of those establishments drop a coin or two in whenever they take a drink. The boxes become as full of money as the church supporters do of drink.

SPEAKING of a letter of an Eastern Prohibitionist, the Kansas City (Mo.,) Journal, a Republican paper, says: "We don't know how it is in Maine and Vermont, but if he wants to see hundreds of bars wide open and liquor selling in full blast let him visit a few towns in Kansas and Iowa."

APOSTLE TAYLOR, head of the Mormon hierarchy, has made a strong reply to the pulpit attacks of the preachers at the East. He maintains that Mormon morals are, as a whole, purer than those of gentile communities, and that vice as it exists in Utah is an imported article. The saloons, bagnios, and gambling dens are not products of Mormon faith or practice, he says, and there are no female outcasts such as are found in all large Christian communities. This, says the Mercury, does not prove that polygamy is a blessing, but it suggests to those eastern clergymen who hav been preaching a gospel of extermination that it would be better to throw their batteries against vice and crime at their own doors.

AT a "Christian Orphan Home" in Chicago, "no milk, or meat, or butter pampered the children's appetites, but limited mush was doled out to them for breakfast and supper, and baked corn meal without salt for dinner. On highly festiv occasions the children were regaled with a potato."

A LAW has recently been passed in Brazil, which imposes an annual tax of one hundred dollars upon the master for every slave he owns. This is virtually a law for the abolition of slavery in Brazil, since, in most instances, the masters will prefer to emancipate their slaves rather than hold them and pay the tax.

THE strict Baptist churches are dying out in England, so one of Spurgeon's pupils tells the New York Baptist Ministers' Meeting. Spurgeon's church is now about the only one which requires its members to be immersed, and even that lets anybody come to the communion table. Evolution is doing its perfect work.

PLANS hav been prepared for the construction of a large hall, to be called the Salle du Travail, in Paris, close to the Hotel de Ville, where men can meet employers and arrange their terms. There will be, besides the central hall, eighty rooms for the syndicates of different trades. The cost of construction is borne by the city.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK has been heard from again. This time he is after the Piper Heidsieck people, who hav issued a very Frenchy plaque with a society lady dressed tres decollete. He has warned saloon-keepers that if they expose it to public view he will seize the pictures and arrest the men in charge. The World is of the opinion that Comstock drinks some other brand of wine.

WHEN the crown prince of Russia went sailing through the Gulf of Lyons on his way to Spain, a French ironclad gazed at him in mute silence. The commander, with a deep sense of the humiliation of Sedan, did not fling open the port-holes of his vessel and fire a merry salute. Bismarck demanded an apology, and the French government has just sent an explanatory note to Berlin with the announcement that the offending captain of the ironclad has been dismissed from the service. Thus the etiquet of nations is preserved.

THE anthracite coal companies of Pennsylvania are resorting to their usual tactics for keeping down the wages of miners and keeping up the price of coal. Orders hav been issued for half-time work during the first three months of this year. This is calculated to giv the miners the impression that the market is overstocked, which is not true, and that the companies cannot afford to consider any question of an advance in wages, and also to shorten the supply so as to hold up prices. It is said by those who are familiar with the conditions of the business that coal might be profitably retailed in this city at three dollars a ton if mining were conducted under the operation of legitimate business influences instead of being controled by a monopolizing combination.—Times.

THE president of the United States Cremation Society says that there are 5,000 persons in this country pledged to hav their bodies burnt. There is as yet only one crematory —that at Washington, Pa.; but the plans are drawn for another, and the society is raising the money to build it. Fifteen thousand dollars hav been subscribed. The building will, besides the furnace, contain a room for the resuscitation of persons who would otherwise be burnt or buried alive; another for the keeping of bodies by refrigeration until the arrival of distant mourners, who might wish to take part in funeral ceremonies; and a third in which any desired rites may be held. He also says that the principal opposition is by Christians, and that their dislike of cremation arises from a belief in the doctrin of resurrection.

IN his address as president of the Royal Society, Prof. Huxley, speaking of Sir W. Siemens, said that "hardly any living man so thoroughly combined an extensiv knowledge of scientific principles with the power of applying them in a commercially successful manner, and that the value of his numerous inventions must be measured, not merely by the extent to which they hav increased the wealth and convenience of mankind, but by the favorable reaction on the progress of pure science which they, like all such inventions, hav exerted, and will continually exert."

THIS is the theory of Adam's birth as propounded by Drake's Traveler's Magazine:

'Twas in the periods remote,
Before we had Bacteria;
Ere Sappho sang or Shakspere wrote
Or doctors found malaria,
The Atom saw he had no chance,
And so approached the Molecule,
Suggesting that they might enhance
Their interests if they should pool.

The drifting Molecule, a form
Of disembodied life, afloat,
Beheld a chance of keeping warm
By putting on an overcoat.
Impressed by this advantage, he Jumped in the Atom, like a knife,
And in the two combined we see
The first form of Organic Life.

Encouraged by this marked success,
They fattened on their happy find,
And to their very recklessness
Are we indebted for mankind.
Thus sprang man from this precious pair,
And not some scientific sham,
For from the fact they didn't care
A tinker's, was evolved A-dam.

IT is a public misfortune that so many movements looking toward the lessening of the wickedness and immorality with which the world is surfeited hav the misfortune to fall into the hands of cranks or bigots; or, what is even worse, of persons whose motivs are founded on personal gain. Unquestionably, the endeavor to suppress the publication and sale of obscene pictures and literature is a most laudable one, per se, and worthy of all encouragement at the hands of right-thinking people. Unfortunately, however, its chief apostle and agent in this country has been a man whose methods hav lost him the respect and confidence of that portion of the community in which he would naturally expect his chief support. There is a deep-seated suspicion abroad that Anthony Comstock is not a fit or proper person to represent such a movement; that he wars on obscenity simply because he finds his bread and butter in so doing, actuated by no higher motivs than the vulgar police detectiv; and that, finally, he is neither possessed of the natural gifts nor the requisit culture and training to fit him for the position of public censor in matters of literature and art. His latest exploit in the censorship line has been to secure the conviction of an art-dealer's clerk for selling photographs of pictures exhibited in the last Paris salon—the jury in the case being, of course, eminently well qualified, as most juries are, to pass judgment on such matters. In the course of the trial this connoisseur of vice incidentally remarked that he had also purchased an obscene book at the same shop entitled, "Droll Stories by Balzac." "Is that the same Balzac that Paris is now erecting a monument to?" inquired the counsel. "It may be so. I do not know," replied the witness. The confession of ignorance so gross by the great American literary and art censor would appear to be little less indecent than the books and pictures which he says are so offensiv. Meanwhile, though the works of reputable artists and of geniuses like Balzac are thus judicially condemned, the pure-minded Comstock maintains a monumental inactivity toward the publishers of the Day's Doings, the Police Gazette, and other pictorials of like ilk, who weekly flood the market with their prurient and salacious sheets. It would be singularly interesting to learn why this is thus.—St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press.

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

THE HOLY GHOST.

This intensely interesting and highly important subject I confess to approach with much fear and trembling, which pusillanimity I attribute mainly to two causes.

Firstly, from my boyhood up I always hav had a vague dread of ghosts of every description, having been told many uncanny tales of their habits and peculiarities by my good old nurse while yet glorying in my bib and tucker.

Secondly, because a ghost is such an unsatisfactory style of thing to deal with, from the simple fact that there is nothing tangible about him which you can lay hold of.

He can abuse you just as much as he pleases, but you can never retaliate, which is not, I take it, anything like a "square deal."

But to particularize. The most marked peculiarity about the Holy Ghost is, I judge, his triple identity, he being (if the Biblical account is to be believed) not only himself, but likewise both God and Jesus Christ.

But, as if this peculiarity (which would of itself, to my mind, amply serve to distinguish him from all other and less pretentious ghosts) were insufficient to establish his identity, he was likewise made individually historical from this fact, viz., that to "sin against him" (that is, to permit yourself to honestly doubt whether he really could be three different personages at one and the same time) was to certainly damn your soul for all eternity. This is an additional and weighty reason why I hav heretofore given the consideration of this subject a wide berth.

Perhaps even at this very moment I may be penning that which, beneath his vigilant eye, will forever consign my rash soul to the flames of hell.

But to continue. His cardinal virtue (and one in which I may safely say he has never been excelled, or even equaled,) is his "filling" quality. It is an historical (?) fact that a very considerable concourse of people has not infrequently been, in a single instant, "filled" with him; precisely how, it is not known—nor does it indeed matter; the fact (?) remains the same.

The only other act worthy of historical mention which he was ever accredited with upon the truthful (?) page of scripture (beside his "filling" exploits, in which to this day he stands without a peer), is his having upon a certain occasion turned himself into a white pigeon and fluttered down upon Christ's head. (Vide exploits of Heller, Hermann, Cazeneuve, Sig. Blitz, etc.).

What form he possessed as he came sailing down, previous to his entrance into the atmospheric envelop encompassing our earth, is not stated in the text, and hence we are left to helplessly speculate upon this point for ourselvs. Certainly above that altitude his form could not hav been that of a pigeon, since that creature's wings must hav proved entirely useless in the highly attenuated ether of upper space.

In view of the somewhat uneventful character of the history of this personage, I think it simple justice to him to call attention to the fact that the major portion of his existence appears to hav been passed in the harmless and pleasing pursuit of "filling" people with himself. It is barely possible that he invaded their persons in the form of smoke, as did the powerful geni the air, in "The Fisherman's Story" of "The Arabian Nights."

Perhaps, after all ("under the rose" I say it), this Holy Ghost marvel is all "smoke," and only a "fish story," like the other.

FORCE.

Divorced from that mysterious energy men term force, all matter must become absolutely inert,

> "As idle as a painted ship
> Upon a painted ocean."

Force is, perhaps, the only God of whom man will ever know.

Force, in its multiform manifestations, embodies the ideal "perpetual motion" ever sought, but never yet found, by science, in the domain of mechanics.

Should force cease to act for a single instant, the universe would fall into chaos. What, then, is force?

We know absolutely nothing of its ego, but can simply observe its attributes and its effects upon matter.

Science proves to us that every particle of matter is in a state of perpetual change (i. e., of motion).

The sun is the earth's great natural feeder.

Nature abhors rest, as she does a vacuum; hence there is absolutely no rest in all her vast domain.

The particles composing the diamond are as truly in motion as are those which compose a blade of grass.

All velocity (like all size) is relativ only, and not absolute.

There may exist forms of motion (at present entirely unknown to us) so sluggish that the almost unimaginable slowness of disintegration among the particles composing the diamond would be, to their speed, as the velocity of a ray of light compared to that of a door-snail!

Little, indeed, wots man of the mighty mysteries which encompass him, as the great sea-plain engulfs some tiny islet amid its watery waste!

And yet impudent and ignorant priests assure us that they know, not only the entire plans of the universe and its purpose, but likewise are familiar with the most interior thoughts and intentions of deity! And, still worse, we pay these arrant humbugs to tell us this from their pulpit every Sunday.

I tell you, my friends, were the body politic but one-tenth part as well organized an institution as is the average bee-hive, its working members would sting these pompous drones to death inside of twenty-four hours!

I say, with emphasis, that if we had more Ingersolls among us to-day it would be the better for this priestrid land!

What a ridiculous puppet-show does a Catholic ceremonial present to the mind of the intellectualist!

Its dodging, and bowing, and scraping on the part of the laity before poorly executed and gaudy images of Christ, possessing a heart of more than twice the normal size, situated (in reckless disregard of the laws of anatomy) in the very center of his chest, and emitting aurae in all directions, like a lucifer match rubbed in the dark!

Then, on the part of the clergy, the apparently purposeless blowing out and re-lighting of wax tapers, the donning and doffing of various styles and designs of what (to the uninitiated), would appear to be fancy smoking-caps, the opening and shutting of cunningly contrived little doors in the altar (accompanied by many profound salaams), and the putting in and taking out of tiny "cubby-holes" revealed behind these doors mysterious-looking rolls of what might easily pass for authors' MSS.

The "head" priest during the progress of this farce tries on various suits of clothes, each one more bedizzened with bullion and "nobbier" (if I may be permitted the use of so unscriptural a word in this connection) than the last!

At length, when he has really got into what the late lamented Artemus Ward would hav called "store clothes," he is satisfied, and so is his audience!

The show is enlivened by and ends up with a mêlange of unintelligible gibberish chanted in a monotonous, sing-song rhythm, to which the tom-tom would form a fitting accompaniment, and whose musical excellence would pale before that of "Pinafore," "Patience," or the "Pirates of Penzance," as Hesperus before the dawn!

HAPPINESS.

Happiness is (either directly or indirectly) the aim and desire of every sentient being, man or brute. No creature prefers, knowingly, pain to pleasure.

Even the violently insane invariably strive to attain that which to them appears happiness.

The victim of dementia, who thrusts his hand between the bars of a red-hot grate, believes the act conduciv to his happiness, no less than does the martyr who sings at the stake whilst being consumed by the flames which envelop him.

It seems almost a certainty that the cerebral excitement may, in either of the above instances, produce immunity from physical agony, even while the flesh crisps and shrivels amid the crackling flames.

I affirm positivly that in no act of his life is man impelled otherwise than toward the attainment of his own happiness, even in those instances which appear, at first sight, to be self-sacrifice.

I will support this view by supposing the following extreme case.

A man possessed of noble and generous impulses observes a young child fall into deep and icy water, upon a dark and tempestuous night, under circumstances which make it ten to one he must lose his own life by an attempted rescue. Does he hesitate?

No! Without apparently pausing for reflection, he braves the imminent peril, and makes the attempt.

Does the above instance militate against, and form an exception to the great law I hav laid down for one and all? By no means.

To the mind of this noble and generous man self-sacrifice became a pleasure, or, if not actually a pleasure, at least a lesser pain than the violation of the unselfish dictates of his nature would hav been; hence his act.

He could not, in fact, constituted as he was, do differently. He but followed, as all are compelled to do, his strongest motiv.

Often, indeed, following our strongest motiv leads to pain, and not pleasure, for frequently we find ourselvs compelled to a choice between the two horns of a dilemma, one of which is only less painful than the other.

Often, too, we choose the more painful course through lack of discriminating and weighing power, deeming that to be the more pleasurable which is, in reality, the more painful course.

To be sure, in the case cited above of a drowning child the man of noble impulses did not stop to deliberately think out which course of action would the better conserve his pleasure.

In cases of emergency such as this the mind works with lightning-like rapidity, and almost in the same instant the reasoning is performed and the conclusion reached, perhaps even without this fact being known to the reasoner.

Nevertheless, he must and does reason and decide before he can, by any possibility, act. Surely no one would be so foolish as to claim that the lightning did not flash, because, almost at the very instant, the thunder stunned him with its terrific roar.

No act can possibly be performed without volition, and no volition can take place without previous thought, followed by decision upon some particular course of action, as being that apparently conserving to the individual's greatest happiness.

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

Liberal Labor.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER,—Sir: It is interesting to read in your paper the travels of our Liberal missionaries, to learn of their reception, who arranged for their lectures, what the local papers said, etc. This is all very interesting to the people. I am glad, also, to see the column announcing meetings in different towns and cities. I would suggest that each society sending its notice should name its officers, or president and secretary, so that speakers can communicate.

During October we were with the Northern League of Iowa, and gave thirteen lectures for that association. In Waverly, the headquarters of the League, we spoke in a very pleasant Universalist church, which, as it is not used by that body, can easily be obtained for Liberal meetings. Our lectures were very largely attended, and much interest was manifested. At Greene, Butler county, some twenty miles distant, we gave the first Freethought lectures ever given in the town; yet the hall was crowded to excess. Mr. J. D. Steves, a very energetic Liberal of the Materialistic wing, arranged for the meetings.

During November we were at Vinton, Benton county, Iowa. Here but little could be done, owing mainly to the indifference of the Infidels themselvs. A few are interested, but the majority seem lukewarm. Were they disposed to act, good meetings might be kept up there, because the people would come out if some one would arouse them and sustain the work. Let me say to Infidels that constant zeal and enthusiasm are necessary to keep new thought before the people. Do not weary in well doing, but, stimulated by the hope of a better condition, press bravely forward.

In this town of Ottumwa, containing some ten or twelve thousand inhabitants, the Liberals hav rented a nice hall, adorned it with mottoes, own an organ, and hav a fine choir. We came here to speak for the society during the month of December, but hav reengaged for January. We giv two lectures each Sunday, hav fine singing, and last Sunday Mr. Peck organized a children's lyceum.

This very prosperous and activ association is due to the efforts of Mrs. Nettie Pease Fox, who came here about three years ago, and began speaking upon Spiritualism in a small and unpretentious hall. The audiences increased, and by and by the most activ individuals engaged the present hall, and started out as a permanent institution. Great credit is due Mrs. Fox for the work done. The Spiritual Offering, edited by Colonel and Mrs. Fox, also began here, and has done a good work. I understand it has a large circulation, and it is really one of the best Spiritualist papers published.

The society is now busy arranging for a bazar and Christmas dinner. I wish other societies would be stimulated by the success of this to go to work in earnest to become a fixed institution.

I must commend THE TRUTH SEEKER for adding a children's column to the paper. It will increase its circulation, and do much good. Many copies are taken here. I would like to say to societies and individuals, who desire our services for week evenings during January, to remember that we are in southern Iowa now, and we want to hear from all in the vicinity of Ottumwa, say, within a radius of one hundred and fifty miles. We are ready for work, and hope you will write promptly. There is a great difficulty which speakers encounter, and that is the immense territory which we must travel over to fill appointments. But if the friends would observe the engagements of the several speakers, this could sometimes be obviated, by making arrangements at various places adjacent.

Persons desiring to arrange for lectures during the spring months can write me here, and I hope will do so as early as possible. Permanent address, till farther notice, MRS. H. S. LAKE.

Ottumwa, Iowa, December 22, 1883.

IT now turns out that Sojourner Touth, recently deceased, a noted female negro revivalist, whose chief claim to a hearing was her alleged great age, was a humbug. It is asserted on official Methodist authority that she was not one hundred and eight years old, nor a hundred, not even ninety. Convincing evidence was years ago collected to refute her claim of centenarianism, and which also proved that she was a conscious and scheming humbug. Many clergymen say they knew the facts, and witheld their sanction from her revivalistic work, but why they did not expose her is not made plain. Probably it was because she "was doing the master's work," in the successful conduct of which it appears false claims are a great aid.

Freethinkers in Convention.

The Salamanca Meeting.

OPENING SESSION.—THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 27, 1883.—SEVERE STORM BUT LARGE ATTENDANCE.—SALAMANCA QUARTET. — THE INIMITABLE PROF. H. H. HALL. — "THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE RELIGIOUS EMOTIONS," BY EX-REV. J. H. BURNHAM.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Dec. 27, 1883—It snows, and it blows; old Boreas, the bitter, blustering blower, with icicles hanging upon his chin, and a nose cold as a lobster's liver, sweeps bellowing through this valley. During the afternoon he occasionally tried to light up a smile on his saturine features, and at times succeeded in shedding a few half-frozen tears of penitence, only increasing the slush with each fitful gush.

As evening shades gathered, instead of becoming reticent and keeping shady, he roared and raged like an old-style hell-fire Methodist revival parson, and hurled the frozen snow in fierce defiant gusts in every direction, as if in search of some person or thing on whom to vent his fury.

But Liberals, who hav so dauntlessly braved the fires of hell, were not to be scared by the cold; so, despite the fierce storm, there was a very large attendance; and although every endeavor to warm up the building was but a half success, the audience gave close attention and were deeply interested in the eloquent and earnest utterances of the ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, the songs of the Salamanca Quartet, and the humorous melodies of Prof. Hall.

In the absence of the genial Dr. Brown, the honored and able president, Secretary Green nominated ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds as chairman, who, in accepting the position, called attention to the fact that it was a Freethinkers' Convention. The prince of caterers, H. L. Green, had provided an intellectual banquet, though some things on the bill of fare might not suit the tastes of all. But each had a right to examin or reject. Freethinkers award to all credit for the same sincerity and honesty of opinion that they claim for themselvs.

After a very able poem by Prof. Hall, and some most exquisit melody from the quartet, the chairman introduced the ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, of Michigan, who spoke on the subject of "The Philosophy of the Religious Emotions:"

In the order of sequence through the wonderful mechanism of sensation, we become self-conscious, also in which we become subject and object to ourself. There is nothing more complex in any line of thought than the objects of thought which pass under the eye of consciousness. We do not only discover thought, reason, intelligence, will-power, but a wild continent of conflicting emotions, when religions claim relation to an assumed unknown something called God. But the philosophy of these emotions remains hid until we see how they arise, and find the law which controls them. Emotions arise only in the presence of their object, real of imaginary. They always, in their normal condition, respond to their several objects, hence do not predicate either virtue or vice. Emotions burning in the glow of passions are sinless. They are as pure as a flake of snow. They, in the order of environment, are necessary. They are without character until acted upon and appreciated by the sharply individualized ego. Their expression depends upon physiological functions under certain stimuli. The stimuli coming in contact with nerve feelers, which are connected with nerve centers, call forth a discharge of nerve energy, and thus changes are produced in our mental and physical states.

Thus changes come, and the character is determined by the method of distribution. That is the method in the distribution of nerve energy from nerve center through nerve fiber or nerve feelers. Religion, when as a nerve excited it is conveyed through nerve fiber to nerve center, constitutes the religious emotions. As a result of this analysis, take the religious emotion expressing itself in prayer. This is fundamental in the religion of the world. These devotees are sanguin as to this faith in their divinities in proportion to their ignorance. The more ignorant they are, the stronger is their faith in the effect of their prayers. But perchance some will ask, Will you with cruel hand, turn over the cup of regenerativ joy, which is held by so many millions in the deepest sorrows of life? Will you take from the mother the benediction she givs her boy as he leaves the old home? Must she not with her prayers follow him over continents and oceans? Would not this be cruel in the extreme? Truth is always cruel when it comes in contact with our folly and superstition. The beautiful fancy which comes to us at times in dreamland is broken to pieces in our awaking. So must vanish the wild drapery of superstition and religion when we awake to the truth of things. But as investigators we do not consult our wishes, our hopes, or our fears, but simply try to find and know what is true.

It is held, by the Christian people at least, that the religious emotions and experiences are all-important, and are a strong proof as to the divinity of the Christian religion. I am of the opinion that here is the main line of defense, and reason is very justly ignored, and the religious element is the final dependence. This, then, we must examin. Nerve centers receive, from rest and the nourishment we take, they supply. This is used in action, physical, mental, or both. Its use is in proportion to the activity, either mental or physical. If the excitant taps a nerve center in great force, death ensues sometimes; for in this case, the nerve centers are separated from the nerve feelers. A person in profound meditation may drop upon the floor, or in the road, as the case may be; so, often, under strong religious emotions, the devotee is prostrated as has the power. Others weep, and again others cry or laugh. In bereavement, we see sometimes the deepest sorrow often changed by any device which changes the method in the distribution of nerve energy. Prayer will do it often, not because anyone has heard or answered it, but because it changes the method or the line of its distribution. A cup of coffee, an accident, and many things would produce a like diversion, and secure the same result as that produced by prayer. It becomes, to the thoughtful observer, evident that the history of the religious emotions depends not upon bibles, gods, or Christs, but are all within the domain of physiological changes, produced in varying the methods in the distribution of nerve energy. This conclusion is supported beyond all reasonable doubt by the history or the religions of the world. Christianity can lay no special claim to special experiences, for what it claims all others equally claim, with a different God. Bible, and Christ, the same experiences. Old Hindoos, thousands of years ago, indulged in the same hopes and fears, and hav told, and do tell, the same story as our Christian friends. And thus it is with all religions. And hence the philosophy of the religious emotions is to be found, and only found, in the possible changes rung upon the emotional nature.

SECOND DAY'S SESSION.

Friday morning.—The storm continues; but as delegations of Freethinkers continue to come also, every one is jovial and jubilant at the prospects of a most successful convention.

The Dudley House (wretchedly constructed, and run by inexperience, but with earnest desire to do the best they can) was not alone crowded, but cots in every available spot in parlor, hall, or passage-way were at a premium.

At the morning session the attendance was mainly delegates to the Convention. The ten-minute speeches at the conference were very interesting, lasting till noon, and crowded out the genial, jolly president's address. But it is only postponed until to-morrow morning.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION,

At 2 o'clock, P.M., was well attended. Mr. A. B. Bradford, of Pennsylvania, delivered a very able, eloquent, and interesting lecture on, "What the World and Freethinkers Hold in Regard to Martin Luther." [We refrain from giving a synopsis, as Mr. Bradford expressed his intention of sending the copy of his lecture to THE TRUTH SEEKER.—REP.]

Mr. Geo. W. Taylor next addressed the Convention on "Facts." This gentleman gave evidence of deep, earnest sincerity, and devout faith in Spiritualism. Certainly the facts he related were marvelous; one of many incidents he recited precluded all possibility of mistake or deception. He stated that on one occasion, in his own house, with no professional medium present, he improvised a cabinet out of a wardrobe filled with hats, shawls, clothes, etc. He placed two shawls before the door; soon the shawls parted and a face appeared, and its voice cried, "Praise God." Other forms appeared and were recognized.

The audience gave close attention to the speaker and evinced deep interest in the recital—and although many doubted the facts, none doubted the sincerity and honesty of the speaker. He carried conviction to all that what he related were facts to him.

FRIDAY EVENING SESSION.

Large as was the attendance at the Rochester Convention, the interest and attendance, in proportion, very far exceeds it. Beyond question this will prove the best, most instructiv and useful convention of any yet held. The announcement that our popular, talented, and eloquent young friend, John Remsburg, of Kansas, would speak this evening, created a furore of enthusiasm, and long before time to commence the exercises, the house began to fill.

Awaiting the arrival of the time announced for the speakers of the evening, a conference meeting was started, during which Miss Neil, of Ohio, in a voice like a young volcano on a hurrah, said she wanted to talk if she could get a chance. Instantly the gallant Dr. Brown invited the lady to take a few minutes, but called forth her virgin indignation when he announced her as Mrs. Neil. She declined to talk now; there was not time; she wanted to talk about prohibition if she could get a chance; she would make a speech that would not be pretty, but it should be strong. She wanted to know if this Convention of Liberals would do better than the two political parties; and if this Convention would do justice to the myriads of shackled, chained, heart-crushed women. She wanted to make a speech and she promised it should be a wringer. The lady who could not talk having used up twenty minutes, the gentle Dr. Brown was obliged to call time.

After singing by the choir, Mr. Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y., was introduced to the Convention. He said he had just received a telegram with news of very depressing nature. He was a Spiritualist, and himself a medium—not in a professional sense of the term, but mediumistic. When out of tune it was not possible to do justice to the audience. He had been asked by the president what was his subject. He could not tell—perhaps he would not hav any. He would wait for something to come. After a pause, and passing his hands several times across his brow, he closed his eyes, and did not once open them during his address, which was upon the "Genius of Freethought, and the Issues It Involves." He said:

Freethought involves legitimate freedom; not license, but true freedom; and there can be no such thing as freedom unless it is responsible freedom. Education develops character, not reputation. Let us liv indifferent to popularity or what the world holds of us. Not what we are thought to be, but what we are, moral, mental, and physical, is the matter of vital import. In an absolute sense, there is no such thing as freedom or free thought; it is dependent on a line of causes lying back of centuries. Not a man livs or thinks but does so under restrictions of all his environments. Legitimate governments and restrictions foster and develop freedom. After passing the meridian of age we may modify, but to make radical changes is well-nigh impossible. Very few of the most devoted lovers of Freethought and liberty are free enough to stand by and let truth prevail and their pet hobby, their ism, fall. Freethought moves man to liv better, to improve the condition of humanity, overcome evil and develop good. To destroy is not its mission. The iconoclast is not a Freethinker, but Freethought allows it. Spiritualism is my theme especially. I liv related to the future. Spiritualists hav evidence that character remains; we carry all our individuality to the eternal world before us. Freethought includes, as one of its features, the beautiful theory of Spiritualism. It is the genius of Freethought to prove all things and hold fast to that which is good. Accept, then, whatever bears the stamp of truth, and if there is aught false reject it; for all truth is divine. Freethought helps us to be true, loyal men and women, to all good, and expose, reject, and banish falsehood in the Bible or any other book. The Christian says, "My faith is God's will; if you step outside you are an enemy to God. You must keep within the prescribed bounds." Freethought knows no bounds.

After a song by Prof. H. H. Hall, the president introduced Mr. John Remsburg, who spoke on "The Christian Sabbath."*

THIRD DAY'S SESSION.

Among the notable short addresses was that of Mrs. Stearns, of Buffalo, who spoke substantially as follows:

I am rejoiced to stand on a free platform, where all can giv expression to their own thoughts. Light dissipates darkness. I go hand in hand with every unfoldment of science. The study of astronomy destroyed the dogma that the world is only 6,000 years old. Why hav not the people of to-day the same need of close and personal contact with God that they had a thousand years ago? Why hav they not in their necessity, in their doubts, yet hopes, the same need to get near to God and receive direct communication from him? If God is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, why do all the parsons, priests, fail. We need to bring about a union between our highest, scientific scholars and the teachings of the Sunday-schools. Let the children learn of Nature and Nature's laws, and there will be no discrepancies between the lessons of Sunday and week-days. The lessons of the primary school and the college would not then be at direct variance with Sunday-school and church instruction.

Prof. H. H. Hall made an able appeal in behalf of the education of our children, not letting them drift into the church and hav to work out from the darkness of creed and superstition. The keenness of priestcraft says, "Giv me the first seven years of a child's life, and who will may hav him for all the rest of his days." Nothing comes slower than changes of public opinion. Instead of a deluge of verbosity in discussing with each other, using our time and energy in idle argument, let us help the children to think for themselvs and study the laws of nature. Opportunities to set them thinking, to educate them to think for themselvs, abound. Ask a child what makes it rain. The orthodox answer is, "God makes it rain." Take a child to the window, wipe off a pane of glass; ask what is on the window-pane. Nothing. Then breathe on the pane. What is that on the glass? Breath—condensed vapor. Well, then, rain is a cold wind or condensed vapor. If God made rain, then God is a cold wind. We hear a great deal in regard to prohibition. A stream cannot rise above its source. Temperance reform lies with the women and children. In order to hav temperance, educate the children from a hygienic standpoint. Girls and women hold now the power in their own hands to crush out the fiend Intemperance. Let them refuse to accept attendance from, or to bestow their company upon, or recognize those men who indulge in bad and vicious habits; and men will at once inaugurate a reform.

Miss Neil leaped to the front, and in the dulcet tones and gentle grace of a trip-hammer, went for the gentle child of song and jollity something like this:

Hall says the best plan is to hav women do this work of reform in temperance. I'd be ashamed to ask women to do anything when I knew they were without weapons. He would hav the women educate the children while the man went to the dram-shop. He says, Let women hav nothing to do with any man that has bad habits. Where is the man that does not smoke, chew, or drink rum? I hav been looking for a man without bad habits for thirty years. If girls or women took only men without bad habits, like me they would never hav one. Giv women the ballot, and they can take care of the infernal traffic in rum. I hope the Democrats will get into full power and everywhere defeat the miserable Republicans. I know no better use God Almighty can make of the old Democratic party than to make a mop of it to clean out the dirty Republican party. Women are nobodies until they get married. When married they and their husbands are one. And he is always the one.

The Republicans for twenty-five years hav run the government by and for the interests of the whisky shops, while the old defunct Democratic party has long been dead, but still crawls round just to save funeral expenses. The Republican party took their dead chief to the grave, and had to spend a fortune in guzzling whisky on the trip. Why, a lot of old women could do better than that?

After music by the choir, the genial Dr. Brown gave his promised address, replete with valuable health hints, witticisms, and poetry. His subject he announced as "Salvation by Education." He spoke as follows:

We hav had eighteen hundred years of superstition, faith, and hope, words never understood. There are three hundred religions; each has had a guess about salvation. I propose to speak about and seek for salvation this side of death, and wait for salvation in death when I get there. "Heaven is a home of an orthodox ring." We are taught to look to God for knowledge, and so neglect to study the laws of hygiene, how to prolong life and secure health to our posterity. We would all liv longer and happier if we would take as good care of ourselvs and our children as we do of our horses, use the same reasonable common sense. You feed your horses four to six quarts of oats three times a day when you work them hard; but when left idle in the stable you do not feed so heavy. You may hav no use for your horses, yet you take them out because it is not good for them to be without exercise. Yet you will eat heartily, gorge your stomachs, and avoid exercise, and then wonder you are sick. You acknowledge the need, if you would keep your horses in good condition, you must not alone use common sense in feeding, but keep them clean. Wash oftener, abandon your saltpeter-poisoned meat, your vinegar and cider, your coffee and tea, and you will hav no heavy doctor bills. Oxy-gin is the only intoxicant we ought to ever indulge in. Tea-drinking, mixed with grease, insures cancer of the stomach. Salted meat produces catarrh. Hav you a headache? Are you bilious?—instead of wasting money on patent nostrums take an emetic; drink all the warm water you can get down, then go after it with a goose-quill, feather-end down. Preserve health, and you will hav clear, clean, bright, wholesome thoughts, and insure salvation here and now.

On motion, Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Pennsylvania, T. B. Wakeman and Geo. W. Taylor, of New York; J. H. Burnham, of Michigan; and John C. Remsburg, of Kansas, were appointed a Committee on Resolutions.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The committee reported the resolutions which were printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER last week.

Judge McCormick then addressed the Convention on Spiritualism, with his usual effectiv grace and poetry of motion. Excellent and appropriate music was faultlessly rendered by the Salamanca Quartet —Mrs. H. O. Wait, Mrs. V. G. Fitts, Mrs. J. P. Colgrove, and Mrs. Mina Seymour, pianist, assisted by Prof. M. M. Lane, who sang many beautiful solos during the Convention.

Of course it is unnecessary to more than mention the fact of H. H. Hall's being present, for that implies poetry, music, humor, satire, fun, and side-splitting laughter.

BANQUET TO THE SPEAKERS.

Mrs. Mina Seymour gave evidence of the genuinness and practicability of her Liberalism by inviting the speakers to her beautiful home, and providing them a most elegant and sumptuous banquet. It was one of the most happy and pleasant little gatherings, and will ever bring to kind remembrance the fair and talented little hostess, in connection with the most happy, harmonious, and successful Freethinkers' convention ever held.

EVENING SESSION.

It having been announced that ex-Rev. Charles B. Reynolds would address the Convention, there was an immense gathering. He is well known in this vicinity, having preached in a mammoth tent for three summers in Chautauqua county.

Mr. J. H. Burnham was to hav spoken first, but severe sickness prevented, and consequently Mr. Reynolds was requested to fill the time. His subject was "Teaching of Infidelity and Christianity." It is given below in full:

While it is generally conceded, even by Christians, that the Old Testament contains much that is undesirable, it is insisted that the New Testament is the revelation of a new and better code of morality. We are told the morality Christ inculcated is far in advance of that of the Old Testament, and infinitly superior to any or all of the best and greatest sages, philosophers, and scientists that hav ever lived. It is an exploded fallacy that books of the New Testament hav been handed down to us in the very words of the inspired writers, and that they hav been miraculously preserved from loss, error, or interpolation. There is no evidence that even the four gospels, so much relied on, containing the only record of the life and teachings of Christ, were even written by those whose names are attached to them. In a series of articles recently published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, entitled "Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament," it has been most positivly proved by the admissions and declarations of Christian authorities of the very highest standing: (1) That history affords no trace of the pure apostolic originals; (2) that no originals hav existed since the second century; (3) that if they ever existed at all they were never considered of value or importance enough to call for any especial care in their preservation; (4) that the New Testament was translated, not from original manuscripts or even reliable copies, but from what at best were only claimed to be copies of copies, which, if copies at all, abounded in errors, heresies, and perversions; (5) that the early fathers, under whose direction and supervision all copies were made, were men who regarded it as an act of virtue to deceive and lie for the good of their religion; the very best, those who surpassed all others in piety, looked upon it as laudable to advance the cause of Christ by artifice and fraud; (6) that our present version is founded on translations by Romish priests that by one another, as well as by all scholars, were denounced as faulty, heretical, and designedly perversions; (7) that Luke, the best and most scholarly of the four gospels—according to its own testimony—was not written by divine aid or inspiration, nor by or through the influence or dictation of any of the apostles or disciples.

No intelligent person would accept as authoritativ any book or history so utterly destitute of evidence of genuinness and reliability. The Jews are not the only people that hav sacred writings claimed to be the inspired word of God. Nearly all nations had their gods, their sacred writings, prophets, priests, and divine commands. How can we know they are all wrong? —that the Jews alone were God's own chosen people?

Are the children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob better people than all others, more virtuous, brave, and generous, that we should without question accept their sacred writing as the embodiment of all that is divine, and reject all others as foolish fables? It must be admitted, Jewish theology is no more the oldest in the world than it is the best, the purest, or the most consistent.

The Jews, who are indorsed by all Christians and the New Testament as God's own chosen people ("to whom pertaineth the adoration, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises"—Rom. ix, 4), absolutely repudiate and spurn Christ and Christianity, and deny the inspiration, truth, or authority of the New Testament.

Christ designed that only Jews should be saved. "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv, 24). He positivly forbade his disciples to preach the gospel to any but Jews. "Go not into the way of the gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not" (Matt. x, 5).

And Jesus himself declared he spake to the multitude in parables expressly to prevent the possibility of those without —that is, any except Jews—being converted, lest they should be saved.

Suppose I discovered there was a conspiracy to wreck the night express; that on a very steep embankment the rails had been unspiked, so that when the train reached there it must inevitably be precipitated down the embankment; nothing can save the passengers from mutilation and horrible death. I enter the cars as the train stands in the depot about to start on its fated journey. I pass through and notify every Mason by secret signals to leave the train; they come out; I tell them of the danger, but forbid and prevent their warning any of the passengers not Masons. Men, women, children, are going unconsciously to their horrible doom. But lest any of them should understand, take warning, and so be saved, I am careful to use only such signs and words as I am sure they cannot understand.

You say I should be the——Stop! are we not instructed to take Christ for our example?

"And he said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God; but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables: that seeing they may see and not perceive; and hearing they may hear and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins be forgiven them" (Mark iv, 11, 12).

The son of God, the savior of mankind, says himself he took especial pains to prevent men, women, and children from being converted, lest their sins be forgiven them, and so they be saved from eternal death and hell.

Christ declares that he and his father are one, and that he came to exemplify the character of his father. He enjoins us, "Be ye therefore merciful, as your father is merciful" (Luke vi, 36). And it is claimed there is perfect harmony between the character of God and Christ as revealed in the Old and New Testaments.

"Therefore will I always deal in fury; mine eye shalt not spare, neither will I hav pity; and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them" (Ezk. viii, 18). "Go ye after him through the city and smite; let not your eye spare, neither hav ye pity. Slay utterly old and young, both maids, and little children, and women" (Ezk. ix, 5, 6). Says Christ, "Be ye therefore merciful, as your father is merciful" (Luke vi, 36). He also revels in the thought of mercy, just like his father. "But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me" (Luke xix, 27). "When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that obey not the gospel" (2 Thes. i, 7, 8). What tender, pitying mercy! What loving precepts! What blessed examples! Compare this with the teaching of that terrible apostle of Infidelity, Thomas Paine: "Do justice, love mercy, and endeavor to make your fellow-creatures happy."

For over eighteen hundred years Christianity has been promulgated under the especial guardianship and fostering care of its great God. Its doctrins and priests hav had full sway among the most intelligent races of the earth; and what is the result? Hav peace, love, liberty, happiness, innocence, and virtue prevailed?

Russia is a truly Christian country, with its horrible dungeons, its barbarous knout, its Siberian horrors, and its imperial despotism; with its most holy czar, by the grace of God emperor, crowned and anointed by the most reverend priests of Christ; its tyranny sanctioned and sustained, and the servil subjection of the people enjoined by the New Testament: "Submit yourselvs to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him. Fear God. Honor the king. Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward" (1 Peter ii, 13, 18). Ireland, Spain, Italy, Mexico, are Christian countries with Christian goverments, the masses groaning under tyrannous injustice and oppression, steeped in misery, ignorance, superstition, and crime, while Germany, which to-day is Infidel, presents the highest standard of morals in all Europe.

Had Washington, Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, and all the other noble heroes of the Revolution really believed and heeded the teachings of Christ and the New Testament, they must hav yielded slavish obedience to King George, and submitted without a murmur to all the tyrannous behests of the governors the king sent to rule the colonies.

But for their Infidelity, their disbelief and ignoring of the teachings of Christ and the New Testament, this glorious republic could never hav had existence. Would it not be well for Christians of America to stop and think ere railing against and calumniating Infidels, and ask themselvs the question, To whom are we indebted for a government based upon equal political and religious rights—a government in which all religions are tolerated, and which makes no distinction on account of creed; and but for the subtil wiles of priestcraft would be equally tolerant of Liberals who oppose all creeds? For it is inscribed on the records of our country's history by the iron pen of truth that during the administration of Mr. and Mrs. Hayes an arrogant and persecuting church, in order to gratify its hatred of Freethought, under a constitution which ignores all religions, was permitted to drag a citizen from his home, and incarcerate him in a felon's cell for no other offense than publishing his religious convictions.

The miserables who caused this humiliating disgrace to American jurisprudence by their infamous persecution of that innocent and honorable man, D. M. Bennett, would hav us let the matter rest; they desire it should sink into oblivion—but it will not down.

The arrest and imprisonment of that brave, self-sacrificing champion of reason, right, and liberty, D. M. Bennett, editor and publisher of THE TRUTH SEEKER, was a blow at the rights of every citizen who dares express his honest convictions, or who has the manhood to refuse to favor, cringe, and bow to the power of the priesthood.

Let it ever be remembered, the attorney-general, over his own signature, declared the pamphlet sent through the mail by Mr. Bennett was not obscene—that Mr. Bennett was not its author or its publisher. Search the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER; read every line he ever published, and not one word of obscenity can be found. No! That true man, that noble martyr to religious liberty, D. M. Bennett, was imprisoned, hounded to his death, and even in his grave is vilified and maligned by Christians, not because he sent obscene literature through the mails—they well know he never did—but because he published a successful Freethought newspaper, denouncing the evils of superstition and priestcraft, and doing justice to the noble Infidel patriots who founded the republic.

To whom are we indebted for this model republic of the world and its Liberal institutions? To the Infidel patriots, Paine, Jefferson, and Franklin.

It was the pen of Thomas Paine that first wrote "The free and independent states of America." The writer of "The Age of Reason" was the "author-hero" of the Revolution. Being dead, he yet speaketh, and to-day is doing wondrous work for liberty, for humanity; inducing honest, intelligent men and women to abandon superstition and priestcraft, and learn to do justice, love mercy, and endeavor to make their fellow-creatures happy.

Infidelity gave us the Declaration of Independence, a government without a church, and a constitution without a God.

Christians raise a great outcry that Infidels tear down and destroy. Yes, they hav torn down monarchy and enthroned liberty; while Christianity has strewn the fair fields of earth with the wrecks of armies and the bones of murdered millions, making our beautiful earth one vast charnel house, drenched with blood and tears. Infidelity has been the advocate of science, the preserver of art, and the guardian of the ark of freedom.

We would not detract from the good that has been or is being done by Christians. We know there are thousands of noble, benevolent men and pure, generous, gentle-hearted women who are sincere in their belief, and are really inspired to a spirit of sacrifice by their faith.

There is an earnest desire in the human mind to attain to a higher, better, nobler life. Men and women hav aspirations for good, and the church seems to them the most available means of attaining their desires.

We are asked, Why has Christianity continued to exist and increase, if not of divine origin? The reason is evident. Because of the elasticity of Christianity. It stretches to meet the advanced education and scientific discoveries of the day.

Is there any comparison between the Christian rules of faith and practice to-day and those of the Pilgrim fathers? Would Henry Ward Beecher hav been recognized as a pastor by the old Puritans, the founders of his church? Would he or any other orthodox minister hav dared to indorse evolution twenty-five years ago, or to declare the creation was not accomplished in six literal days, or that hell-fire was a fable?

Christianity has stretched and widened till most of its dogmas are so thin they are one after another bursting and vanishing away. The church has done its very utmost to beat back the resistless waves of truth, science, and common sense. To save its existence it has slowly, reluctantly expanded.

The Christianity of to-day retains but one idea, to which weak human nature clings—a scapegoat on whom to lay the blame of all wrong-doing, and a savior to pay the penalty.

How hav the best of Christians died? We are told, "Ah, you may rail and scoff at Christianity now, but how will it be in the dread hour of death? How can you die? Oh, the horror of despair, the agony of terror of those who die without a faith in Christ! Oh, turn to Jesus, learn of him, that you may die calmly, peacefully, sustained in the dread hour by trust and faith in the blessed savior!"

We admit Christ had ten-thousand-fold more reason for faith and trust in God than all others that ever lived or died. We turn to Matthew xxvi and read of Christ at the time when his death drew nigh: "Then saith he unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here, and watch with me. And he went a little further and fell on his face and prayed, O my father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me" (Matt. xxvi, 38, 39). Luke informs us: "And being in great agony he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground" (Luke xxii, 44).

Yet Christ himself declared: "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but hav eternal life" (John iii, 14, 15). "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This he said, signifying what death he should die" (John xii, 32, 33).

About to die, to save not a few dear loved ones, not alone his whole race, but millions yet unborn. By dying he would redeem myriads from the eternal tortures of hell, and insure them life, life, eternal life, in joy, peace, and happiness supreme. About to die, and by his death reconcile his father God to a sin-cursed world—about to die, and by his death found a religion that should giv courage, hope, and comfort to the poor, the sorrowing, the afflicted, for all time to come. And, with such great, glorious consequences assured to follow, this perfect Christ, this gentle, pitying savior, prays with all the impassioned joy of his soul to speed the glorious consummation? No!—but prays he may be spared, that the cup may pass from him—knowing that if it did all mankind would be forever lost.

Not once, or twice, but thrice: "O father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." He knew that his death would be but a form, a farce, a mockery, a sham—for in three days (according to the gospels within thirty-six hours) he would be restored to life and immortality; that his death by crucifixion would be quicker, attended with less suffering than any similar death before that. Yet the New Testament declares we are asked to believe that this God prayed in such agony of terror and abject fear that he sweat drops of blood, entreating that the cup might pass from him, his life be spared, and untold millions be forever lost. This is in harmony with our histories of gods. We hav too high opinion of humanity to believe mortal man could ever so hav acted.

But, according to the New Testament, did Christ himself die calmly, peacefully, sustained by faith and hope in the promised glorious immortality? Come to Golgotha! Come to the much-vaunted cross of Calvary, and see a true Christian die; see him stretched upon the cross; hark to his song of joy. Does he die sustained by faith in God? Does he calmly and sweetly fall asleep rejoicing in the great hope of heaven and the resurrection? Christian friends tell us of the horror and terror of dying without hope in Christ, without faith in the Bible and God. Here is the first, the chief, the best of all Christians about to die. Talk of the agony of despair, of writhing in anguish, of shrieking in abject terror! No words conceivable can more express it than the dying wail of terror and despair that came from the lips of Christ upon the cross: "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?"—"My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Matt. xxvii, 46).

WHY PEOPLE ARE CHARITABLE.

We are glad the majority of Christians are better than their creeds. We honor them for their noble efforts in the cause of charity. We heartily appreciate and rejoice at every effort to relieve suffering humanity. We are glad that there are Christian hospitals, orphan asylums, homes for the indigent. But Christians must admit it is neither just nor honest to claim these institutions as the outgrowth of, or that they originated with, any more than that they are sustained alone by, Christians. To the pagans of Greece and Rome, the Buddhists of India, the heathen Chinese, belongs the honor of originating such institutions. Not to Christians, but to Mohammedans, are we indebted for asylums for the insane.

Men and women are not charitable because they are Christians, but because they hav large benevolence and humanity. Among the desperate miners of the mountains, the reckless cowboys of the plains, in the gambling hell, the gin-mill, the dance-house, the miserable brothel, in the very lowest haunts of vice, the cry of real distress will meet more prompt, free, generous relief than in the most fashionable of churches.

Sickness, sorrow, suffering, appeal to our humanity; our hearts respond, and not our creeds. Liberals do good from love of their fellow-creatures, not from fear of hell or hope of heaven.

If Christianity is all of excellence and virtue, is it not singular that it has produced more intolerance, persecution, bloodshed, and death than all other religions the world has ever known?

CHRIST NEVER GAVE ANY NEW PRINCIPLES OF MORALITY.

Is it just to claim for Jesus originality for precepts that were taught centuries before he came into the world? Should he be credited with divine wisdom because he repeated, echoed the sayings of Zoroaster, Buddha, Christna, Confucius, Pythagoras, Socrates, and Plato?

Asked which is the first commandment, Christ repeats words of Deut. vi, 4, 5, and Lev. xix, 18. He declares no jot or tittle of the law shall be altered till heaven and earth pass away (Matt. v, 17, 18). When asked by the learned lawyer: "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" he announced no new law or precept, but asked: "What is written in the law? How readest thou?" And when the lawyer repeats the very words Christ had used on a former occasion (Mark xii, 29, 31), quoting from Deuteronomy and Leviticus, Christ replied: "Thou hast answered right; this do, and thou shalt liv" (Luke x, 25, 28). The much-vaunted Golden Rule Christ does not claim as originating with himself, but, on the contrary, refers to its previous existence: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets" (Matt. vii, 12).

JOINING ISSUE—INFIDEL ETHICS.

Christians and Infidels agree we all should love one another; now comes the issue. Which is the best, the most consistent, rational, and practical method of living out this law. Christ teaches:

"Love your enemies, do good to them which hate you, bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you. And unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other; and him that taketh away thy cloak forbid not to take thy coat also. Giv to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again" (Luke vi, 27-30).

But if we do this we shall not be either Godlike or Christlike. Nahum tells us:

"God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth; the Lord revengeth and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies" (Nahum i, 2).

Christ admits he will fail to liv up to his own teaching:

"But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me" (Luke xix, 27).

"When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that obey not the gospel" (2 Thes. i, 7, 8).

Suppose the New Testament were now for the first time offered to the world and declared to be the inspired word of God. Judging from the teachings of Christ, could any sane person believe for one moment he was divinely inspired? Would not every intelligent person treat with deserved contempt the assertion that the New Testament is the transcript of the divine mind? Compare Luke vi, 27-30, with the precepts of that true humanitarian, Thomas Paine: "Do justice, love mercy, and endeavor to make your fellow-creatures happy."

APPLICATION OF INFIDEL ETHICS TO THE POOR.

You are poor; you see those around you rich. They revel in abundance, while you are desperately fighting the fierce wolf, starvation, from your door, and oft are worsted in the struggle. Christ teaches you to make no effort to help or provide. "Take no thought of to-morrow, what you shall eat or drink, or wherewithal you shall be clothed" (Matt. vi, 31). But rail against the rich as he does: "But woe unto you that are rich, for ye hav received your consolation" (Luke vi, 24).

Christ positivly declares the rich are shut out from heaven. Although from youth to old age they hav kept every precept of the moral law, unless they sell all they hav and giv to the poor, they cannot be his disciples or hope for heaven (Matt. xix, 16-24).

Christ more fully impresses this in the story of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi, 19-24). There is no wrong or evil charged against the rich man, only that he was rich, and so was sent to hell. There is no good or virtue credited to Lazarus, only he was a beggar "full of sores." This was his sole claim and title to heaven. But that this was all-sufficient is confirmed by Christ: "Blessed be ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of heaven" (Luke vi, 20). This discourages all thrift, energy, industry, and enterprise, and devotes to hell's eternal flames, not alone wealthy Infidels like Girard, Lick, Brigham, Redmon, Maclure, Owen, Peter Cooper, and others who hav given their hundreds of thousands of dollars for charitable purposes, but Peabody and all the noble Christian philanthropists who failed to sell all they had and giv to the poor. No matter how virtuous their lives, Infidel and Christian alike, if they died rich they died damned.

While Christ thus denounces all enterprise, and offers premiums to sloth, mendacity, and tramps, Thomas Paine givs us the better counsel, "Do justly, love mercy, and endeavor to make your fellow-creatures happy." Which is the more consistent, the more likely to advance the best interests and welfare of mankind? What benefit is the teaching of Christ to the poor man? Will railing against your rich neighbor, rejoicing that he is doomed to hell, make you any happier or better off?

Liberalism teaches you, Do justice, recognize the good, respect his ability, emulate his energy. In justice to those dependent on you, seek out the cause of your poverty, and strive to remedy it. If from fault or lack of early education, or bodily defect, the cause of your failure to make success in life is beyond repair, never add to your troubles by filling your heart with envy, spite, and jealousy. Rather rejoice that they are not as unfortunate as yourself; and in mercy, in justice to your children, studiously endeavor to save them from the defeats and bad habits that hav marred your fortunes. In mercy to yourself, make the best of your condition. There must always be differences in the circumstances of men. It is not always the diamond-studded shirt-front that covers the happiest heart; not every form inclosed in a sealskin sacque is free from sorrow, misery, and pain.

THE RICH.

Rich man! look not down in scorn upon the poor; man is not less a man because he lacks wealth. If you hav will, ability, industry; if you hav trained yourself to habits of thrift, shrewdness, and economy, and so secured a competency, in justice and mercy toward those who hav struggled, perhaps harder than yourself, but failed, try to make their lot easier and happier. In rejoicing at your success, be merciful, and aid and help the less fortunate. You spend immense sums in search of pleasure, oft only to meet satiety, disappointment, and ennui. But the pleasure and delight of helping the needy, of relieving the sufferings of the unfortunate, of bringing hope to the despairing, exceeds all other pleasures wealth can purchase. Do not do as Christ teaches, giv to all that ask. This would only encourage idleness and mendacity. But find employment, help to better educate, and try to inspire a spirit of independence, industry, and economy.

RIVALS IN BUSINESS.

Liv up to the precepts of Liberalism—even with your rival in business. Why not? Railing against him to every friend and customer only disgusts them, degrades yourself, and destroys your influence. Giv your rival credit for all the good he has, and pass in silence his shortcomings.

You may by opposition destroy his business—and your own—if your purse or credit is the greater; you may work under price and so undersell him as to utterly ruin him. But when you hav done this, when his wife and children are reduced to suffering and want, will your sleep be more sweet, your spirits lighter, your heart gayer and happier, because you hav imitated the Christians' God and proved yourself jealous, visiting the sins of the father upon the innocent children? This may do for Christianity—it is not Liberalism. Remember you hav no Jesus to pay it all—all the debt you owe; no Christ to wipe out all your mean, cruel acts, no savior to pay the penalty for you—you must answer for your own conduct to the tribunal of your own sense of right, truth, and honesty.

If your rival does you wrong, if he claims it was unintentional, or under wrong impressions, freely forgiv. But if he persists in his wrong, do not follow the advice of Christ: "Then came Peter to him, and said, Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgiv him? till seven times? Jesus saith unto him, I say not unto thee, Until seven times: but until seventy times seven" (Matt. xviii, 21, 22).

That is about 487 times too much of a good thing, and would be to encourage evil. Take the better, more consistent course. Do justly, but let justice be tempered with mercy.

In the language of the revered and lamented founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, D. M. Bennett: "Let justice and right be the standard by which we govern our actions, and never forget that the grandest thing a man can perform is to do what is right under all circumstances."

Deal gently with the erring. Do justice, love mercy, and endeavor to make your fellow-creatures happy, even though they injure you by their crimes.

Do not, as Christ advises, if one steals your cloak, giv him your coat also, or, if some rascal strike you on one cheek, offer him the other. To encourage thieves and bullies is neither just, merciful, nor likely to promote the happiness of our fellow-creatures.

Liberalism is not license; it neither encourages nor palliates wrong. To do evil is to violate the first principle of Liberalism, which teaches, "Do justly." But let justice be tempered with mercy. We cannot but be grieved at wrong-doing; our duty to self and to society demands that criminals shall be punished. But in that punishment

LIBERALISM SEEKS REFORMATION, NOT VENGEANCE.

If by stooping we can lift them up to something like moral dignity, if we can inspire them with hope, and desire for reformation, and do not do so, we are false to every principle of Liberalism, false to humanity, false to ourselvs.

We may look with scorn upon the fallen, but ah! we know not how strong the temptation that beset them, know not how bravely and long they struggled and resisted, how fierce the battle ere they fell. We know not how temptation threw dust in the eyes of their judgment and palmed upon them a few gold-washed trinkets of pleasure for the genuin jewels of happiness; how, in an unguarded moment, temptation got the under hold, and they fell. We don't know how bruised and sore and miserable they feel, how keenly they suffer from the pangs of self-reproach; we may well spare them ours. Stained with crime though they may be, yet, if only washed with the tears of repentance, wiped with the towel of reformation, and brightened with the polish of kindly sympathy, they may become clean, useful members of society, and faithful sympathetic workers for fallen humanity. They hav but fallen where we perhaps oft hav stumbled.

HOW TO REPROVE.

Reprove, if obliged to do so, but fail not to remember mercy. Reprove with remembrance of our own weakness and liability to err; not denounce just for the sake of ventilating our pious indignation, nor upbraid to show our own immaculate virtue and sanctity. Ever remember, as is so beautifully expressed by that true-hearted poet and genuin Liberal, J. M. Thayer, of Rochester,

"The rock 'gainst which the driving storm
And with'ring siroc' vent their hate,
Though rugged in its outward form,
And moss-grown in its rude estate,
May still contain a gushing tide
Within its bosom deep concealed,
Whose limpid beauties softly glide,
Exhaustless, pure, and uncongealed.

The flower o'er which the fitful blast
Hath swept too rudely on its way,
May fold its leaves and droop at last,
And all-forgotten pass away.
And yet that fallen, fading flower,
Whose beauties feast the eager worm,
That victim of an adverse hour,
May still embrace a deathless germ."

ADJUSTING DIFFERENCES OF OPINION.

Do justly, love mercy, and endeavor to make your fellow-creatures happy, although they differ with you in belief, of all things perhaps the hardest to do. But if persons differ with you, clubbing them will not help the matter; for no person was ever yet clubbed out of one opinion into another that was worth ten per cent on the first cost of the club. The genuin Liberal, when opportunity presents itself, will lay aside the pet hobby or ism, and write and work earnestly for the greatest good to the greatest number. Why should not Liberals of all shades of opinion unite in the great and noble work of disenthralment of honest hearts from the meshes of superstition and the power of priestcraft, and unite in educating the children in the ennobling truths of science, in cultivating love of nature and the study of her laws? Oh, the joy on earth that would result if the precepts of Liberalism were substituted for those of Christianity, and by all practiced! Oh, think of each human being, realizing human frailty and human weakness, yet ever doing justice, loving mercy, and honestly striving to make all around them happy. It would make a heaven of earth, an Eden paradise of every home.

WHAT LIBERALISM OFFERS IN LIEU OF CHRISTIANITY.

We are often defiantly asked by Christians, What can Liberalism offer in exchange for faith in the Bible, and hope in Christ? We answer, a life of love, instead of mere profession of faith; the study of science, instead of creeds and catechisms; knowledge of nature's laws, in lieu of church disciplins; doing good from love of humanity, not fear of a vindictiv deity; the practice of benevolence and virtue from love of purity and truth, not from fear of hell's eternal burnings; and at last a peaceful death, cheered by the best and truest comfort, the conviction we hav not lived in vain. In the language of the poet Smales:

"We are weary of fast and prayer,
Weary of priest and creed,
Weary of fagot, rack, and prayer,
And terrors the churches breed.
Let us rise to a nobler faith,
A faith in humanity's claims;
Rise from the depths of a selfish fear,
To wider and purer aims."

Mr. Reynolds spoke for nearly two hours, yet the interest and attention of the audience never flagged. He was constantly applauded, and at times provoked shouts of laughter by his comical descriptions, and again moved to tears by his pathos. As he concluded long continued applause testified the appreciation of the audience.

Mr. Reynolds proposes to continue in the lecture field, and those desiring to secure his services should address him at Rochester. He is the authorized agent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to receive subscriptions, advertisments, etc., and will always, at every place he may lecture, hav a good supply of the best and latest Liberal books and pamphlets.

LAST DAY'S SESSIONS.

Sunday, Dec. 30, 1883.—Yesterday the weather was clear, cold, and bright; this morning it pours of rain; the slush is ankle deep. Yet the jolly, happy Freethinkers' example of making the best of things is followed by the people at large, and there is a very large attendance. The first speaker was Mrs. H. T. Stearns, of Buffalo. This lady has an easy, graceful delivery, and held the strict attention of her audience.

After music by the choir, the president introduced the Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Pennsylvania, who delivered his great lecture on, "The Model Saints of the Old Testament" (as recerded in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews). At the conclusion of the lecture Mr. Bradford announced that his lecture was already in type; that five hundred copies were for general circulation, free to all who would hand him their address.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

J. H. Burnham, although suffering from severe indisposition, delivered a most able and eloquent discourse, after which the very deservedly popular orator, John E. Remsburg, of Texas, delivered an improved version of his great lecture, "False Claims," which has called forth such glowing encomiums from all Liberals, from Texas to New York. Many of the friends who were present at the Rochester Convention, and others who had read his lecture on "False Claims" as published, supposed he had attained the highest point of excellence and could neither add nor subtract from that masterpiece without weaking its force and marring its perfection. But all were delightedly disappointed, for Mr. Remsburg proved himself in verity a progressiv Liberal. He added, without omitting any of the telling and important facts, much new matter of equal pungency and truth. He was most enthusiastically applauded throughout.

EVENING.—CLOSING SESSION.

Despite the continued down-pouring of the rain, the people poured into the Opera House to attend the closing session of this most instructiv and harmonious of conventions.

The genial president, in his most dignified and solemn mien, introduced the distinguished scholar, lawyer, orator, and model Liberal, T. B. Wakeman, of New York, who announced as the subject of his address, "The Age of Readjustment." The storm raging without would help to appreciate the question. He said:

Did you ever stand by the banks of a river, just after a long rain storm, and see the tremendous freshet rushing past at your feet? Such a picture is a simile that will help you to realize where you now stand in the world's progress. The river of time is swelling like the rivers on the continent, great bodies of ice broken up and swept away by the mighty, resistless force of the impetuous current. So the great interests in the world of religion, government, politics, and industries are by the rushing river of scientific discovery being swept onward. And the great advance movements of the world remind us we are unconsciously drawn into its vortex, becoming part of its momentum, and it requires foresight and appreciation of future events to know what part to play, ere the end comes.

All literature teems with the mighty impending changes, and urges the necessity of wisdom in the readjustment. In the January number of the North American Review, we find an article from the Rev. J. H. Rylance, of New York, pastor of St. Mark's church, on the subject of "Theological Adjustment," which suggested the title I hav chosen, "Age of Readjustment." When readjustment is called for in theology, because the great river of time rushes onward so fiercely, the champions of the church ask in trembling, "What shall I do to be saved?" Let me read a few passages which this watchman on Zion's tower givs us: "The church itself must save itself by a flank movement; no man now believes the Bible account of creation; the myths and fallacies of the church of old are passed away, never to be imposed again." "Modern science must be left free to formulate results." [The lecturer read at some length from the article referred to.]

The church accepts in submission such admissions, and asks with fear and anxiety the question, Who is to be the future master?

We can no longer run religion, politics, or education on the old Christian church dogmas. The change of base is inevitable; prudent men will readjust themselvs and existing institutions, and the education of the young to the new state of the world, which the rushing stream of time is throwing on us. Read the admissions in this article of a distinguished clergyman, and learn what we are coming to, if this is a clergyman's opinion of his own creed, and you will realize the need of a readjustment.

Twenty-five years ago I had a case in the district court before an aged jurist of Teutonic extraction on the bench. At the trial the evidence turned out to be very different to what was supposed, or that the pleadings were prepared to cover. My adversary insisted the case be dismissed, while I insisted the pleadings be amended. Judge was much confused; he desired to do justice according to law, so adjourned the case for consideration. On returning to court the judge decided our pleadings were merely notions we had got in our heads. We could not alter facts. The pleadings must be readjusted to meet the facts.

Waifs and Wanderings.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

CHAPTER II.

THE REV. GEORGE ADOLPHUS HAPGOOD.

The Rev. George Adolphus Hapgood was a young man of brilliant prospects. He was guided in life by three grand principles: First, to wear unspotted linen; second, to have his boots well polished; third, to do just as people expected him to do. By strict adherence to these principles he was assured of eminent success. His habits were unexceptionable, especially his broadcloth coat, cut in the latest style, and fitted by the best of tailors. Not a spot of dust ever appeared on his unruffled bosom; his feet were well shod and glittering. He did not live on faith, but beefsteak. His complexion was fresh, and his teeth white, and always on exhibition. His hair was combed into unvarying picturesque confusion. Its disorder never transgressed a fixed arrangement. Its most eccentric sweep was duly calculated upon before the mirror. His presence was continuously dignified. It was perfectly artistic; there were no breaks of nature, not even when he was asleep. He did not even snore. He was self-conscious in his profoundest slumbers. He might be caught napping, but never off guard. His smile was permanent, and only now and then rippled into laughter; and the laughter never went beyond certain bounds. Its wildest outbursts were foreordained. He was, in fact, a ministerial signboard, gorgeously painted, and always pointing in the right direction, from sheer inability to point otherwise, after having been set up. He was no hypocrite; but simply a commodity of goodishness, right side up with care, and ready to be sold to the highest bidder. His sermons were culled from the choicest treasures of pulpit oratory; and he could go from borrowed excellence to his native dullness with such graceful declension, and up again with such wary flights, that the beginning and ending of his stolen sweets, were lost in his cloudy rhetoric. There was a sense of quotation, while at the same time he managed to give the impression of originality. His discourses were indeed a marvel of patchwork; a mosaic of plagiarism, that dazzled one into thinking that it might be his own after all. He kept himself posted as to the spiritual wants of his congregation, and selected from the most adequate, if not orthodox, sources. He was quite splendid in society; knew how to draw people out concerning their petty affairs; kept his own shallowness to himself; seldom ventured an original remark even about the weather; and so his career opened with magnificent promise. There was no position to which he might not aspire. He kept the pews full and the taxes low. Some had a dim idea that he was a saint; but it was universally declared that he was the pink of perfection.

Cupples made his call early; but the Rev. Adolphus fronted him in perfect array. The haggard appearance of his parishioner betokened a funeral, and Adolphus was on the point of selecting a text, "All flesh is grass." He smiled a little when Cupples told his night's experience, and put the text aside for future use. It was a handy text and he knew just how to develop it, especially to the hymn,

"Hark from the tomb a doleful sound."

At the same time he did not believe that his own flesh was grass, or hay, wood, or stubble, but fine gold, and entirely unfit for worms In fact, he would like to go to heaven like the prophet, in a chariot of fire, provided he had time to dress for the occasion. But death was something that he thought of only for rhetorical flourish. He was quite "happy" at funerals, and the mourners always looked back to the ceremony with delight. To hear such a sermon over their own body, how willingly they would die—for an hour or two. Next to being flattered ourselves, we like to have our dead friends flattered; though the probability is that if they were alive, we should be equally pleased to have some eloquent tongue show forth their bad qualities. Death somehow seems to make our friends a personal possession. We have ownership in them, and of course want them crowned and glorified. It's a compliment to ourselves.

"I don't know what to do," said Cupples, with a mournful scratch of his head,

"Heavy and solemn."

"Have you no idea where the baby came from?" asked the Rev. Mr. Hapgood, carefully weighing every word for fear that he might commit himself.

"Not the least," replied Cupples.

"Was there nothing with it?" asked Hapgood, after a profound consideration as to whether such a question would compromise him.

"Only some clothes, a bottle of milk, and a basket."

"Don't you think it may belong to some friend of yours?" said Hapgood, gropingly, not to find out the truth, but what was best for himself to say or do in the circumstances.

"I can't imagine who," said Cupples.

"Do you think it a child of sin?" said Hapgood, just putting a foot into the unknown ocean of surmise.

"Haven't any doubt of it," said Cupples. "It's a perfect devil."

"'Sh," said the reverend adventurer, shuddering back again to firm land, "I didn't mean that exactly. But no matter." After an inward prayer to God, that is, to himself, he continued, "Have you any plans in reference to the child?"

"No."

"Can you not find an asylum for it?"

"I hope so, but I don't know how."

Here was a pause. The Rev. Hapgood was perplexed. He looked at his boots, wherein was the only reflection of which he was capable; adjusted his collar, and swept his hair into a favorite curve, and appeared to be thinking. Of course he was not thinking, for this did not come within the scope of his principles. A minister, according to Hapgood's code, was not expected to think: only to make believe think, and in this he was quite skillful. Fortunately a new idea occurred to Cupples, and he hastened to impart it to the clerical vacuity.

"I wonder if Mrs. Binney wouldn't take it," he burst out. "She is rich; got a big house almost empty; hasn't a chick or child in the wide world. 'Twould do her good. The baby is as handsome as a pictur. Mr. Hapgood."

Mr. Hapgood meditated as if he were solving the problem of the universe. Abstractly considered, it seemed a capital plan. But Hapgood did not care for abstract truth. He merely wanted to know about that which concerned his own welfare. He was interested in gravitation only so far as it dropped the apple into his own pocket. He had not the slightest wish to find out that the moon obeyed the same law, much less that the Pleiades and Orion did so. He only recognized Arcturus as it gave an additional glimmer to his boots, and for that the gaslight was preferable. It was not Mrs. Binney's good that he sought, but what she might expect him to do. So he was prepared neither to second nor to oppose Cupples's suggestion.

"Perhaps so," he confusedly murmured. "We cannot always tell. Had not you better see her?"

"Will you give me a note to help the matter along?" asked Cupples.

Here was another rock for the reverend mariner to avoid. What would Mrs. Binney think? He determined to be upon the safe side.

"You had better see Mrs. Binney and talk the matter over with her. We will trust to her generosity. I am sure she will help you if it lies within her power. Speak to her in your own way; I will call upon her this afternoon."

The Rev. Hapgood didn't promise to do anything more than call, and he didn't mean to do anything more. Cupples thought he did, however, and was grateful. Was it Hapgood's fault if Cupples misunderstood him?

Cupples took his hat and started for the door. Now that Hapgood was sure his parishioner was going, and would lay no more snares for his shining feet, he grasped him heartily by the hand and poured forth a flood of fine sentiments which quite impressed Cupples and made him feel that Hapgood was one of the noblest of men.

"I am glad the baby has fallen into such good hands, Mr. Cupples; I am sure you will care for it most tenderly and find a home for the poor orphan. Your heart beats for the right and true, and providence has sent the child that you might exhibit your benevolence. Good-bye; and success to your philanthropic enterprise. May its children's children rise up and call you blessed."

It is evident that Hapgood didn't steal that speech.

He came off with flying colors. He had done what Cupples had expected him to do; and yet he had done nothing; and there was no danger of offending anybody. So far as he was concerned, the baby might starve to death. His linen was clean, his boots bright, and no more was expected, and no more would he do. With this comfortable conviction, or rather conclusion—for he was hardly capable of conviction, even of sin—he sat down to cull some fine passages for his next Sunday's sermon. Its subject was "Everlasting Punishment;" and he took the safe position of damning everybody except himself and those who helped to giv him his comfortable position in life.

Mind and Matter Again.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The possibility of the manifestation of what is called mind always existed in all forms of matter, else there could never hav been those manifestations; it only required time for those possibilities to develop themselvs. The germs of thought were co-existent with matter, but, being so much more refined than matter, must throw from themselvs the crude properties of matter before mind, as a resultant, could so perfect itself as to become what is called mind, and manifest itself as such. It is as the smoke that rises from the consumption of fuel, it is neither the fuel nor the fire, but the result of the one consuming the other. And though mind is something besides smoke, it can no more exist independent of matter than can smoke aside from the consumption of fuel, and when the fuel is consumed the fire goes out and the smoke ceases. So when the electrical chemical forces are exhausted in a human system (fuel) the fire of magnetism expires, and the mind ceases to rise, or has no longer any activities, because there is no electrical, magnetic, chemical organization to generate it. But all those activities of mind in their results remain in the universe as past effects and present and future causes for continuous developments of good or evil.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

Paul at Rome.

Our apostle is now on his way from Pontioli, or Diccarchia, to Rome, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles by land.

"And the brethren there hearing of our approach, came out to meet us as far as the village called Appii Forum, and as far as the Three Taverns" (xxviii, 15).

Appii Forum was forty-three miles from Rome, and the Three Taverns thirty-three miles.

"And when Paul saw them he gave thanks to God and was encouraged. And he went on to Rome. And the centurion allowed Paul to reside where he pleased with a soldier who guarded him" (16).

King James's version reads: "The centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard; but Paul was suffered to dwell" etc. But these italicized words are not found in the oldest codices, and are omitted in the Revision.

"And after three days Paul sent and called for the principal Jews. And when they were assembled he said to them: Men, my brethren, although I had in nothing risen up against the people or the law of my fathers, I was, at Jerusalem, delivered over in bonds to the Romans. And they, when they had examined me, were disposed to release me, because they found in me no offense deserving death. And as the Jews withstood me, I was compelled to utter an appeal to Cæsar; but not because I had anything of which to accuse the people of my nation. For this reason I sent for you to come, that I might see you, and might state these things to you; for it is on account of the hope of Israel that I am bound with this chain. They said to him: We hav received no epistle from Judea against thee; and none of the brethren who hav come from Jerusalem hav told us any evil thing of thee. But we are desireus to hear from thee what thou thinkest; for this doctrin, we know, is not received by any one" (17–22).

Mark the words we hav italicized and then the corresponding words of the Greek codices, translated thus: "For as concerning this sect, we know that everywhere it is spoken against." The Greek scribe thought it was too humiliating a confession to say, "This doctrin is not received by any one" in the city of Rome; it would be a bar to the claim set up as early as the time of Irenæus (A.D. 190) that Simon Kepha, alias St. Peter, was bishop of Rome from the early part of the reign of Claudius to the close of the reign of Nero—i. e., from A.D. 42 or 44 to 66 or 68.

"And they appointed a day; and many assembled and came to him at his lodgings."

Where, oh where, was the church of Rome A.D. 63, when the great apostle to the gentiles found no house of worship open for him, but had to proclaim the gospel at his own lodgings?

The Roman Catholics feel the force of the Protestant argument that Peter was never at Rome, as appears from the following annotations to the English Vulgate New Testament, 1582.

"Greater evidence certes there is thereof, and more weighty testimony than of Romulus, Numa, Cæsar, or Cicero being there. Yet were he a brutish man that would deny this, to the discredit of so many writers and the whole world."

Then after citing several of the fathers to prove that Peter was the first bishop of Rome, how long he lived there, how he died, and where he was buried, the annotator makes a ludicrous attempt to answer what he calls the best argument the Protestants can make, to wit: "If Peter had been at Rome, Paul would hav saluted him, as he did others in the end of his letter to the Romans."

"Is not this a high point to disprove all antiquity by? Any man of discretion may straight see that Peter might be known unto Paul to be out of the city, either for persecution or business, when this epistle was written."

"Or, if Peter happened to be at home, 'The apostle might, for respect of his dignity and other of the church's affairs, write unto him special letters, and so had no cause to salute him in this common epistle.'

"Or how know they that this epistle was not sent inclosed to Peter to be delivered by his means to the whole church of the Romans in some of their assemblies? It is very like it was recommended to some one principal man or other, that is not here named. And twenty causes there may be unknown to us why he saluted him not; but no cause why our adversaries upon such frivolous reasons should reprove an approved truth. For even as well might they say that John was never at Ephesus, because Paul, in his [spurious] epistle to the Ephesians, doth not salute him [nor any one else]. And plain it is that it is the Roman seat and faith of Peter which they, as all Heretics before them, do fear and hate, and which will be their bane; and they know that there is no argument which convinceth in their conscience that Peter was never at Rome."

The above is taken from the notes to Romans xvi. At the end of Acts the writer appends a chronological table to show when Peter was at Rome. In this table the apostle leaveth Jewry A.D. 44, to avoid the fury of Herod. He then appointeth Euodius bishop of Antioch, and passing by Corinth he cometh to Rome to confound Simon Magus. Having founded the church of Rome, he afterward leaveth it for a time to visit other churches, Linus and Cletus being his coadjutors both in his absence and presence. Coming to Jerusalem A.D. 51, he holdeth the first council. Then he returneth to Rome, the Catholic faith by his diligence now made famous through the world. Thence he writeth his first epistle (from Babylon), and finally he is crucified in the fourteenth year of Nero, on the same day that Paul is beheaded. This would be A.D. 67 or 68, but the tabulator puts it A.D. 70, two years after Nero's death!

By this lucid table "the studious reader may discover," says the oracular Catholic scribe, "the folly of the Protestants that can find no time when Peter might possibly come to Rome, be bishop, and die there!"

But to return to Paul.

"And he explained to them respecting the kingdom of God, testifying and persuading them concerning Jesus, out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening" (23).

Yes, indeed, out of the Pentateuch and the prophets Paul found all the facts concerning Jesus; for even in his epistles he tells us little enough of the actual earthly life of his anointed savior.

"And some of them assented to his discourses, and others did not assent. And they went out from him, disagreeing among themselvs. And Paul addressed to them this speech: Well did the Holy Spirit, by the mouth of Isaiah, the prophet, speak concerning your fathers, Go unto this people and say to them, Hearing, ye will hear, and will not understand; and ye will see, and will not comprehend. For the heart of this people is made fat, and their hearing they hav made heavy, and their eyes hav they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts and be converted, and I should forgiv them. Therefore be this known to you, that to the gentiles is this redemption of God sent, and they will hear it" (24–28).

That is to say, the gentiles of Rome and Italy hav not yet received the new doctrin, but they will now hear it. And yet the Catholic church claims that Peter had been preaching at Rome about twenty years, and that by his diligence the Roman faith was now made famous through the world!

The next verse, though unimportant, is an acknowledged interpolation:

"And when he had thus said, the Jews retired; and there were great disputations among them" (29).

It is omitted in the revised New Testament, not being found in any of the early MSS.

"And Paul hired a house, at his own cost, and resided in it two years; and there he received all that came to him. And he preached concerning the kingdom of God, and taught boldly concerning the Lord Jesus Messiah without hindrance" (30, 31).

This abrupt termination of the book has grieved many a devout Christian, who would hav given his life to know how Paul ended his days. But the "Man of Sin" has a wicked suspicion that St. Luke, or whoever was the inspired writer of Acts, added something which, for cogent reasons, the early Catholic fathers cut off. For those crafty ecclesiastics knew that a canonical disclosure of the fact that Paul went to Rome in the reign of Augustus Cæsar would play the mischief with historical Christianity.

Mr. Walker's Command of Language.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In your issue of Dec. 22d was an article over the name of E. C. Walker, a gentleman whose contributions to The Truth Seeker I hav often read with interest. Mr. Walker appears to possess the faculty of putting words together in a manner to express his meaning more clearly than myself and some others of your contributors are able to do. As for myself, I should not like to undertake to discuss with him the point that white was not black, for he having so much better command of language than myself I should be likely to come out only second best in argument, though in point of fact I was right.

In the article referred to Mr. Walker undertakes to criticise an article in The Truth Seeker on the temperance question, by Ellwood Chantler, and belittles that writer in a way that partakes too much of the character of Christian charity, which would hav all to conform to its creed. Had Mr. Walker known the writer of that article, with his honest, upright principles and conscientious convictions to pursue a course to do what he can for the welfare of humanity, I am sure Mr. Walker, like myself, could not help but admire his spirit of humanity and allow him the right to think for himself, although their views upon the temperance question might differ.

We professing Liberals ought to extend a more Liberal charity towards Liberals—and others, too—than is often the case. With regard to anti-prohibition Mr. Walker can find arguments that appear reasonable. The Prohibitionists can also find arguments that appear reasonable and very weighty. A few years ago I was on Mr. Walker's side of the question, and now, though not a red-hot Prohibitionist, I am on that side, and hav had good reason for changing; the move is, in my opinion, in the right direction. Hoping my friend, Mr. Walker, will read this in the spirit in which it was written, I am sure there will be no offense taken.

The Chantler brothers are farmers. I hav known them from infancy; they are good examples of honesty and sobriety. John Ray.

Liberty and Prohibition.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Brother E. C. Walker has seen fit, in an article lately published in your paper, to apply these expressions to me personally: "illogical remark;" "ungenerous flings;" "reckless and cruel charges;" and, to cap the climax of my iniquity, he says I am unjust to my "fellow Liberals."

Of what awful thing am I guilty, which has so wrought up our friend and excited his indignation? This: I took exception to the seventh plank of the League congress, which, I hold, misrepresents thousands of Liberals by saying "Temperance (prohibition) laws" are insulting restrictions of personal liberty. I deny it.

I regretted that the League is made "directly or indirectly" the tool of the rumselling power.

This is the sum and substance of my offending. For saying this I am pelted with epithets, which go further with some people than arguments.

In the meekness of a lamb may I be permitted to gently remark, in the presence of my furious assailant, that I had not the most distant thought of doing injustice to my fellow Liberals. I did think, when reading that seventh plank, that the injustice was done by the Liberal League Congress to every "temperance (prohibition)" Liberal man and woman in the land. And I still think so. I hav nothing to take back. Its passage was a burning shame and an open disgrace to the cause of Liberalism in this country. It may be "cruel" and "wicked" and "ungenerous" and "reckless" in me to dissent from that seventh plank; but it was sevenfold all these for that congress to pass that seventh disgrace.

It may be, too, that the men and women who passed it are as strictly temperate as I "dare be." If they are, they hav a queer way of showing it.

The Christian church, which passed resolutions forty years ago against the abolitionists, just as the League has against the prohibitionists, has been busy ever since in trying to show that it was always the friend of the slave, and only condemned the abolitionists because of their "cruel charges," and who, in a "reckless" manner, made the "illogical and wicked charges" that the churches, which sang songs in favor of Puritan liberty, at the self-same time made themselvs tools, "directly and indirectly," of the slave power. What did it matter that the church north declared, over and over, that it was as much the friend of freedom as abolitionists dare be?

If the Christian church committed a grievous mistake, or, rather, crime, on the slavery question, the Liberal League Congress has committed a mistake no less serious. Whatever blunders the Liberal League may hav made in the past, this is the greatest of all. In my judgment it has set Liberalism back many years. It is a terrible scourge which the League has put into the hands of the church.

All the articles which I hav ever read against prohibition, and I hav read all I could obtain, seem stuffed with sophisms in the name of "personal liberty." Prohibition is no more a contradiction of personal liberty than was abolition. If I am illogical, let us hav the proof, and not mere assertion.

Here is a statement that I did not expect friend Walker to make against me, namely, that my charge that the League made itself a tool of the rum-selling power is wholly without foundation, and that I "well know it." Has it come to this, that the only way to meet an opponent is to accuse him of knavery? He asserts that a "large proportion of the men and women who voted for that resolution hav no more connection with the 'rum-power' than has W. F. Jamieson." Who said they had? The same thing was true of the ministers and bishops of the church north when they voted against the abolitionists in relation to slavery. Considering the stress Brother Walker lays upon "logic," I should think he would see, without having it pointed out to him, that persons may be made tools without being conspirators. Every day honest people are made tools of treacherous sharpers. I hav nowhere accused the men and women who voted for that black spot on the Liberal League of any criminal intent. Doubtless, as he says, "a large proportion of them are as strict temperance men and women, both in theory and practice, as he dare be." Who said they were not? Friend Walker always appears to be unduly sensitiv on this point, and frequently resents an accusation against his temperance principles which his opponent has not made. He appears to imagin that because he, a strict temperance man, flies to the aid of free drinking, on the slightest provocation, people will suspect that he is a free drinker himself. I think that is not the point. I did not raise it. Why should he? I understand the sense in which so many persons claim to be "strictly temperate." Every moderate drinker of alcoholic beverages can claim to be a temperance man or woman. Now, I look upon such temperance people as already on the road to the drunkard's grave. There is no safety for mankind in general from the enslaving power of strong drink except in total abstinence from all intoxicating drink, in sickness and in health. Ingersoll calls this "intemperate temperance." So be it. But of this I am fully satisfied—that we will never, never hav "liberty for man, woman, and child" until the principle he condemns is practiced by the human race. He might talk a thousand years about liberty, and let rum run free, which freedom he favors, and victims of the slavish vice will make millions mourn.

I am aware that the opponents of prohibition honestly believe that to prohibit rum-selling is an invasion of personal liberty, human rights. On this I am ready to make a square issue in both oral and written debate.

Mr. Walker says, "W. F. Jamieson is equally illogical with Abbot, Underwood, Bundy, Comstock & Co." Can he not see the difference between freedom of opinion and unrestrained action? Does it logically follow, because I am heartily in favor of the right of the people to promulgate even wrong opinions, that I am equally in favor of wrong conduct? Is this a specimen of friend Walker's logic? This is the logic of the pulpit. It is the subtil sophism of which the Spanish inquisitors were guilty—confounding false opinions with wicked conduct. I am perfectly willing that pagan, Jew, Catholic should entertain whatever opinions he selects, but if any of his opinions carried into action would rob me of my farm (if I had one), there is no Liberal who would not object, and would compel him by law to drop it.

There are no anti-prohibitionists, I believe, that dare intimate that the business of rum-selling is not a nefarious traffic. Because I say that "Liberty is Virtue's mother," I was not aware that I stood committed, logically, to the notion that Rum is the daughter of Liberty!

In this discussion, if my opponents will adhere to the strict canons of logic, it will be shown that in opposing "prohibitory (temperance) laws," they logically oppose the science of law itself, upset all government, and introduce universal anarchy.

The Sabbath-Breaking Cat.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: About half a century ago in this state the pious people wanted, as they now do, a special act passed that would make it a crime to travel on Sunday, except to one of their churches. Accordingly a so-called pious line of stages was projected and, I think, started. I am unable to say positivly, but presume the seats—and probably the whole vehicle—were to hav been consecrated and blest. What they would hav done, given the power, was demonstrated in Connecticut a short time ago.

To show up the hypocrisy and sham piety of the scheme, the following satirical lines were written. If you think them deserving a reprint, we will see them in The Truth Seeker. I regret that the author was too modest to giv his name or initials.

Syracuse, N. Y. J. Van Denburgh.

THE SABBATH-BREAKING CAT.

There was a Presbyterian cat—a cat of high renown—
Who took a route one Sabbath day and wandered through the town;
When lo! within her reach she spied a rat upon the wall.
She caught it at a single bound, which made the poor thing squall;
She hugged it in a wanton mood, and squeezed it with her paws;
At length she shed its precious blood with her long piercing claws.
Then, sporting with her favorit prey, she took it in her mouth,
And hied her home without delay, to eat it, nothing loth.
"Ye graceless wretch!" auld mammy cries; "What hae ye been about?—
To violate our Sabbath day by your unseemly rout!"
"Lord! mammy, see," says Margery; "she's been at work, I trow!
Upon our holy Sabbath day—see! there's a rat, I vow!"
"Ye graceless wretch!" auld mammy cries; "ye shall be well chastised,
As soon as Monday morn appears, for what ye hae practised."
On Monday morning all arose, poor puss amongst the rest;
The auld man fell upon his knees, and thus his God addressed:
"O Lord, ye know this graceless cat, which we hav raised in awe,
Upon thy Sabbath caught a rat, contrary to thy law.
Forgiv us, Lord, our numerous sins according to thy sense;
Do not impute to our souls this wretched cat's offense.
She has been raised with pious care, and often catechised—
So soon as I hav done my prayer she shall be well chastised."
Poor puss no longer could contain, but rising from her knees,
She thus broke forth, in rustic strain: "Lord, hear me, if you please:
The laws of nature I obey, without the least restraint,
For which alone my master dear is lodging such complaint.
If nature's laws were not designed to regulate our ways,
Why were they impressed on every mind, without respect to days?
If Sabbath days were set apart, reserved as days of rest,
Impress this truth on every heart, and make it manifest.
My master dear, with all his prayer, on Sabbaths doth you seek,
But, rest assured, you're his least care the balance of the week.
He is a Sabbath devotee, with wily airs and tricks,
Who serves the Lord each seventh day to pay the score of six.
Remove, O Lord, that filthy vail which blinds my master's eyes;
Teach him to know—and, knowing, feel—wherein true virtue lies.
'Tis acts alone, and not the day on which the act is done,
That constitute the misery we find beneath the sun."
Not waiting to be bid adieu, she bounded through the door
To seek for game—her favorit sport—and ne'er was heard of more.

Ministerial Salary-Grabbers.

One of New York's senators has distinguished himself by introducing into the Senate of the United States the following bill:

"A bill to increase the salaries and pay of the chaplains in the army:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representativs of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the salaries of chaplains in the armies of the United States shall, from and after the first day of July, eighteen hundred and eighty-three, be at the rate of one thousand eight hundred dollars per annum, instead of one thousand five hundred dollars, as now provided by section twelve hundred and sixty-one of the Revised Statutes, together with forage for one horse."

Mr. Elbridge G. Lapham is the person ostensibly fathering this measure, but that he is primarily responsible for it there is no reason to believe. Undoubtedly some chaplain affected by it is the real mover, and Mr. Lapham consents to introduce it for the glory of God—and votes for Mr. Lapham when he again runs for office.

The modesty of these chaplains becomes apparent on observing the retroactiv clause that the increase shall date from last July. One would think that the experience of the congressmen who took back pay would hav deterred the chaplains from asking any more than an increase for future services, but discretion, it seems, is not a characteristic of the militant shepherds who pray to the God of battles. They might as well hav asked for back pay for the last six years as for six months, so far as the principle of honesty is concerned, and it would be just as legitimate and constitutional for Deacon Lapham to ask Congress to build them each a hundred-thousand-dollar church as it is to vote money to pay their salaries. Congress has no power to establish religion, but if voting eighteen hundred dollars a year apiece to several hundred preachers, besides keeping a horse for them to ride while better men go afoot, is not establishing religion in the army, then the English language needs revising as badly as did the New Testament. We quite agree with the Sun that this measure of legislation is defectiv in political morality. The support of chaplains in any form is a piece of unconstitutional rascality. The stealing of six months' back pay is a small thing compared to the persistent violation of the fundamental principles of our government.

The "Independent" and the Sunday Question.

Mr. Bowen's paper opposes the opening of art galleries, libraries, museums, and other places of amusement and instruction on Sundays, for the reason that after this "then comes the deluge—factories open, shops open, laborers and clerks enslaved by seven days' work, and the sanitary and social and moral blessings of the seventh day rest, whether you call it Jewish, Christian or Mohammedan, lost." This is unadulterated nonsense. Is the Independent so ignorant as not to know that the day of rest is a custom older than any western religion; that before Christ, and while Moses is said to hav been floundering around in the wilderness, eastern people made one day in seven a holiday? There is no law to prevent employers demanding the services of their workmen on our secular holidays, but they do not, neither would the workmen submit. It is perfectly legitimate for the state to recognize and make legal the weekly rest; what the state should not do is to attempt to interfere with the manner in which the rest-day may be spent. Already the railroad corporations and others demand Sunday service, and the puritan Sunday law is powerless before their wealth. They, however, giv their men a week-day to rest, and this is just the same. Human nature is not strong enough to bear unbroken service. The people would not submit, and however hard Christian skinflints and pious corporation directors might try, they would find themselvs unable to grind any finer the faces of the poor. The law as it now stands is no restriction to capital's demands and no protection to labor's needs. It is useless, superfluous, and tyrannical, because it does not accomplish any good in preventing Sunday occupations; because every man and woman who now observes the day would do so if no law were on the statute book; and it is a tyrannical anachronism because it enables a bunch of pharisees to prescribe to their less powerful neighbors the manner in which it may be used. The hypocritical pretense of wanting a "day of rest for the poor laborer" is played-out bosh. Of what use is a day of rest, if the only place open to spend it in is a rumshop or a church? No one wants to forcibly close the churches, and it seems that no one can close the saloons. The great body of the people will not spend all their Sundays in listening to sermons, and they will go somewhere. The common sense method, then, is to substitute decent places for the low ones to which the idle are now forced to resort. Put a well stocked library, a cheerful reading-room, a beautiful art gallery, a legitimate moral drama, in competition with a groggery or a low-down dive or concert saloon, and who can think so ill of human nature—even when corrupted by Catholicism—as to doubt that the result will be for almost immeasurable good? Pessimism on this subject can only come from the opinion that centuries of Christianity hav utterly debased mankind, an opinion we are sure the religious people generally would not share. Heretofore the Independent has affected to desire progress in civilization. It will serve that cause much better by helping along these Sunday openings than by applauding the Middle Age sentiments of a few supercilious fossils.

Trouble Among the Faithful.

The Rome correspondent of the London Post is authority for the statement that the pope is to be experimented upon with dynamite by some of his American Fenian followers if he does not restrain himself from interfering in the affairs of Ireland. The pope is warned that there are priests, whom he is bound to receive, who will obtain access to his presence, and who will sustain the cause of the Irish against oppression.

This betokens an unpleasant state of affairs, and should the Fenians put their threat into execution the dogma of papal infallibility would receive a severe blow. Every Catholic is bound on pain of excommunication from the holy apostolic church here and eternal flames hereafter to believe that the pope's order to the Irish priests to refrain from interfering with the English government is right. Should he be killed because of it, his successor would not probably care to follow his example, and might, through the persuasiv power of dynamite, be induced to rescind the order. In such an event the difficulty of deciding which was the infallible dictum might be too great for the brain of the average Catholic and might lead to an untold amount of heretical thought. "What makes the papal opinion so valuable to the Irish?" says the Times, "is the fact that it is infallible. There is a great deal, no doubt, in having an assurance from the highest possible authority that you are all right. But this very fact makes it impossible to change the infallible mind. The pope's private advices, dating from before all worlds, upon the political duties of Irishmen, cannot possibly be modified by ephemeral postal cards on the situation written by an anonymous Irishman who does not pretend to be infallible, but only declares his ability to smash the head of the church with a shillalah or blow it out of the chair of Saint Peter with dynamite. If the infallible mind could be changed by temporary accidents to the precarious person of its incumbent, it would be no longer infallible, and hence unworthy of notice. Threats to blow up the cardinals might be equally efficacious without being so transparently irrational."

We are afraid the Times is poking fun at the pope, which a Protestant ought not to do; for what if the Lutheran schism should, after all, turn out to be the work of antichrist, as the very faithful hold? What pit of hell would be found deep enough for a railer at the successor of St. Peter?

Another Dogma Given Up.

In his last Sunday's sermon Mr. Beecher took occasion to remark that:

"The arithmetical formula of three in one and one in three is preposterous."

This is another milestone in Mr. Beecher's evolution. About the only orthodox belief to which the great Brooklyn preacher still clings is the idea of God, and in his conception of this God he differs very widely from his co-pulpiteers. Mr. Beecher has, at various times, abjured the following Christian dogmas:

1. Hell.
2. The fall of man.
3. The atonement.
4. The trinity.

Now if a man can repudiate all these and still be a Christian, it must be evident that in its evolution Christianity has already arrived at that point of development where all traces of its ancestry are lost. Its variation of species has proceeded as fast as the most hopeful evolutionist could expect. But it seems almost certain that most churchmen will contend that Mr. Beecher is an Infidel and not a Christian at all.

The torture which religion brings to earnest souls early made Mr. Beecher unhappy.

"When I was a boy," he said, "if anybody ever hungered and thirsted after religion I did. I tried to get it and tried to get it. I was like one who heard the sound of music in a house to which he was invited and could not find a coat and could not make one. I read Jonathan Edwards' horrible sermons about hell. They were made for hell, and ought to be sent to hell. I thought I was a depraved little sinner, without a particle of good in me. I was burdened with a historic sense of being sinful; I was taught that I was born totally depraved, and I concluded I was a bundle of fuel for hell fire. I hav seen the time that I wished I was the cow I was driving into the field—it would all be over with her when she died."

This is the experience of hundreds, yes, thousands, of Freethinkers. But now that they are free they do not, like Mr. Beecher, stand up and pretend to teach the religion that made them such cowardly slaves. They are not content with negativing a few of the grossest impositions in the scheme.

To be consistent, and to win the highest respect of mankind, Mr. Beecher should publicly ascend the platform upon which he really stands. His true place in the intellectual struggle now going on is by the side of Col. Ingersoll.

THE judiciary, court of pardons, and governor of New Jersey hav committed a murder—judicial, it is true, but nevertheless a murder. On Thursday, the 3d inst., the gallows in Newark had two victims. One of them was James Graves, a man who had up to his 66th year never been before a court. He was known as an eccentric but harmless old man, who lived alone, and fancied that he was an inventor. He was intolerably plagued by street boys, and one day he fired a pistol at one of his worst tormentors, killing him. Graves was tried and condemned, but it was not expected he would be hung, as his mental condition was well known. Seven physicians testified to his insanity, among them being the best experts on lunacy in this part of the country. The autopsy performed after his death proved beyond doubt that he was not a responsible person. While in jail he has been feeble-minded and wandering in his speech, and his childishness touched the hearts of his jailers. About 9 o'clock on the morning of his death his lawyer tried to make him understand that the Court of Pardons had declined to extend clemency to him, and that the governor had refused to even grant a respite. "Graves," he said, "You are going to be hanged to-day. You will die very soon." "Well?" replied the old man in a questioning way. "Don't you understand me?" asked the lawyer. "I didn't rest last night," he answered, "and I don't know when I'll get better rest. Perhaps to-night. I must finish this thing, and next week I'll take it to the navy yard and sell it there." He pointed to a little box which he said contained an invention on perpetual motion. "Jersey justice" has passed into a by-word If it is to be perverted by hanging men in such mental condition, it will soon become a hissing and a shame. The Sun reports that in the days before his mental affliction Graves was an Atheist, and that he showed a gleam of reason in refusing the services of a priest, saying he did not believe in church cant. But his attention could not be fixed upon any topic long enough to get a rational thought. His companion upon the gallows was a young Catholic, who murdered his wife because she scolded him for coming home drunk. He was attended by a priest, who heard his confession and absolved him, by which means he will go as straight to heaven as anyone.

THE Liberals of San Jose, Cal., hav a Young People's Progressiv Lyceum, which has been in existence about a year and numbers some seventy scholars. Its objects, as stated by Dr. J. L. York in a lecture before it on the 23d ult., are the giving to all lovers of perfect liberty, conscience, and mental development, an organization where old and young will be instructed in all that pertains to their moral, mental, and physical welfare. Its motto is universal mental liberty. Meetings are held every Sunday. As its motto states, it urges no particular belief, but leaves everyone at liberty to believe as he may from his own standpoint. Confining itself to the realm of absolute knowledge, there can be no ground for quarrel. In his lecture on the occasion referred to, Dr. York defined Secularism in a very clear and impartial manner. The doctor, says the San Jose Mercury, is a rapid talker, and possesses a wonderful power of magnetism over an audience. "But a short time ago," he said, "Christianity held supreme control of tongue and pen, and but few could be found to raise their voices against it. Fear and indifference rested like a cloud upon the civilized world. To-day all religious dogmas, pretended divine revelations, and systems of civilization are summoned to the bar of critical investigation. Under one flag are found Catholics, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, and various smaller sects, all claiming to be the exponents of the Christian religion; while under the flag of human progress, science, and humanity are classed Materialists, Spiritualists, Atheists, Infidels, Secularists, and the like, differing, perhaps, upon minor principles, but agreeing upon general principles. Secularism is the opposit to what some people call sacred or divine. The National Liberal League is based on Secularism, which is to free the state and school from all religious observance and control. Secularism is the true science of life, and is in opposition to every system of religion on earth. Secularism means more than Infidelity, Materialism, Atheism, Freethought. Religion is brought to the bar of Secularism to prove its many false claims upon the intellect of the world. Secularism teaches, first, supreme attention to the duties of this life, to ourselvs, and then to our fellow-man; second, that civilization, true progress, and the improvement of society can best be obtained by human means and a disbelief in a God to worship or a devil to fear; third, that reason is a safer and better guide than the Bible or divine revelation; that science and knowledge are better providers for all human needs than a faith in supernatural means—that one school-master is better than a thousand priests. The force of habit and fashion is what supports the churches to-day. Socially, Secularism places man and woman side by side, equal in every way. No religion on earth has done this. God and the Bible hav not grown, but a sense of morality, justice, and goodness in the minds of the people has greatly improved science. Secularism denies the right of any falsehood to liv, no matter if it has been handed down as coming from saint or Lord. Secularism offers no premium for hypocrisy, and holds out no motivs for deception, no heaven of bliss, no hell of woe, but tends to make men and women honest for honesty's sake. Being the true science, it is the safest belief at death. The chief object of Secularism is an honest endeavor to rid the world of error, shame, and priestcraft, and to teach that true salvation is self-salvation, by doing good for good's own sake. The necessity for Secularism is found in the failure of theological systems to regenerate the world, the impossibility of uniform religious belief, and the requirement by modern thought of a higher and more intellectual faith than orthodoxy presents. Secularism is the grand study of life, based upon the deductions of science, and the moral life of the world depends upon a knowledge of nature's law, and obedience to that law. Secularism is a gospel of hope, and points to a republic of universal mental liberty. It tells of a time when religion will consist of doing good, not depending upon rites and creeds; when a conflict of opinion will not cause hatred; when war and bloodshed shall cease, and this planet produce a brotherhood of men; when the grinding wheels of monopoly shall cease, and woman shall find no restriction laid upon her natural right to equal liberty. It tells of a time when excess and intemperance will not mar the beauty of manhood, and when each man will be a law to himself, and the law of love, not force, shall rule the world. It tells of a time when the school-master shall supersede the priest, and when all the signs and symbols of superstition shall pass away; when the college of learning shall lift its proud head above the clouds of bigotry and fanaticism, shedding peace and light and mental freedom over all lands." After the lecture, from which we hav quoted but a few points, a collection was taken to purchase Christmas presents for the youngsters of the Lyceum. If every town in the country had a lyceum and a Dr. York, our cause would progress a good deal faster. A happy New Year to the Liberals of the Pacific slope. May '85 find their numbers legion.

LAROY SUNDERLAND, our well-known contributor on Ideology and kindred subjects, has been made a Fellow of the Society of Science, Letters, and Art in London, in consideration of his discoveries in psychology and hygiene. Dr. Sunderland drives a viril quill, and one that makes him warm friends and strong intellectual enemies.

THE Liberals of Texas are setting an exceedingly good example for us of other states to follow. They hav nearly completed a four-thousand-dollar hall in Waco, the opening of which is thus noticed by the Waco Day of December 22d:

"Our Liberal friends could not hav asked for a happier occasion than the opening of their new hall last night—the first event of the kind, by the way, in the state. The building, which is situated on Washington street, between Sixth and Seventh, is of wood, but constructed very substantially. It is seventy-five feet in length by fifty in width. The ceiling, with a view to acoustic qualities, is arched and is very lofty. The edifice is yet to be painted and papered, but shows how comfortable and capacious it is. Three chandeliers, with several jets of gas, light the room. When completed it will cost $4,000 and will be highly creditable to those who designed and built it. The night was quite inclement, but as early as eight o'clock visitors commenced to arrive and they came in groups until midnight. There were no formal opening ceremonies, no speechmaking or anything of the kind—simply sociability and good cheer. On entering, the first thing that struck the reporter's eye were the tables for raffles and the sale of fancy articles. These were in charge of ladies and did a lively business during the evening, disposing of many useful and beautiful articles. The supper tables were a sight long to be remembered. We hav heard of tables 'groaning' under a weight of good things, and certainly the tables last night illustrated the force of the expression. The repast was a complete one—substantials, delicacies, and dainties—everything good to eat that the market could furnish. Each and every guest was seated and allowed ample time to enjoy the bill of fare, served by lady waiters who were unremitting in their attentions. The dancing commenced at nine o'clock, led by the superb Walhall orchestra, who discoursed their best music, which was kept up until after midnight. As to the personnel of the assembly it was noticed that several of the orthodox Christian and Hebrew denominations were represented, evincing a spirit of friendliness that was truly gratifying. We may also state, in behalf of the ladies of the Religious and Benevolent association (the Liberal organization) that they received substantial evidences of a friendly spirit from quite a number of ladies of other churches, who assisted in decorating the room, loaned linen, glass, and china for the tables, and sent turkeys, cakes, and other good things. It was truly a bountiful and enjoyable occasion. Chief credit must of course be awarded to the Liberal ladies, who worked so hard to make the event a success. Among these ladies may be mentioned Mesdames W. E. Dupree, Sanford, Johnson, Sedberry, Gerald, Caruthers, Taft, Misses Neva Stiff, Kate Gerald, and others whose names we cannot now recall. The receipts hav not yet been footed up, but must hav been considerable. All concerned hav reason to feel gratified at the outcome. Another feature we had almost forgotten was the large number of children in attendance. These little ones seemed to enjoy themselvs fully as much as the grown folk."

The Religious Benevolent Association was chartered Dec. 12, 1882, and immediately commenced work, using the district court room as their place of meeting. Ninety-eight lectures hav been delivered before the Association, which has met twice each Sunday during the year. Besides the $4,000 raised for this hall, the current expenses, including lights, fuel, sexton's fees, organ music, and lecturer's salary, hav been $1,107,70; $78,55 hav been raised for the poor. J. D. Shaw is the head and front of the organization, and in addition to the ninety-eight home lectures he has found time to giv forty-eight more elsewhere. In congratulating the Association and the board of directors on the showing of the first year, Mr. Shaw adds that there has been a moral and intellectual quickening among the people that cannot be put in figures, but nevertheless is visibly seen and felt in the growing tolerance of opinion and the increase of human sympathy. We say, with Mr. Shaw, may the good work never cease until the brotherhood of men is the song of the race.

A WRITER in the Tribune has found in one of John Milton's articles ("The Special Government of Man") this opinion of polygamy. Milton recognizes and admits that it is a Bible institution, and seems at a loss how to reconcile his belief in the divinity of the book with his ideas of morality. He says: "I hav not said the marriage of one man with one woman, lest I should by implication charge the holy patriarchs and pillars of our faith, Abraham and the others who had more than one wife at the same time, with habitual sin; and lest I should be forced to exclude from the sanctuary of God as spurious the whole offspring which sprang from them, yea, the whole of the sons of Israel, for whom the sanctuary itself was made. For it is said in Deuteronomy (xxii, 2) 'a bastard shall not enter into the congregation of Jehovah, even to the tenth generation.' 'Either, therefore,' proceeds Milton, 'polygamy is a true marriage, or all children born in that state are spurious, which would include the whole race of Jacob, the twelve tribes chosen by God. But as such an assertion would be absurd in the extreme, not to say impious, and as it is the hight of injustice as well as an example of the most dangerous tendency in religion, to account as sin what is not such in reality, it appears to me that so far from the question respecting the lawfulness of polygamy being trival, it is of the highest importance that it should be decided. . . . Not a trace appears of the interdiction of polygamy throughout the whole law, not even in any of the prophets."

To the author of notes and comments in THE TRUTH SEEKER let me say that we hav a minister—not a youth nor a broken-down old man, but one in the full intellectual strength of middle life—who not only can milk a cow, but can go into the forests and chop his own fire-wood. He can preach a sermon which in truth and pointedness would, at one hearing, convince the author of notes and comments that he is a sinner.—Westmoreland, N. H., Correspondence of the New England Observer.

There can be no doubt as to the enterprise of the reverend gentleman to whom this refers, as we learn from another part of the paper from which the foregoing is cut that he induced the good people of his parish to allow a sixty-five-dollar donation party to be sprung upon him very soon after his call to the Westmoreland pulpit. For the sake of avoiding argument, we hav to admit as true the statement contained in the last sentence of the above clipping. We can't afford to travel two or three hundred miles in cold weather to be convinced that we are in a condition common to all mankind here and to a good many hereafter. If the Westmoreland dominie could argue us into the belief that we were a saint in good standing, it might be worth while.

FOLLOWING the good example of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but afar off, the Investigator has issued a card calendar for 1884. It is printed on heavy cardboard, 11x14 inches, in red and blue with purple border, and is designed for a desk calendar, or to post up for frequent reference. It is exceedingly neat and pretty, an ornament to any office, and Mr. Mendum sends it out for five cents' worth of stamps. Every Freethinking business man ought to post one over his desk, and hang up a TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL beside it for his visitors to consult.

THE Nashville, Tenn., Liberal approvingly quotes our reply to Mr. Kirby and credits it to the Investigator. It is only another error of the intelligent compositor, probably, but supposing Brother Seaver shouldn't agree with all we said?

MR. REMSBURG lectured in Cleveland December 27th; gave three discourses at Nunda, this state, the first of this month; was at Petersburg, Pa., on the 4th and 5th; at Pittsburgh the 6th, Irwin Station the 7th, and Columbus the 8th; visited Hamburg, N. Y., three days, ending the 11th; is at Brockport to-day and to-morrow (12th and 13th); will be at Yorkshire on the 14th and 15th; at Randolph the 16th, 17th, and 18th; at Philadelphia the 19th; Lonsdale, Pa., the 20th, 21st, and 22d; this city before the Liberal Club on the 25th, and at Boston at the New England Freethinkers' Convention on the 27th, 28th, and 29th. None of our lecturers work harder than Mr. Remsburg, and no one better deserves the great success he has won. Keep him busy.

MISS HELEN M. GARDNER is a new-comer on the Liberal lecture platform. She entertained a fair-sized audience at Chickering Hall, this city, last Sunday night. She was introduced by Colonel Ingersoll, who said:

"There is always so much bitterness when we are discussing questions which nobody understands, and the less we know of the subject the more bitter we are. I hav always endeavored to cultivate a kindly form of expression, and to influence as much as I could the women of the land; but I hav found that even women are sometimes bitter and unreasonable on subjects about which they know nothing. There is this difference between wisdom and prejudice. They both come eventually to the same line, because there is a shore beyond which no intellect has ever gone, a spot on the wall of our prison above which neither wisdom nor prejudice has ever risen. Wisdom, when she gets to this line, is modest and says: 'Beyond this I cannot go;' prejudice gets to the point, and just there is where her certainty begins. She knows all about it beyond that point. Now, we hav been taught that nothing so becomes a woman as to believe in everything, and that a woman without faith would hardly believe in her own husband. I think that we all ought to be honest with each other. The heart of the question is right there, and I admit that I know as little as any human being about the origin or the destiny of humanity. Nobody can know less, and, so far as I've got, nobody can know more. It is something into which the blind can see as well as anybody else. I cannot say whether death is a wall or a door; the beginning or the end of a day; the spreading of pinions to soar, or the folding forever of wings; the dawn of a life which brings rapture and joy to everyone, or the setting of a sun never to rise again. Now, I insist that on a subject about which nobody knows anything, everybody, even women, has a right to express themselvs. When any religion puts a chain on woman it is her right and duty to break it; when it makes her the slave of a man or a God, it is her right and duty to resist and break her bonds. Some women hav exercised this right and are now free, and I hav the pleasure now to introduce you to a lady who will tell you the objections which she has to the orthodox religion of the Bible, to the inspired insipidities of the patriarchs."

Miss Gardner's lecture occupied nearly two hours. The points she made were closely copied after the colonel's, and consequently were sharp and well taken. Among other things she said:

A religion which says that we should be miserable in this world that we may be happy hereafter, has a false philosophy. A religion that says that believing vice is holier than unbelieving virtue is wrong. I do not believe in a religion which sends Emerson and Channing to hell because Eve ate the forbidden fruit, or sends Chastine Cox to heaven because a mob murdered Jesus Christ.

Woman has a right to talk about religion, provided she talks for it. She probably has a soul, which is comparativly a recent concession. I am not going to say that I hav a soul, for, if I did, I might be called upon some day to produce it, and if I did not hav one about me I would not know what to say.

Most of the church-goers are women, which will make heaven a queer kindergarten, in whose classes will be few male voices, and those chiefly tenor.

Grant that our Bible is more just than any other Bible, and what does it prove? That murder is a greater crime than arson, does not that prove that the man who sets fire to our house is a gentleman. That Allah is more cruel than Jehovah does not palliate any of the cruelites of the Old Testament.

Wherever woman is mentioned in the Bible it is an insult to her purity and a rivet in her chain. What does woman owe to the Bible? A father may sell his daughter to shame, may sacrifice her purity to the violence of a mob, he may murder her, yet he is a good father, a holy man. A man may hav any number of wives, may giv them away, swap them around, or kill them, and be at the same time one of God's most intimate friends. The Bible classes women as property, just like a sheep.

It seems to me time to retire Moses. Coax him to resign on account of his health. Get him to go back to his constituents.

A woman should spurn the Bible and endeavor to destroy its influence, and I mean to do all I can in such a direction. Jehovah stands condemned before the bar of every noble soul.

God might hav hinted to Solomon in one of their numerous conversations that he had a few more wives than necessary.

The Bible might be kept in one's library as a curious old literary work; but it should be kept on the top shelf. Don't let the children get at it.

The War of the Philosophers.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Will your readers pardon me for dilating upon the subject of atoms, and the all-important subject of mind and matter? I am induced to do this by reading the articles of Mr. Wettstein and Mr. Putnam, and also to gratify some of your readers who want to know what more I hav to say about it.

The philosophers above referred to hav been stating and restating their positions, and the substance of their conclusions is: That matter is the only substance, while mind is a mere result of what matter accomplishes. Matter cannot produce mind, except by an organization into certain forms, and these forms can then produce mind. Elmina illustrates the same ideas by her statement that the mind is to a human body "what the noise is to a wagon;" and I suppose the more rickety the wagon, the more noise it will make, and so of humanity. If these theories are true, they completely destroy the seeming object of growth and development, and upon this question hinges the whole value of existence, and to meet and overthrow it is the business of those of us who reason from the opposit standpoint. These reasoners think it very absurd for the Christian to claim that a God could create out of nothing such a system of nature as we perceive; and so it no doubt is. Yet they commit a worse blunder when they argue and assume that nature can and does organize innumerable minds out of nothing, or out of dead, soulless, and mindless matter. Otto Wettstein says it is done by "soulless spontaneous generation." How he knows that mind or anything else is brought into existence spontaneously, and what "spontaneous" means where universal law governs, it is hard to say.

The Christian's assumption and the Materialist's assumption are an offset to each other. If I ask how mind can come from nothing, the reply is, It comes from matter. Then it must be matter, else matter would be producing something outside of itself; and if mind is nothing, then is matter producing a very important no-thing. And I appeal to any logician to say whether it is not as absurd to say that matter can produce so important a nothing out of something, as to assume that a God created matter out of nothing!

From the Materialistic view of the case, it would seem to follow that, if man—the real man—is mind and matter, so that the mind and body act each upon the other, they must be counterparts of each other. This is the sticking-point of the question, and the effort of the Materialist to annihiliate mind and utterly destroy it is quite amusing. He will admit that it is the most important factor of existence; by it we know, without it we cannot know; it is everything grand, stupendous, penetrating, but, alas! it is nothing—a mere mode, process, action, motion. Wherever there is matter there is life, mode, action, etc. Matter exists everywhere and is indestructible, but, by some oversight of logic, mind is subject to absolute destruction, say these reasoners.

The mind acts, and causes action of the body. It usually acts before the body. It can reason and act by a process of imagination, while not a muscle, bone, nerve, or fiber of the body moves, or it can cause the body to act at will. Yet that which is so potent is nothing, say they. Mind and matter are co-existent and eternal, the one cannot be separated from the other, and by their own premises this is clear.

Let us apply a little logic to their statements and see how they look. "Things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other." Mr. Putnam says: "Mind is not a substance, therefore it is a mode only. It is not universal but partial. Wherever there is existence, there is matter; but only in certain choice forms of existence is mind exhibited." Bear this in mind, and let us see again what this philosopher says at another place. He asserts: "Matter exists throughout all space and time. It flashes in millions of stars. Motions come to the eye to-day; they started on their course before humanity had a being. As science sweeps the endless heavens with its telescopic glance, it continually discovers matter, but not mind. There is no evidence of what we call intelligence. There is simply orderly force; but orderly force is not mind, it is law. The existence of law does not indicate mind. Law is not a thing; it is a mode, and this mode always has been—always will be."*

Now kind reader, let us sum up Mr. Putnam's statements and see how flatly he is contradicting himself. He has told us that mind is not a substance, but that it is a mode. His statement, then, is that mind is a mode. Then his next statement is that "law is not a thing; it is a mode, and this mode always has been—always will be." It follows from these statements that mind and law are synonymous. They are alike, one and the same thing; they are a mode, He has stated also that matter is illimitable, exists everywhere, and that law is an orderly force existing wherever matter is. In fact, lawless matter could not exist, so the result of this philosophical reasoning amounts to this: Matter and mind are modes. In nature, matter produces no intelligence by her laws or modes. In man matter produces intelligence, hence law and mind do not agree, and are not alike. It follows that if law is a mode without intelligence, then mind, being intelligent, cannot be a mode only. It must be something more than a mode.

Mr. Putnam has stated this in spite of himself, and in spite of several other statements to the contrary. If mind is a mode and law is a mode, both a result of matter, then mind and law are modes; and if law in nature, outside of man's body, cannot produce intelligence, and can produce it in his body, it would argue that man's body was a higher form of intelligence-producing matter, or of a dual body, or else that law does produce intelligence in nature—is orderly and intelligent in all its modes. That this is so is evident. No man livs or ever did liv who did not get all his intelligence from nature, and this is a flat contradiction of Mr. Putnam's statement. I wish to inquire, Whence did Mr. Putnam get his intelligence? Was it not in some way from nature? Has any man, or hav all men, produced a thing or reasoned out a great truth or truths that did not first exist in nature, and was perceived by them because it had such existence? And yet this philosophy asserts the non-intelligence of law and nature. Mr. Putnam asserts that, "while matter is discovered everywhere, there is no evidence of intelligence." If science or man does not discover intelligence, in the name of common sense what does he discover? Mr. Putnam admits that the substance of matter he can not understand; he does not know what it is, and what he can find is the forms of matter, and they are constantly changing.

If he can find only the forms of matter, and admits that "the substance cannot be defined," what reason has he for asserting that it is substance, and the only substance? The only thing he knows anything about is forms of matter, and yet he is so sure that these forms hav substance also, that he considers the man a fool who does not agree with him, and says he will not argue the question with such an idiot, which amounts to a tall assumption and that is all. He says, "Matter does exist, and we know it." How do we know it? Again he says, "We cannot conceive of existence except in material forms." This I deny. A man may conceive of forms by the imagination alone, and they will hav the appearance to the mind of material forms, and yet these forms are not material. So he may dream of forms and exist amongst them; and these are not material forms, nor substantial ones either. Mr. Putnam's method of argument seems to be to make a strong assertion and affirmation and stick to it where he finds himself weak in facts or proofs.

After making the affirmation about substance, of the nature of which he admits he knows nothing, and cannot define it, he asks, "Can we make the same affimation of mind?" And then says, "No; mind is not a substance." I should say, Yes; you can, logically, as one unsupported affirmation is always as good as another.

If I am unable to define matter, which I claim is a substance only from its forms, by what authority do I claim that mind is not a substance, when, without a mind, I must admit I could not perceive the forms of matter? It would seem, to a reasonable man, that mind is the more important actor in this drama of forms; so that, whether it is the solid stuff or not, it seems to hav the advantage.

Both of these Materialistic philosophers demand that this complex subject must be brought down to unity. There can be no duality, says Mr. Putnam. "Science is repugnant to dualism. Every philosophy that has ever existed has been an attempt to explain the universe by some one principle," says he; but, contrary to this statement expressed, the science of chemistry demands a recognition of sixty-five or sixty-six distinct elementary substances, and the one principle is the life of them, which is as indestructible as the substances or elements it permeates, but at the same time as variable also as are these elements. The duality and complexity cannot be destroyed or reasoned away. The very soul of chemistry depends on this diversity and conditions of elementary life. The elements of matter always hav existed and always will. Homogeneity in matter must be the stumbling-block of modern philosophy, and all the varnish of Materialistic polishers and decorators cannot wipe out or cover up this everlasting truth. Iron will be iron. Gold will be gold. Carbon will remain carbon; and so on to the end of the chapter. The motions in the particles or atoms of iron hav always a different rate from those of a less dense material. The motions of every element of matter differ one from the other, and constitute the chemical difference of their life. What we term electricity is not a substance, not a current, but the force of vibration in the kind of matter in motion, and the effect of a battery on our nerves is the disposition in nature of any vibrating body to equalize itself with any other body it comes in contact with; hence we feel this force, but the moment you insulate your own body, so as to prevent any escape, as it is falsely called, or when you cut yourself off from the earth contact, and become a part of the battery, you feel no effects from it and may be charged, or the atomic state of your body put in unison, and having the same vibrations, with the generating battery. Now by touching a person standing upon earth, he is intensely shocked, because his body is not in the same state of atomic vibration. Material force, then, is not a substance, and differs according to the elements of matter as to quantity and quality, as usually expressed.

To illustrate this still further: Centrifugal force is nothing more nor less than the law of all flying bodies, which is a tendency to travel in a straight line. Now, when a railway car in rapid motion touches the curve, our bodies are disposed to fly off tangent to this curve, or to keep on in the line of their first direction, and the momentum shocks the body and makes us sensible of force.

There are forces, however, in nature that act through space, or by means of what may be called a magnetic sphere. A magnet will lift iron filings quite a distance, and cause them to fly against its surface when a considerable distance from actual contact. This shows that a force may be projected or thrown to a distance away from the material body giving it off. The philosophy of this is plain enough when we study the real nature of atoms. Every atom, especially those composed of iron and steel, has an enveloping sphere of a substance much more ethereal than the atom itself, which is of that nature that if there are particles they coalesce or become a fluid, elastic mass, and surround the atom just as the atmosphere surrounds our earth. This sphere envelop prevents any two atoms of matter from absolute contact, hence the most solid materials are not absolutely solid, but these spheres unite and hold the mass together. In consequence of this force, called cohesion, acting through the mass, and for this reason, is all material susceptible of being worked and molded into all manner of forms. It will be remembered, also, that this sphere contains all the soul and life of matter. Let me illustrate this point, and prove my statements; at the same time show the law of the conservation of forces, and the convertibility from one state to another.

Heat, light, and electricity shown in an instant of time. Take a piano-string, and weaken a point by filing it slightly; hitch the loop fast at one end, and place the thumb and finger of each hand on either side of the weakened spot; then let some person turn the tuning-pin until the string breaks. When it does, you will see a stream of light, or fire, fly from the ends of wire about one-half inch long. The ends of the wire will be warm, and you will feel an electric shock tingle through your body at the instant. This shows that all the force used in winding the string was instantly changed into heat, light, and electricity. It proves, also, that the solid wire was susceptible of elongating itself, by means of the atomic spheres, and the electric shock was occasioned by the contractility of the string when it was free to assume its original length, from which it had been drawn. This magnetic quality is a property of all matter to some extent, hence all matter—the deadest of it—has some life, and is susceptible of change. The lowest matter contains least of this atomic substance, and the highest and finest matter contains most; and the animal kingdom, especially man, has a preponderance of this, which, for want of a better term, I may call ethereal or spiritual substance. It is this real substance in an organic form which rises to the dignity of a self-conscious human being, and which enables man to will and to project his force and manhood by means of his organism. And this duality of life and matter cannot be destroyed. Anybody's philosophy which attempts it is stumbling against facts. This duality in unity of matter is the great wall against which all Materialistic theories dash themselvs to pieces. If they could but perceive the fact that matter is not absolutely solid, they might be able, by ear and eye, to penetrate the mass and, perchance, get a glimpse or a sound from the other side.

One word about protoplasm, that wonderful substance we hear so much about, which is said to be the cause of mind—a more puffed-up discovery than ever hoodwinked mankind before. The discoverer claimed that at last he had found the origin of life, an original life-substance, whence all organic life came; and forthwith the scientific Materialistic philosophers began to experiment with a view to demonstrate the assumption, when lo! to their utter disappointment, they found that protemi as a separate body has no existence, and is a compound of substances forming the most essential articles of food. The cells it nourishes are animal and vegetable germs, but without the germ-cells to start on, it can originate no life other than that dual quality before alluded to. Protoplasm, then, is simply a kind of food for certain kinds of animals and vegetables, composed of albuminates, sulphur, and phosphorus. So says chemistry Whether an orgasm ever originated in protoplasm, cannot be demonstrated on account of the extreme difficulty in excluding the surrounding elements, as the air and water are filled with vegetable and animal germs. If protoplasm originates animals, what determins their sex? It would seem to require a bioplasm and several other plasms to account for life as we find it.

Letters from Friends.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 26, E.S. 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 50 subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1884, for a new subscriber.

The above is my New Years gift to THE TRUTH SEEKER; probably I shall send you another before long. I sincerely hope yourself and friend Somerby hav enjoyed a merry Christmas; and I wish you both a Happy New Year, and may you liv to enjoy many such is the sincere wish of your Humble friend, W. F. PORTER.

ABILENE, TEXAS, Dec. 23, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: There is one thing that happened here in our county court the other day that I will relate for the benefit of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There was a man here on trial for a trifling offense, and he, being a Jew, the county attorney, fearing he could not get him convicted, related to the jury, which was mixed with Christians, that it was his race of people that were responsible for the crucifying of Christ.

Liberalism is gaining ground here very fast, and I will endeavor to send you a list of subscribers for your most valuable paper. M. H. VAN DUSEN.

GLENS FALLS, Dec. 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: May your paper continue to bloom and blossom in perennial youth until the theologies of Zoroaster, Buddha, Confucius, Moses, and the stolen theologies of Christianity, shall hav faded away into the dim twilight of unwritten fable; until man shall be judged by his merit and God by his love, and hell shall be deemed the happy hunting-ground of fools who would inflict infinit punishment for a finite transgression? Heaven, God, good—if there are such things—are conditions by which all immortality may attain the eternal round of ages—beyond the stars. ISAAC LEWIS.

LONG LAKE, MINN., Dec. 23, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to renew the excellent TRUTH SEEKER for the year of Bruno 284. I hav been from home for two months and hav fallen behind in reading my papers, but first of all I look up my back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope your subscribers will come to time and pay the old price; it is worth far more than three dollars a year. Our dear Bennett, earnestly desiring to get THE TRUTH SEEKER before the people, reduced the price to $2.50. Now, if I know anything about that business, your subscription list would require to be doubled to meet that reduction.

When Mr. Bennett went to Albany (curse the fiends who sent him there; there is a retributiv justice awaiting them somewhere!) I got six subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, three of whom failed to renew at the end of the year. Liberals, too, they called themselvs, but lukewarm. Oh, pshaw! I hav more patience with a bigot than with those tepid Liberals.

W. ARCHIBALD.

HARWICH, Dec. 28, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Find within 50 cents for three months for trial subscriber. Small sum, but I guess he will continue to take it, as he is entirely aloof from the church and Christianity, and is a Freethinker.

That article by "Roundhead" is a masterpiece. How glad I am that there are men capable of setting forth the true state of things; it givs me relief and joy to think the truth has such able advocates. I speak of the article not as detracting at all from the many others in THE TRUTH SEEKER—they are all excellent. I see Father Hacker is ventilating the subject of land monopoly. Good! Its just what is needed. It's high time that this matter were pressed home to the minds and consciences of the people.

Then there is the matter of church monopoly. Who does not know that the papal church of Rome is after power? And when she gets it, if ever she does, and that is what she is trying for, we may expect first-class tyranny—diabolism doubly distilled.

B. F. ROBBINS.

NUNDA, Dec. 23, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: As the time has nearly expired for which I hav paid for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I hasten to renew my subscription, as I cannot well get along without it, as it just fills the place (to my notion) of a good and wholesome religious paper; and since the "Children's Corner" has been added, the paper has been bettered. For surely is the "agitation of thought the beginning of wisdom," and in no paper are all so perfectly free to add their ipse dixit as in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I, in common with many others, was fearful that the paper would decline and finally die after the death of its great founder, D. M. Bennett, but am happy to mark a gradual improvement in each of its issues. Living, as I do, in the agricultural district of Northern Illinois, where but comparativly few Freethought lectures are in reach of us, we feel the want of such meetings; and, as has been suggested by some previous writers, I hope a "Freethought Lecture Bureau" might be established to meet this long-felt need. Where there are but few Freethinkers the expense of a course or two of lectures by able speakers is far too great to be borne by the very limited number that can be depended on to help sustain them, but after the ice is once broken and the "Madam Grundy" of Infidelity conquered, the difficulty would, in a great measure, be obviated.

The amount inclosed, I think, will satisfy all demands made on a previous page. J. E. BECKLEY.

MONTROSE, IOWA, Dec. 25, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 284. We are having a gathering of sanctified holiness people who cannot sin. There is a cow-pen full of them. There are two ewe lambs in the flock, who help dish out sanctification to us. They hav succeeded in capturing two or three sugar-loaf heads, which is all right, for it is the only place they can be ornamental. They use many slang phrases, tell many ghost and witch stories, claim to hav the power to heal the sick by laying on of hands, and so on through the whole catalog of nonsense that would shame a Snake Indian. They are a by-word for children, and a disgrace to humanity.

Freethought is gaining strength, and becoming more popular here. But yet there are but few who dare come to the front—either throw away their manhood, fall to the rear, and indorse the principles of those whom they may come in contact with; in other words, they are slaves for popularity's sake.

A. CRANDALL.

SOUTH SHAFTSBURY, VT., Dec. 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find a list of names of persons, residents of this and neighboring towns, to whom you can forward sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for trial. Not one of those parties is a church-member that I know of, and yet but three or four of them are pronounced Agnostics.

I hav been loaning THE TRUTH SEEKER to a great many persons throughout Shaftsbury for the past two years, and hav not, or rather could not, induce a person to subscribe for it. There is a considerable number of Spiritualistic papers here, and also quite a number of industrial reform papers. I might state, in connection with this subject, that the industrial reform movement at present seems to be growing rapidly; the bulk of the poor Infidels throughout here are more interested in the land and labor question than they are in God's and paradises of the past, present, or to come. What they want is real practicable reform, something that will remove the clutch of the Shylock, the factory lord, and the landlord from them. I hope one or more of those names will subscribe for the good old TRUTH SEEKER. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so does my wife, but we would like it much better if it devoted more of its space to the industrial reform movement which, by the way, is the question of the hour.

Fraternally yours, JOHN MURRAY.

SALEM, IND., Dec. 23, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for my subscription for 1883-4.

I do not claim to be a convert to Freethought or Infidelity. My earliest recollection dates back to my boyhood days, when I read "Robinson Crusoe," "Baron Munchausen," "Mother Goose," and the old family Bible. I thought at that time that they all belonged to the same class of literature, and mature years hav not changed my opinion. I was a reader of the Boston Investigator over twenty years ago, and still recollect a sentiment composed in verse by Nathan Graves Jr., who had once been a Methodist preacher, but had come to see the light of the age in which we lived, and renounced the follies and superstitions of the past, and when sinking under the fell destroyer, consumption, penned the inclosed sentiment in verse. As I write entirely from memory, I may hav made some errors. I think it was published in 1859 or 1860:

"That power that brought me into life
Without my knowledge or consent,
Controled my acts by nature's power,
Through every change I underwent,

"Now calls for that which first it gave.
I cannot stay its sovereign power;
Nature exhausted sinks away,
And calmly waits the closing hour.

"Whether I sink to calm repose,
Or wake to conscious life again,
I hav no means this side the grave
With certainty to ascertain.

"I'll trust the power that gave me life;
I'll fear no evil at its hand;
And should I liv beyond the tomb,
I trust to find a happy land."

I think the above deserves a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and would be appreciated by its many readers. S. D. SAYLES.

SIOUX FALLS, D. T., Dec. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Although I am an old friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, our personal acquaintance is but slight. Yet you doubtless remember me from last spring, myself and wife having called on you, then on our way to Norway, our old nativ home, for a visit. I expected to call on our return, but when we did so in September, we had not the opportunity, on account of having a lot of emigrants under our charge, and had to get them to their destination as soon as possible. So we stayed but a few hours, and hurried on home.

I hav tried hard the last month to get up a club for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hav at last succeeded. I hav had pretty hard work to do it. Last winter I went to work and got as many as fifteen subscribers for the Liberal Age, started in Milwaukee. They got two, three, and some four numbers, and then the Age went up the spout; hav heard nothing more of it. Whether it died a natural death or otherwise we know not. I presume you can explain it. However, it has made it all the harder to get subscribers now. But by a great deal of talking and persuasion, and at such low rates as two dollars, I hav had the satisfaction of getting new subscribers. To do the work for nothing and pay the expenses and postage I shall gladly do any time, for my reward is the satisfaction I hav in seeing that my efforts hav at least some good effect. Several others hav promised to subscribe as soon as they could spare the money. Besides renewing my own subscription I send nine new names. Inclosed find $20 for the same. Yours, N. S. JOHNSON.

[We hav a pleasant remembrance of friend Johnson, and should hav been pleased to hav a hand-shake on his return. His account of his work for Liberalism among his neighbors was highly interesting. That it has borne good fruit is amply attested by the list of new subscribers he sends us, for which he has our thanks, and likewise those of our associate, Mr. Somerby. There need be no fear of THE TRUTH SEEKER suspending, as did the Liberal Age, at least not while it has friends like Mr. Johnson. The immediate cause of the suspension of the Age is not known to us.—ED. T. S.]

GLOBE, ARIZONA, Dec. 15, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Being an occasional reader of your valuable paper, I will drop you a few scattering thoughts that may be of interest to some of your many readers. I happened to be in attendance at one of the churches here a few Sundays ago, and was very much interested in the minister's endeavor to harmonize Genesis with modern thought.

He said he did not think six literal days were meant in saying that the world was created in six days. His opinion was that a "day" was calculated to represent a period of perhaps many thousands of years. I was so impressed with this that a few days after I called his attention to that particular portion of his able discourse.

Said I: "How can you read the first chapter of Genesis and make 'days' read 'periods?'" I then quoted Genesis i, 5: "And God called the light day, and the darkness he called night. And the evening and the morning was the first day." Now, how any reasonably intelligent person can make that reading mean a period, is to me a great mystery. The separating the light from the darkness, and calling the light day and the darkness night, ought to convince any person not wedded to bigotry and creed that a period is not meant, but that it is simply a mythical humbug, handed down, as were the majority of the old biblical stories, as something awful and very mysterious. And for further evidence follow on through the six days of the alleged creation; at the end of each day's work it reads: "And the evening and the morning was the second day," and so on through the six days.

It strikes me that the mind of the great Jehovah was very soon and easily changed, for in the last verse of the first chapter of Genesis it says: "And God saw all he had made, and behold it was very good." And in the fifth chapter, twenty-third verse, he curses the ground. Indeed I hav very great sympathy for people who worship such a deity.

Now, if periods were meant in the first chapter of Genesis, we will turn to the seventh chapter and see how periods would answer for days—for if periods were meant in one case they certainly were in the other. Gen. vii, 10: "And it came to pass after seven days that the waters of the flood were upon the earth." Now, does that mean seven periods? Eleventh verse: "And in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month," etc. Was that the seventeenth period of the month? And again—12th verse: "And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights." Now, was that forty periods, of perhaps hundreds of thousands of years each? If so, it was without doubt the most protracted spell of wet weather known to ancient or modern times. And yet a little further, in the 8th chapter and 6th verse: "And it came to pass at the end of forty days," etc. Same chapter, 10th verse: "And he stayed yet another seven days, and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark." 12th verse: "And he stayed yet another seven days, and sent forth the dove, which returned not again to him any more." 13th: "And it came to pass in the six hundredth and first year, in the first month, and the first day of the month," etc. 14th: "And in the second month, on the seven and twentieth day of the month, was the earth dried."

Now, after so many references to the days and months, can any reasonably intelligent man or woman believe for a moment that a day meant ..

period? I am bold to say that I do not believe it, and am proud that we liv in an age in which the mind is not shackled, and that we are free to think and free to discuss these differences. If I do not choose to believe in a certain book, I hav a perfect right to say so; and if I choose to say that I believe Jesus Christ was an illegitimate child, and that Mary his mother was not a virgin, I hav a perfect right to say so, and science bears me out in the assertion, and there are no fiery fagots awaiting me for blasphemy.

And right here I would say, All thanks to Thomas Paine for the great fundamental principles embodied in our beloved constitution, forever separating church and state. The words, "We, the people," hav secured to us for all time rights and privileges of which no church or priesthood can ever rob us. The rack, the dungeon, and the flames of Smithfield are things of the long ago. And to whom should we be thankful that those fearful days are past? Not the church—no; for that was the work of the church. But it is to such men as Thomas Paine, Spinoza, and others. Noble men they were, too—men who sought their knowledge in many languages and many climes. To them we owe a debt we can never pay. So let us keep the ball of Freethought rolling; write it, speak it, organize societies, publish papers, and send out lecturers to herald the glad tidings from one end of this fair land to the other. Get out of the old ruts of ignorance and superstition, and shake the stale dust of orthodoxy from your feet forever.

Colonel Ingersoll has done noble work in the lecture field and with the pen. THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing nobly, too, and I think the day is looming up in the near future when there will be fewer churches built, and more school-houses, and more play-houses; and that the army of lazy loafers who fill the pulpits throughout our country will be obliged to go to work to earn their bread, instead of peddling their superstitions for a livelihood.

I hav much more that I could and would like to say, but presume that I hav already taken up too much of your valuable space, and will say in conclusion that there is a club being gotten up here for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as the single copy that is taken here is read and reread until worn out. If this does not find its way to the waste basket, you may hear mas en lotro tiempo.

ANOKA, MINN., Dec. 20, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I send postal order for $3—$2 50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER to May, 1885. and the balance for "Clergyman's Victims" and "Crimes of Preachers." I wish all of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER could see one thing that comes with the paper, and occasionally reminds them of an important duty. It is the tag on their paper, which informs them when the subscription price is due, and which should be promptly attended to. Mine has always been so plain that I hav never allowed the date to pass by without responding to the tacit call, and I don't believe I ever shall. I hav great respect for a man who promptly pays his debts when due.

Yours truly, W. S. RING.

OSWEGO CENTER, N. Y., Dec. 20, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3. Fifty cents is a present to you—to buy your baby something for Christmas—and the balance to pay my fare a while longer on your (our) noble ship, THE TRUTH SEEKER—"long may it wave." I am the only one, as far as I know, who subscribes for it in our town, and as long as it is published I defy "all hell" to stop my reading of it. Oh! I feel it my duty to tell you of some of the "mischief" it is doing here. We hav a good-natured, and doubtless well-meaning, minister, who has been preaching the everlasting gospel of Methodism to us for more than twenty years. I used to keep him supplied with TRUTH SEEKERS, and I noticed that he would often "speak right out in meetin'" some of its most radical sayings. doubtless without thinking where he got them. Now to cut my story short. Things got worse and worse, and, by Jove! he's quit preaching. The doctor said his throat was bad. I say THE TRUTH SEEKER made him ashamed of his creed. Selah!

I send a few names of those who ought to hav sample copies. Most of them probably never heard of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Perhaps some will subscribe. At all events, it will advertise the paper, and I'll warrant it to raise the devil in this orthodox camp.

A. H. WALKER.

ATLANTA, TEXAS, Dec. 18, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, 25 cents for your new almanac, and the same for the Agnostic Annual. I would send some names for sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER but for two reasons, one being that our post-master is an ignorant bigot, and, I believe, destroys all such mail matter, and the other reason is, I find in the community where I liv not more than one Infidel in fifty—or I might say one hundred—persons who is a Liberal, or who has back-bone enough to be seen with a Liberal paper, although they will borrow and read secretly all they can get. I hav circulated books and pamphlets all around me, and the effects are showing themselvs. I am denying myself every luxury, and many of the necessities, to do this, and expect to keep at it so long as I liv and can spare a dollar for that purpose. I am now in my seventy-third year, and hav been only freed from superstition and slavery a few years. Yours for universal mental liberty, J. B. EVERETT.

THE SALAMANCA MEETING.

Are we ready to readjust; what avails all our elaborate special pleadings—judgment must be given on the facts.

All the world's a stage; to a lawyer all he world's a court; as suitors, as workers, the great point to remember is that by the eternal laws of nature are given facts, and the pleadings must be readjusted to meet the facts.

Creeds are but notions we hav got in our heads and must be readjusted. How little this reverend gentleman realizes the extent of the readjustment required. When you hav settled your ideas about God and the formation of the world, you will hav settled what you should do about readjustment.

The corner stone of our theological system must be readjusted to harmonize our views of the world with the facts of science.

Herbert Spencer, in the January number of Science Monthly, in an article entitled "Principles of Sociology," says, "The old conception of deity is untenable." Such passages are verdicts for human reason. Readjustment must be fundamental. The reverend clergyman can never stay the tide until he changes his conception of God to what the facts warrant.

The world, as he knows it, infinit and insoluble as it appears to be to us, is the only conception of God we hav. Earth is all the face God has. His attempt to attribute to God human pain, is to put forward claims which are frauds. All pretended revelation is without foundation of science, and all who get money by it hav no longer any excuse to perpetrate the fraud.

Upon the acceptation of science rests all real advancement. We shall never hav just government until the Bible conception of God is eradicated from the popular mind.

Pope and priest alike claim to derive their powers from the will of God—by the grace of God, powers that, he loves to reiterate, are by the grace of God—man is a creature of God—and to be ruled by the holy servants of God; but this view is passing away; reverence for all such claims is diminishing. True and pure republicanism, like the mighty, rising, rushing river, is sweeping them away.

God is the world, order is law that science reveals. Society depends on consent of the governed; the only purpose of government should be to promote happiness and the best good of mankind. When readjusted to this, its legitimate functions, a different political, industrial, and moral world will inevitably result.

The people must be awakened to the great question of change from the present theological to moral, scientific, and pure republican basis. We hav got to readjust even the constitution itself, ere long. Surely all can see the necessity of adjustment when we hav our entire government wholly controled by a few politicians; a plan of government that has a senate of capitalists who stand in the way of and deny the claims of labor and defeat the popular will.

We must hav readjustment, one legislativ body, one congress, who shall select the chief executiv; do away with the one man power and patronage, and reduce the whole system of government into a single congressional district.

In regard to our industrial interests in war, the soldier is of first consideration, is top of the heap; so laborers are entitled to first consideration, to be top of the heap in times of commerce, peace, and industry. All people under international law should be regarded as members of one social family, each of the generation of men to be considered as fathers of the future. We need new adjustments to meet our new social needs.

Old creeds are dying almost too fast; new equities are thrown upon us before our people are ready for the them; the people need to be educated to meet the emergency.

In the days of Cromwell, liberty and self-government, entire reforms from the grace of God, kings, and holy and most reverend prelate's dictation, were offered to the people, but they were not educated to the necessary condition to be advantaged by the opportunity offered; it took another century to teach the lesson, which should hav made their parliament permanent in the days of Cromwell.

The French needed education to meet the opportunity of readjustment. There was no necessity of Napoleon's despotism. But the people knew nothing of education to the great issues presented them, and fell victims to the Corsican freebooter. What will enlighten the world is education; know what liberty is, and that it can only be preserved by placing it on the fundamental equity of the age. You ask what can do it? The Northern states must become the schoolmasters, as Athens was to Greece.

We must not be content to tear down the old; we must put the new and better in its place. Let us not despise the day of small things. We hav a few newspapers devoted to higher equity and the republic of man. We hav one society, the nucleus of great things. I mean our National Liberal League, with its many auxiliary Leagues, with their perhaps now little educating powers, yet destined to do great work, for they are the seat of great equity which will eventually dominate, and through their influence lead to a higher morality than churches, to a higher ruler, an individual sense of right,

We are beginning a great movement, and each and all should make earnest effort to help forward the car of progress. There should be in every village a society. We want to circulate Liberal literature, inaugurate Liberal clubs. Do not attempt too much at first; form clubs to circulate Liberal literature, then hold occasional discussions, hav little theatrical and other amusements.

Do not be frightened by the advance ideas; do not be afraid of the future, but study, so you may be ready to take part and do good work in the readjustment when the time comes. Meet often together; hold your conventions and consult together; get out of the old darkness, but ever remember new light brings new obligations. Our future will be what we make it; the duty of the present generation is to put a better generation to follow it. Do not be daunted by opposition, abuse, or misrepresentation; press onward, and think of your Liberalism as a new order of nobility.

There was deep interest evinced in the address, and the earnest eloquence of the speaker sent home his facts to the mind, and made permanent impression on his audience, retiring amidst enthusiastic applause. After singing by the choir, and the great Thanksgiving song by H. H. Hall, the president pronounced the benediction, and so closed this most enjoyable, profitable, and memorable convention.

ONE of the best ways to help along the cause of Freethought is to circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER. Trial subscriptions of three months for 50 cents.

Mr. Preston Again Taken to Task.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am not easily wrought up to the labor of writing when it is so much more of a luxury to recline and read on a Saturday night; but the article on vivisection, contributed to THE TRUTH SEEKER by Elliott Preston, stirs me to a few lines in opposition. It is not a subject upon which I would wish at present to enter into a lengthy discussion, and so I will merely present the uppermost thought in mind, which is, in form of interrogation, why will people "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel," by working themselvs into a fury on so small an evil—if evil it be—as vivisection, when in the matter of cruelty to animals, there are evils so much more monstrous in the line of sport and butchery? It is as though one should turn from the horrors of a battle-field to shed tears with a child that had stubbed its toe, or listen heedlessly to the report of great loss of life at a fire in a factory and wax wroth over the spilling of hot water on a cat's back. If one will set about to reform abuses in a certain direction, let him proclaim against the most prevalent.

Mr. Preston says, "Some approximate idea of the prevalence of the practice of vivisection may be had when we reflect that entire factories have been devoted to the production of vivisecting implements, and special laboratories hav been and are being added to many prominent colleges for the furtherance of the study of this department of physiology."

The first statement reads like a great exaggeration, but however much of truth there be in it, it is equally true that for every instrument made for purposes of vivisection, there are at least one thousand pistols, shot-guns, and rifles turned out for the sporting world, and for every animal that suffers at the surgeon's hands, probably ten thousand die for "sport." It is also true that for every special laboratory for vivisection, there are a thousand slaughter-houses where butchery of the most revolting description goes on with the regularity with which all these soft-hearted anti-vivisectors eat their steak and mutton.

Furthermore, it is susceptible of proof that vivisection is just as useful and necessary as is sporting and butchery: and if all are necessary evils, it will be difficult—in fact, impossible—for the anti-vivisectors to prove that of the three, vivisection is not carried on with the most effort at mitigation of pain and suffering.

From this point my thoughts run on easily to the vast domain of necessary evils, and to that "one general law leading to the advancement of all organic bodies—multiply, vary, let the strongest liv and the weakest die," of which I hav just read in the items of the first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER—Darwin's remark upon "Instinct." But this is a subject large enough to let alone at a late hour in the evening, and I will not pursue it further than to say that if it is right for man, with his reasoning and humane faculties, to rise above the order of the brute creation, the first step in this direction should be to relinquish his instinct for preying, (which he now follows out in sporting, and butchering for food); whereas the pursuit of knowledge which shall increase his power to mitigate pain in both men and animals, by understanding their anatomy, physiology, and pathology, is for the advancement of progress, science, and humanity. Jews and Agnostics.

From the Universe.

Why some of the Jewish journals should manifest a spirit of bitterness toward the Agnostic press is to us unaccountable. In recent numbers of the American Israelite (Cincinnati) brief editorials sneeringly alluded to Agnostics. We greatly regret that our esteemed friend, Rev. Dr. Wise, should pen such uncharitable articles. He is himself a Rationalist, and he may remember that orthodox Jewish journals and writers hav boldly denounced him as a "Meshumed" (Infidel). The New York Hebrew Leader seems to glory in "the decadence of the Agnostic press," and the New York TRUTH SEEKER, an Agnostic journal of very extensiv circulation, replies in scorching terms to its Hebrew contemporary, charging it with "poltroonery," and adds that Alderman Morris, a responsible man in the Leader, may be pandering to his Catholic and Protestant colleagues in the Board. We hav to say that the Agnostic press has ever shown itself to be the stanch and true friend of the Jews, and for proof of this we proudly refer to the columns of the Universe, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other Agnostic journals. Do not Rabbi Wise and Alderman Morris know that the Jews hav already enough of enemies. What mental blindness induces them to try to make more?

WE would inform the Saratoga Eagle that the Christian Advocate is a blackguard sheet—as full of bigotry as a nut is of meat. But perhaps our able contemporary knows this fact already.—Banner of Light.

Is it possible that our Boston friends can mean the same Christian Advocate that Dr. Buckley edits—the official organ of the Methodist church?

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

The Wolf and the Ewe.

Once upon a time great friendship
'Twixt a wolf and ewe there reigned;
What saint's influence wrought such marvel
Has not rightly been explained.

She forgot the guardian shepherd,
Fold, flock, dog, she all forsook,
And her way with her new comrade
Through the tangled thicket took.

Whilst she with her fellows pastured,
Gentle she as turtle dove;
But her new friend quickly taught her
Cruel as himself to prove.

And when the ferocious tutor
Saw the poor perverted fool
Make so marvelous a progress
In his brutalizing school,

Vanity with pleasure mingled,
Till his heart within him danced;
And his fondness for his pupil
Every murderous scheme enhanced.

But one day that, almost famished,
Master Wolf, pursued the chase,
Of the victims he was seeking
He discovered not a trace.

Mountain, valley, plain, and forest,
Up and down, and through and through,
Vainly he explored; then empty
To his den led back his ewe.

There, his weary limbs outstretching,
On the ground awhile he lies;
Then upon his weak companion
Ravenously turns his eyes.

Thus the traitor inly muses:
"Ne'er was known such agony!
And must I endure these tortures?
Must I out of friendship die?

"Shall I not obey the mandate,
Nature speaks within my breast?
And is not self-preservation
Nature's holiest behest?

"Virtue, thou belong'st to reason—
Let proud man confess thy sway!
I'm by instinct merely governed,
And its dictates must obey."

Thus decided, swift as lightning,
Springs he on the hapless ewe;
Fangs and claws, deep in her bosom
Plunging, stains a crimson hue.

With a trembling voice, the victim
Questions her disloyal friend:
"Why, ingrate, should'st thou destroy me?
When, or how, could I offend?

"By what law, art thou so cruel,
Since I never gave thee cause?"
Greedily, he cried, "I'm hungry;
Hunger is the first of laws."

Mortals, learn from an example
With such horrid sufferings fraught,
What dire evils an alliance
With the false and cruel brought.

If the wicked are our comrades,
I engage you'll imitate
Half their crimes, and will encounter
Wolves like ours, or soon or late.

Neighbor Brightside.

Not a great distance from the town of Buffalo, in Wyoming, away in the far West, there is a place called Red Bank. In a little irregular valley, tucked snugly in the bank, stands a cunning little cabin, all alone by itself. A clear mountain stream winds its way toward the rising sun, whose noonday rays light up and warm the cabin front, while westward the snow-capped peaks of the Big Horn mountains shut out the last flickering rays of the setting sun. North and south the foothills come sloping down from the base of the mountains, and shut out a view of hills and plains. The furniture of the cabin consists of rough bedsteads, several stools and boxes, which do duty as chairs, a table with a blanket for a cover, a lamp, and a chest of tools. A cupboard constructed out of a shoe-box contains some dishes, besides pots, kettles, and frying-pans. The walls are ornamented with pictures cut from newspapers and magazines, and a well-filled bookcase hangs in a conspicuous place near a gun-rack. The cellar, as well as the rear portion of the cabin, extends back into the bank, and is well stocked with potatoes, onions, cabbages, etc.

The inhabitants of this cabin are John and Pete, Papa Hunter, and Jim.

"What!" you ask, "are there no 'women folks' there at all?"

No, none at all. Papa Hunter is the father of John and Pete, and Jim is a rambler who, for the present, makes his home with them, and, besides doing a deal of reading, writing, and thinking, also does the cooking.

"The cooking?"

Why, yes; men can cook—didn't you know it? And although I hav never tasted any of Jim's masterpieces in the culinary art, yet I feel quite sure I would never go hungry if Jim were around.

Jim is a great, tall, broad-shouldered, six-footer, with an eye like an eagle's, and the beard of a brigand. John and Pete go off hunting nearly every day, and sometimes bring in a large quantity of game. One day they brought in six rabbits, besides grouse and ducks. Sometimes they kill a deer, and then they feast on venison, and once in a great while they bring in a bear.

As John and Pete sat, not long ago, stringing some beads that they had cut from a pair of old moccasins to make a necklace for the cat, who lay purring at their feet, and their father was reading about Circassia and the beautiful Circassian girls, while Jim prepared a duck for dinner, there came all at once a gentle tap on the outer door.

"Who in the world can that be?" said John, hastily surveying himself in the little mirror tacked against the wall. Papa Hunter ran his fingers through his hair, Pete let the string of beads fall, and most of them slipped off on the floor, and broad-shouldered Jim paused from his work and sighed wearily.

"Go to the door, Pete," said John.

"You go, John," said Pete.

"You're the nearest," drawled John, measuring the distance with his eye.

"I never saw such boys in all my life," exclaimed Papa Hunter. "What ails ye?"

"Nothin' ails me," said John, "but Pete, there, is lazy."

"No more lazy than you are," and Pete began to look pouting, as he picked up the bright-colored beads.

While this talk was going on, the door opened, and in stepped the loveliest little body you ever saw. Her face was all smiles, and when she laughed the cabin glowed like a sunrise, and seemed filled with the sweetest and most delicious music.

They all looked at each other, but nobody spoke a word for a whole minute, and then Papa Hunter said, "It isn't an angel, is it?"

"Well, if I am an angel I havn't any wings, hav I?" and the little body turned herself around, but no one saw any sign of a wing.

"Maybe she is a fairy," suggested Pete.

"Indeed she looks as if she might be," thought Papa Hunter.

But whatever or whoever she was, she was just full and brimming over with merriment and good nature. She skipped up to John and tickled his ear with a straw, at the same time pointing at Peter with the other hand, as if she knew how ticklish he was, and that he would laugh if you only pointed at him. This time he rolled on the floor in paroxysms of laughter, while the cat stood up and stretched till her frame assumed the appearance of a right-angled triangle. The laughing, gleeful little body then whisked past Papa Hunter, and dancing up to Jim, peered into his face, and inquired, "Is this you, Jeems?"

"Yes, it is I," he answered, with a doleful sigh. "And what's the matter with you? What makes you so—so—so—glum?" and she caught at a stray lock of hair hanging over his broad forehead.

"I don't know who you are, lady, but perhaps, if you had been bereft of all your heart held dear, had seen your home that you had established, the ties you had formed and the faces that had grown familiar, and as priceless as familiar, the accumulations of years of labor and waiting, all swept away at one fell swoop, and found yourself heartsore, homeless, and penniless, drifting out in the wide world all alone, maybe you would not feel quite so cheery."

"Maybe not; but is life then so wrong-side-out to you?"

"Yes, it is," he almost sobbed.

"And is all the sunshine blotted out?"

"Every bit."

"Courage all gone?"

"I havn't a thing to build a hope upon," he murmured sadly.

"Now, Jeems, that isn't so. You're mistaken, that's all."

"Where can you find a thread strong enough to hold a hope as small as yonder smallest bead?" said James, pointing to the beads that Pete began to pick up.

"Why, here," said the little body, patting Jim's head, "and here," brushing his arms, and snapping at his fingers. "In the first place, here you are in splendid health, physically, and health is the first requisit to happiness, and with two such hands and such a head, why need you fear? Why, it should be fun to battle with such elements and obstacles as confront you. I admit you hav had serious drawbacks, but it does not make them less by pining over them. As you went from Pueblo to the 'Queen City of the West,' and then floated to this quiet spot, you were all the while out of harmony with nature, with human beings, with yourself."

Jim sat down on the edge of the table, and stared at the little body who seemed to know so much of his wanderings.

"Now, Jeems," said she, "there's no use in crying over spilt milk, as the saying is. What is gone, is gone; you cannot hav it back again. It does not mend matters by dwelling on them. They can be mended, however, and made to be almost as good as new. The world is ever new, and there are ever new faces to see, new homes to be made, and a lot of fine gold to be gotten out of the earth. There are new thoughts to be coined, and new destinies to be carved, much work to be done, and some of which nobody can do so well as you yourself. Do you suppose, Jeems, you are the only one who has ever suffered? the only one who ever had the heartache? the only one who ever was treated unkindly by friend or fate? the only one who has felt that he would like to lie down and die if he only could?"

"I guess she means me when I had the colic that time," whispered Pete.

"More like she refers to me," said John, "when I stubbed my toe, and the nail turned all black and came off—don't you remember?" and he nudged Pete.

"Sca—t! Scat there!" exclaimed Papa Hunter. "What's that cat got there, Peter?"

"It's only the duck's gizzard, father; and she's making believe it's a mouse. See her play—look!"

They all looked and laughed, and the little body said, "Happy creature that it is, to gather crumbs of comfort from such a little thing as a gizzard! Take a lesson from the cat, and pick up the grains of happiness that lie at your hand."

"And make believe they're mine," said Jim, half smiling.

"Why yes, if so the fancy pleases you," said the little body. "At any rate, don't dwell among the shadows. I've seen a baby lying on the floor and catching at the sunbeams as they danced in at the window. We older babies can catch sunbeams if we will."

"What'll we bait our hooks with?" inquired Peter.

"Peace, good will, and good sense, dear boy," she answered. "You do well," she continued, turning to Jim, "to cuddle down on the bosom of Mother Nature when the world uses you ill. But now you've had your cry out, let the birds, the buds, and the blossoms, the sunlight and the stars overhead, coax you out of the depths, and into the gay, glad, joyous life once more. 'Experience is the best school,' and we learn in it as in no other. Experience brings us close to others, the experience of childhood brings us straight to the heart of every child in the universe, and so do the joys and sorrows of mature life bring us into fellowship with our humankind. In the morning the darkness goes away and the shadows flee before the light of day. In this little cabin home you may find the purest springs of happiness and joy.'"

"Who are you?" demanded Jim.

"Why, Jeems, don't you know me?"

"No, I don't."

Nor you, Papa Hunter, nor Peter, nor John—don't either of you know my name?"

"Naw!" said Peter and John together, while Papa Hunter shook his head.

"I'll tell you, then; I am your Neighbor Brightside, and I liv close by your little cabin home. If it were not for me you'd die, you, and all your folks, you'd die of the mopes, you would. I liv on the right side of your cabin, and my relatives always settle on the right of the human habitations. We believe in having plenty to eat and to drink, that is, of wholesome food and drink, and in having a happy time of it generally while journeying through the world, for we are the jolliest set of people you ever fell in with; all the Brightside folks are, and nobody was ever sorry for entertaining us. We do not borrow trouble—never did—and we get along better than if we did. And now I'll recite for you a piece, and I want you all to commit it to memory. It belongs to the Brightside family, and goes thus:

"Of all the maxims, old and new, the one I'd choose to giv
To those I wish with all my heart in happiness to liv—
To those whose motley path through life with roses I would strew,
Is—Never trouble trouble till trouble troubles
you.

"Take my advice—enjoy the hours, and work
and play with zest;
Don't run to meet dull care, my friend; you'll find it will be best
To greet with smiles the pleasant glance, and think all friends are true,
And never trouble trouble till trouble troubles
you.

"This life is short enough, dear friend, so try and make it sweet,
Be this your aim, and fragrant flowers shall grow about your feet;
And mirth shall take the place of grief, and joy the place of rue,
If you'll never trouble trouble till trouble troubles you.'"

They all clapped their hands, and Jim said "Miss Brightside, won't you please to stay to dinner?"

"That I will," she answered, "for I am so hungry, I could almost eat a meeting-house, it seems to me!" And she threw off her hat and shawl, and commenced to arrange the rough table for dinner, upsetting Peter's mug of cold coffee the first thing.

"Never mind!" said Peter, "it isn't broken.' 'Why, Pete!" she exclaimed, you're a regular Brightsider. That's the way we always say, when we make mistakes and blunders. 'Never mind, it isn't so bad as it might be.'"

"Oh, Miss Brightside, I wish you'd be our neighbor, always," said Papa Hunter.

"So I intend to be, and our folks are right jolly neighbors, I can tell you."

And then they sat down to dinner laughing and chatting, and all agreed that they had not been so happy before for a long time. The cabin glowed like a beautiful palace, for everywhere that Neighbor Brightside went she carried sunshine. "Why not?" she asked, "since all the world is flooded with it, and the Brightside family was ordained to scatter the same."

Correspondence.

A CUNNING LITTLE LETTER FROM A CUNNING LITTLE GIRL.

A Merry Christmas and Happy New Year to you Miss Wixon, and many thanks for the "Children's Corner" in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am a child of seven years, and I take quite an interest in the "Corner." I hav read every "Corner" as yet, and am much pleased, and long may you liv and hav plenty of stories. I like to see those that are right justly rewarded. My grandpapa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since I was born, and has held me on his knee and read from its pages many good things—too good and big for my little brain to take in. I suppose there hav many answered your puzzle, but the riddle I hav not made out yet. But the puzzle is Mississippi.

Yours with love for THE TRUTH SEEKER,

Answer to letter puzzle in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 22d:

Moving in majesty toward the south,
Increasing in power and size as it flows;
Summer and winter, with wide open mouth,
Swelled by the rains and the far mountain
snows;
Imposing and grand, in springtime and flood,
Seething and roaring its way to the sea,
Smiling so quietly, gentle, and good,
In the summer sun falling on river and lea.
Please note the description that meets with your eye,
Pen-pictures a river, whose name you descry
Is Mi-ss-i-ss-i-pp-i.

Answer to riddle in same number.

Take away one letter and I kill.
Take away another and I'm ill,
And will die unless I'm saved by skill.

Poetry.

The Puritan Sunday.

The following from London Truth is exceedingly applicable to the situation in this city at present. We commend it to the rampant sabbatarian bigots.

THE PHARISEE'S SABBATH.

"No," says the Rich Man, "there is no need
To grant the boon for which you plead;
The present state of things is best;
And Sabbath days are meant for rest;
The masses should their church attend,
And not their Sundays wish to spend
In gazing at fine works of art—
Six days for that are set apart.
I and my family go then,
And why should not these workingmen?
No, no, I can't and won't consent
To humor them to this extent!"

So cries our wealthy Pharisee—
But is he fit a judge to be?
Let's seek his home, and see the way
He spends his valued Sabbath day.
Kept by the Observer late in bed,
He dallies o'er a dainty spread,
Until his cozy brougham bears
Him swiftly off to morning prayers.
This duty over, 'tis not strange
He cares not galleries to range,
Or that he has so often posed
As one who'd keep Museums closed.

For in his mansion you will find
That wealth and taste hav both combined
To please his fancy. Flowers diffuse
Sweet odors and display bright hues;
His gaze on "things of beauty" falls,
For "masterpieces" deck his walls,
And statues in each nook are placed,
Books without number tempt his taste;
Nor do the charms of music fail
His jaded senses to regale,
When, after dinner's long delight,
Repletion follows appetite.

And should he weary, as in fact
He often does, to be exact,
Should he feel bored and change require,
His club supplies his heart's desire;
There he can go, smoke his cigar,
And muse how nice our Sundays are!
And as his pint of port he drinks,
State boldly what it is he thinks
Of those who hav so often tried
Museum doors to open wide,
And let the people find within,
Some cure for drunkenness and sin!

"The masses hav their homes!" cries he;
"What else they want I fail to see."
On which, still seeking change of view,
He takes his daughters to the Zoo,
And there deplores to some dear friend
How things t'ward Sabbath-breaking tend;
When inconsiderate people try
To Christianity defy,
By giving chances, if they can,
To every London artisan
To look at works of art on Sunday,
In spite of even Mrs. Grundy!

THE POOR MAN'S SUNDAY.

"The masses hav their homes!" 'tis true—
But if these homes we only knew,
Nay, could we only at them glance,
We should not wonder then, perchance,
That earnest men—good Christians, too—
Intend their efforts to renew,
Till, spite the cant of Pharisees,
The Law their long-asked boon decrees;
And London's toiling millions gain
The right, so long besought in vain,
To enter the Museum's door,
And Art's domains at length explore.

Let those who say there is no need
For that for which we strongly plead,
Come with us where yon workman dwells,
And hear the tale he grimly tells.
'Tis Sunday morning; on the air
There floats the call to praise and prayer.
But in this room, down underground,
They scarce can hear the bells' glad sound,
Or see the sun which brightly beams.
No, all is dark, and squalid seems,
For gloom is there, and Faith is dead,
And Hope herself has long since fled.

About the room pale children run
And cry for light, and air, and sun;
A weary mother vainly tries
To check her sad and heavy sighs;
Smoke clogs the close and clammy air;
Till, rising roughly from his chair,
The father throws his Reynold's down,
And hurries off with oath and frown,
To lounge about the streets until
The publican may work his will,
And with his poisonous liquor stay
The deadly dullness of the day.
Go, ask this man, and you will find,
Should he to answer be inclined—
There was a time his home was not
What now it is; that once his lot
Was brighter, and had well been made
A happy one with kindly aid.
Six days of labor made him yearn
For change of scene; he longed to turn
To higher aims; to leave the strife
And squalid level of his life,
And gain fresh strength, inspired by Art,
Anew on Life's hard way to start.

But Bigotry stepped in, and cried,
"Such pagan hopes must be denied!
A workingman, in any case,
Should learn that home's his proper place
On Sunday; there he ought to stay
When not at church; there pass the day
In pious thought, or reading through
The tracts we every week renew."
And Bigotry, alas to tell,
Has strength to still exert her spell;
Can still the path of Progress bar,
And lives of toiling millions mar.

SUNDAY AS IT SOON MUST BE.

Once let the fiat of the law
The stubborn bolts and bars withdraw
That shut the masses from the sight
Of what is beautiful and bright;
And great, indeed, the change will be
That we in toiling homes shall see!
Once let these earnest men prevail,
Whose fervid efforts never fail,
Which now so squalid is, and mean;
And many a dwelling, dark and sad,
Shall be with moral sunshine glad.

Think what a Sabbath then will mean
For those whose week-long fight is keen!
Think with what feelings new and strange
The toil-worn man will hail the change!
How he with bolder heart will rise
And help his wife, as she so tries
To make their children nice and neat,
"To go with father for a treat!"
Think how their prattle will delight
As they anticipate the sight,
And as with laughing eyes and heart
The cheerful party off will start!

No longer does the father yearn
Into the public-house to turn;
Its brazen welcome heeds he not,
He need not now become a sot,
An hour of comfort to secure;
Its glittering charms no longer lure,
But steadfastly he passes by
His former haunts without a sigh.
His children trotting at his side,
Their hopes and fears in him confide;
Whilst he walks on with head erect,
Proud in his new-born self-respect.

And then, the gallery gone through,
At home its treasures they review,
Talk of the charming things they've seen,
And wonder what it all can mean,
Till, senses pleased and thoughts refined,
They half forget that Fate's unkind,
And with fresh hope and courage new
Another week's hard toil pursue.
Who, then, dares say that perils lurk
In this great end for which we work?
Who dares contend that woes untold
From London these closed doors withhold?

Too long has Bigotry, we say,
Of publican made protege,
And tried his Sunday trade to save
By howling down as scandal grave
Each well-meant effort to secure
Sunday amusement for the poor!
But now, 'twould seem, the end is near,
The clouds begin to disappear;
And though the Pharisees rave on,
They know their power is well nigh gone;
Aye, know that Common Sense must win
This fight 'gainst Ignorance and Sin!

Its sixteen large pages are filled every week with scientific, philosophic, and Freethought articles and communications by the ablest Freethinkers in the country. It gives all the Liberal news, and keeps its readers posted on current secular and theological events. It is the armory from which hundreds draw their weapons in contests with priesthood. All the Liberal papers are good, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is

THE BEST AND LARGEST.

It is conducted in a broad and truly liberal spirit, and gives everyone a hearing upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the human race.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances nder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

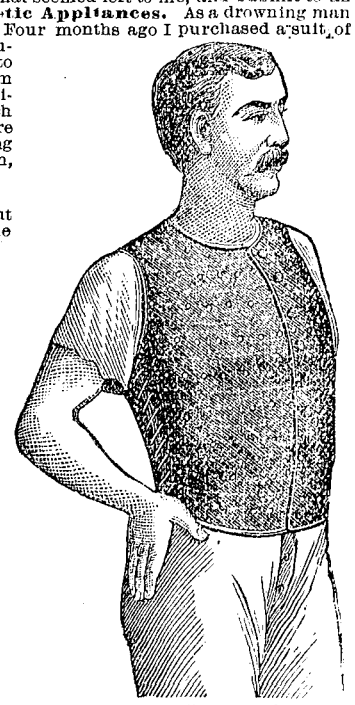
Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.



DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Children's garments upon application.

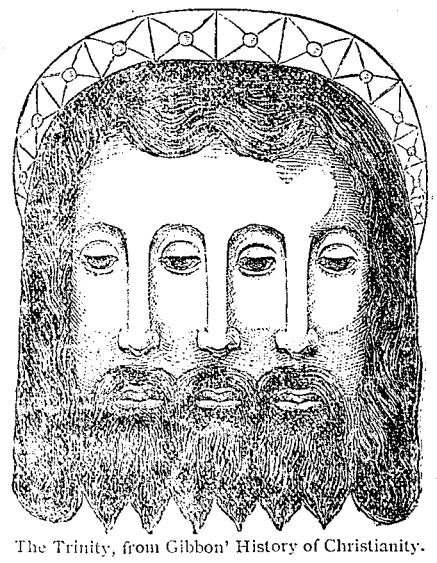
Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.



Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

Gems of Thought.

WE are not all called to perform great deeds and to accomplish proud achievements, but none of us are so humble but what we can do acts of kindness to those around us, and contribute, though in a small way, to the happiness of others. It is not our duty, however, to make ourselvs miserable that the happiness of others may be increased, nor to take the food from our own mouths to feed those who make no exertions for themselvs; but as a rule we will find that the more we contribute to the happiness of others the more we add to our own.—D. M. Bennett.

WE see, in the intellectual movements of our times, the tendency to expansion, to universality; and this must continue. It is not an accident, or an inexplicable result, or a violence on nature; is is founded on eternal truth. Every mind was made for growth, for knowledge; and nature is sinned against when it is doomed to ignorance. The divine gift of intelligence was bestowed for higher uses than bodily labor, than to make hewers of wood, drawers of water, plowmen or servants. Every being so gifted is intended to acquaint himself with God and his works, and to perform wisely and disinterestedly the duties of life. Accordingly, when we see the multitude of men beginning to thirst for knowledge, for intellectual action, for something more than animal life, we see the great design of nature about to be accomplished; and society, having received this impulse, will never rest till it shall hav taken such a form as will place within every man's reach the means of intellectual culture.—Dr. Channing's Present Age.

SOME of the most stirring men of the world, persons in the thick of business of all kinds, and indeed with the business of the world itself on their hands—Lorenzo de Medici for instance, who was at once the great merchant and the political arbiter of his time—hav combined with their other energies the greatest love of books, and found no recreation at once so wholesome and so useful. We hope many a man of business will refresh himself with the short pieces in these volumes, and return to his work the fitter to baffle craft, and yet retain a reverence for simplicity.—Leigh Hunt.

THE true law is everywhere spread abroad; it is constant and eternal. It calls us to duty by its commandments; it turns us away from wrong-doing by its probabilities. We can take nothing from it, change nothing, derogate nothing. Neither the senate nor the people hav the right to free us from it. It is not one thing at Rome, another at Athens; one thing to-day, and another to-morrow; but eternally and immutably the same law, embracing all times and all nations.—Cicero.

A VERY great number of people firmly believe that there never were in this world such people as themselvs, and that nobody ever did what they hav done, or come through what they hav come through. There is in almost every human being, and in none more decidedly than the most commonplace, a lurking belief that there never was such a being as himself. You will find this especially in the narrower and less cultivated minds. In them it often appears in forms that are irritating and ridiculous. You will find folk who really believe that they, and all their belongings, are much better than other folk, and their belongings; that there never were such children as theirs; that there never were such flowers and vegetables as theirs; and even—for there is no reckoning the odd ways in which human vanity will gratify itself—that there never were such headaches and such worries as theirs. All this comes of a morbid self-conceit. It is just the person who is below the average of the race who will fancy that he stands above all his fellow-creatures.—Counsel and Comfort by a Country Parson.

IN contrast to all the grosser interests that absorb us, Matthew Arnold pleads for a mental and spiritual perfection, which has two sides or prominent notes, beauty and intelligence; or, borrowing words which Dean Swift first used, and which since Mr. Arnold reproduced them hav become proverbial, "sweetness and light," an inward and spiritual activity in increased life, increased sympathy.—Principal Shairpe's Culture and Religion.

THAT original intelligence, say the Magians [the priests of Persia], who is the first principle of all things, discovers himself immediately to the mind and understanding alone; but has placed the sun as his image in the visible universe; when that bright luminary diffuses its beams over the earth and the firmament, it is a faint copy of the glory which resides in the higher heavens. If you would escape the displeasure of this divine being you must be careful never to set your bare foot upon the ground, nor spit into a fire, nor throw any water upon it, even though it were consuming a whole city. Who can express the perfections of the almighty? say the Mahometaus. Even the noblest of his works, if compared to him, are but dirt and rubbish. How much more must human conception fall short of his infinit perfections! His smile and favor render men forever happy; and to obtain it for your children the best method is to cut off from them a little bit of skin about half the breadth of a farthing. Take two bits of cloth, say the Roman Catholics, about as much as an inch and a half square, join them by the corners with two strings or pieces of tape about sixteen inches long; throw this over your head and make one of the bits of cloth lie upon your breast and the other upon your back, keeping them next your skin; there is not a better secret for recommending yourself to that infinit being who exists from eternity to eternity.—Hume's Essays.

To pagan learning the Christians generally had the strongest aversion. Among the monks, when they were under the vow of silence, it was customary with them, in asking for any pagan work, to make a particular sign, which consisted in scratching the ears like a dog, to which animal it was thought the pagan should be compared. In this manner they expressed an itching for three dogs, Virgil, Horace, and Ovid.—Underwood's Lectures and Essays.

"What a Piece of Work is Man!"

WHAT A VALUABLE JOURNAL IS "MAN,"

THE EXPONENT OF THE PRINCIPLES OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

It is Published Weekly at one dollar per Annum.

T. B. WAKEMAN and T. C. LELAND, Editors. Elizur Wright, Parker Pillsbury, James Parton, Courtlandt Palmer, S. P. Putnam, Osborne Ward, H. B. Brown, Dr. T. S. Lambert, Mrs. H. S. Lake, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, and other well-known writers, contributors.

MAN is every inch a man, and dares to say and do whatever becomes a man.

MAN is a man among men, hail fellow, honest, above board, and encourages other men to the same high standard.

MAN is a live man; works to raise up more live men, promotes the interests of live men, and has no mission nor message for the dead.

MAN is a friend of the poor man—"A man's a man for a' that" and takes the side of the Man of mills against the man of millions.

MAN is an honest man; carries in his pocket of principles the "Philosopher's Stone"—PAY AS YOU GO! and demands that churches, ministers, and millionaires shall pay their taxes as honest men do.

MAN is a free man, and demands equal rights in the public schools and equal privileges on the first, seventh, or any day of the week.

MAN is a temperate man, but proposes to be so on his own motion, not on compulsion—because he knows enough to be so himself, not because the church is inspired from on high to force him.

MAN is a man of the world—this world—and one world at a time. The whole planet is his interest, his constituency, and his care.

MAN is a fearless, determined man.

"Whether on the gallows high, or in the battle's van,
The fittest place for man to die is where he dies for man.

But this MAN—our MAN—though "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," was not born to die. He tried recently, and couldn't. He was slightly slain "in the battle's van," but he came to life again; and now, dear reader, he asks you for a dollar for your instruction and his support.

MAN is the special organ of organization. He teaches organization, preaches organization, and works for organization as the chief ark of safety for laborers and Liberals, and the strongest force with which to meet the old organizations for the promotion of theology, tyranny, and the dissemination of useless knowledge.

MAN includes woman; is the best friend of woman, and works for her development, her just position.

In short, among the "New Political Forces" MAN is one of the Forces, and is armed for the organization of a new party and the coming struggle with the old parties.

Every reader with the least reform and progress in him should send at once for MAN. Every reader with none at all, should send and get some in him, and start right on the road to progress.

Odds and Ends.

A TRAMP who was presented with a dime in Boston last week was found dead the following morning. "Killed by cultured gratitude," was the verdict of the coroner's jury.

WHAT a command of words some men hav! It took nineteen newspaper lines, or one hundred and fifty-two words, to hold a single sentence of Evarts to the effect that the wires must not come down.

IT must be nice to be a farmer with nothing to do all winter but lie back in the chimney corner and drink cider and tell lies about the tough storms of his boyhood, when he used to walk seven miles to school.

AT a New Jersey wedding the broad aisle of the church was covered with autumn leaves. Somebody let them fall out of a Bible, probably. You can't be too careful how you search the scriptures during the leaf-pressing season.

"ZAMPILACROTATIONIST" is the name which some one says is the correct one to apply to a roller-skater. This will make the exercise more dangerous than ever, for if one falls on that name it will break every bone in his body.

"NO," said Mr. Grinnell, "I can't understand it. Snaggs' wife is dead but he doesn't seem to show the least signs of grief; and yet he'll hav to get up and build his own fire, and split his own wood now. I can't understand his heartlessness.

"WHY was Washington the father of his country?" asked a Philadelphia teacher of a small pupil. "Because," was the patriotic reply, "he disdained to liv in New Jersey; and in emigrating to Pennsylvania he crossed the Delaware on the ice.

Two colored women were baptized in the James river. One submitted quietly, while the other came up out of the water all excitement, shouting, "I saw Gabr'l! I saw Gabr'l, right in the bottom ob de ribber! Bress my heart for dat vishon ob glory." "Hush your mouf, Dilsey," said the less excitable one: "dat was nuffin but a big tarrapin. I done see dat myself."

A BOARDING-HOUSE keeper was surprised to see one of her boarders, one morning, take the butter from the plate and knock it around the table with his fork. "What are you doing that for?" she asked. "Madam," replied the boarder, "this butter is so very strong that I find it necessary to weary it a little before eating, or it would knock out my stomach in the first round."

A SCOTCHMAN who arrived in Little Rock, while the ladies were going around with the petitions with a view to the enforcement of the temperance law, was approached by an enthusiastic woman who requested his signature. He did not understand and she explained that an enforcement of the law prohibited a saloon within three miles of a church. "I dona much aboot it, but I dinna ken but 'twould be cheaper to move the kirks than the whisky-shops," and with this idea of public expenditure he refused to sign the petition.

"WHOSE grave is this?" said a gentleman while strolling through a cemetery. "That," said his companion, "is the grave of Mr. Taggleworth." "Is that so? Why, hang it, he owed me ten dollars. I am the most unfortunate man in the world. I needed that money. Hello! Who hav we here?" "Mr. Zulkin, who died the other day." "Well, that's encouraging. I owed him twenty dollars. Made ten dollars by the two transactions. Arkan saw's a pretty good country after all."

ORTHOGRAPHICAL.

A young lady said to her beau.
"I'm glad the sneau's coming down seau,
Because now, I kneau,
We'll a sleigh-riding geau,
So hail to the beautiful sneau!"

The youth shook his head and he sighed,
"I'm sorry," he sadly replighed;
"I can't hire a sleigh,
For I'm dead-broke to-deigh,
And the pleasure to us is denighed."

"WELL, my child," said a fond father to his little daughter, after she had been to church, "what do you remember of all the preacher said?" "Nothing," was the timid reply. "Nothing!" he exclaimed in a severe tone. "Now, remember, the next time you must tell me something of what he says, or you will hav to be punished." Next Sunday the child came home with her eyes all wild with excitement. "I remember something to-day, papa," she cried eagerly, "I am very glad of it," said her father. "What did he say?" He said: "'A collection will now be made!'"

"GOOD morning, Brother Bony. Has you any gift to gib de Lawd dis mawnin'?" "Yes, parson, sartin I has, heah's a dollah." And he pulled out an old greasy pocketbook from which he fished out a greasier greenback and reached it toward the expectant parson. Drawing it back again he said: "Does you expect to see de Lawd, yourself, parson?" "Course I does," said the preacher. "When will yer run acrost him, d'ye tink?" "Oh! some time in de sweet bimeby," responded his reverence. "Well, den," said Bony, "I jes keep dis greenback till de sweet bimeby, an' han' it to he myself," and he stowed it away.

"BRUDDER Moses as you is pastor ob our church, I tinks you might use your 'fluence to git me a diworce from dat wicked man ob mine," and the good sister of the colored church wiped something from her eyes with her apron. "Cant't do it; can't do it, sister. 'What God has jined togedder let no man put asunder.' Doan yer forgit dat." "But God didn't jine us togedder, Brudder Moses. We was married by de 'squire." "And what did yer pay de 'squire to marry yer?" Two dollars; and Alexander put in a hundred bushels ob coal for de 'squire to pay it." "Well, den; gin me two dollars cash in advance, what it cost yer to git married, an' I'll use my 'fluence to git ye unmarried agin. Remember dat what dat kind ob man hab put togedder, God ken put asunder; but de cash down is de necessary 'quivalent, and doan yer forgit it."

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 11. No. 3. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, January 19, 1884. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE wealth of the United States is given by Bradstreet's as $43,642,000,000.

KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, the philanthropist, and the prompter of the Brahmo-Somaj sect in India, is dead.

A PROHIBITORY amendment has been introduced at Albany, and very appropriately referred to the Committee on Internal Affairs.

PILGRIMAGES to the tomb of King Victor Emanuel of Italy took place last week. More than sixty thousand people were in the procession.

MR. BEECHER, remarks the World, is a happy sort of preacher. No Bible can tell him to regulate his theology or his public lectures. He is his own bishop.

A BROOKLYN jury has found the Rev. Mr McCarthy, Roman Catholic priest, guilty of criminal assault on Miss Bridget E. Cronin, Roman Catholic dupe, and awarded her six cents damages. What a valuable character a Roman Catholic must hav!

THE judge in the Higbie-Vaughan case decides that there is nothing binding about a mock marriage, but he doesn't mean that sort of mock marriage where they swear to protect and cherish, and love, honor, and obey, and then do just the opposit.

IN a lecture the other evening Dr. Howard Crosby definitivly announced that the garden of Eden was located at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates. Mr. Crosby should hav a medal for his scholarship, and be rewarded with a Sunday-school book for his credulity.

INGERSOLL'S lectures are among the literature the government furnishes the keeper of the Presque Isle lighthouse in Lake Erie, who is isolated from his fellows nearly eleven months out of the twelve. They are read more than the set of hymn-books with which the impartial selecter accompanied them.

THE religious question is now to the fore in Japan. The Buddhist faith has been formulated so as to present an opposing front to the whole series of Christian doctrin. A training-school for the indoctrination of young Japanese in Buddhism has been established. A Buddhist journal advertises Paine's "Age of Reason" as an annihilating answer to Christianity.

THE Nineteenth Century contains an article by Mr. Barclay, M.P., taking an entirely new view of the Mormons. He highly eulogizes their socialistic system, and strongly condemns any attempt at interference with their propaganda. Two Mormonite elders are said to hav offered Victor Hugo two young damsels, after the manner of King David when "he gat no heat," an offer which the venerable French poet declined.

THE number of insane in the various institutions of New York on Sept. 30, 1883, was 11,270. Of this number 5,015 were males and 6,255 females. The total given above is 827 in excess of the insane reported for the year ending Sept. 20, 1882. The number of state paupers under care on Oct. 1, 1882, was 163. There remained on Oct. 1, 1883, under care, 189. Of these 158 were in the state almshouses, 28 in state insane asylums, and 3 in orphan asylums.

BY means of a false key the patent padlock on the door of Santo Domingo church, in Panama, was picked recently, and the burglars carried off a silver crown, a gold ring set with five diamonds, a pair of earrings, a jeweled cross and other gewgaws used in female decoration, a silver chalice and cup, and five plated silver candelabra, each being about eighteen inches in hight. What business had gold rings and earrings in a church? If it had been a Methodist building, now, the wicked would hav hinted something about the woman in the case having to make a hasty exit; but the Catholic priests are vowed to chastity, and good Catholics hav assured us that they keep their vows

"THE exemption of churches, church property, and religious institutions from taxation, thereby forcing indirectly into their support persons who do not believe in their utility, is an outrage on the rights of all such persons, and a remnant of that religious despotism which once treated mankind as slaves, and robbed its victims, in the name of God, to build costly cathedrals and enable ecclesiastics to liv in luxury and ease." For the Index, that is a pretty vigorous expression.

THE Rev. Josephus Cook, whose lectures hav made Monday such a lugubriously blue day in Boston, took occasion the other night, in the course of remarks which reviewed mankind from Hull to Hindustan, to giv his views about American newspapers. He thinks that the editorials are generally bad, and that Sunday papers are bad, too. In the ample pages of the newspaper directory he can't find more than five journals—"over five," he says—"that a self-respecting American would recommend a foreign visitor to read." Is it possible, asks the Sun, that there are five American newspapers which admire the Rev. Josephus Cook even as he admires himself?

THE faithful are warned against the Rev. Marc Emory, alias the Rev. Dr. Vunclove. He is a fine-looking, well-dressed young man, and bears himself with traditional ministerial dignity. The Congregational church of Sugar Grove, Pa., lately employed him with great satisfaction to themselvs, and, it is presumed, to him, as he disappeared suddenly leaving large debts. Investigation shows him to hav been cosmopolitan in his theology, for he filled the pulpit of the Methodist church at Clifton, Ill., whence he departed, leaving a wife and two children. He made most elegant prayers, and on the subject of temperance he was eloquence personified. His conduct grieves the truly good.

LETTERS from Idaho prophesy trouble at the Cœur d'Alene gold mines next spring. The old mining law of Idaho guarantees to every miner twenty acres for his claim; but it is expected that 25,000 persons will go up to the mines in the spring, and unless new auriferous lands are discovered there will not be enough to go around, and the military force at Fort Cœur d'Alene will be insufficient to cope with the wrangling miners. A wealthy company is making extensiv preparations for a season of great activity, having already shipped to Lake Cœur d'Alene parts of a steamboat that is to be put together and made ready to run from the mines to Eagle City as soon as the lake is cleared of ice. Since the discoveries that were made last fall all has been conjecture as to the richness of the mines, for snow has accumulated there until it is from eight to ten feet deep.

A CHURCH paper tells this story: Uriah Wales has been in good and regular standing as a zealous member of a Coalton (Pa.) church for some thirty years. His wife used to amuse herself by satirizing her husband's religious notions and professions. One day he declared that if she "kept on" he would not speak to her again until she was converted. Mrs. Wales "kept on," and for ten years the consistent Uriah has taken no counsel with her whatsoever. Matters he had to say to her he said through his son or some third person. Last week Mrs. Wales was converted, and thereupon Mr. Wales rose up in meeting and told the story to any present who did not already know it; and then he turned and greeted his wife affectionately. Mrs. Wales, however, sprung back, and, rising in her seat, denounced her husband as extremely unregenerate because he had persevered in his resolution. "Walk out of that door," she said to him, "and pray to be a better man!" Uriah walked out meekly, and has not been seen since. It will doubtless not escape notice that the conversion of Mrs. Wales was not conduciv to that lady's improvement, for while for ten years, as a scoffer, she had meekly borne her husband's ungenerous and cruel treatment, as a Christian she could not contain herself for ten minutes, but proceeded straightway to fight and browbeat him. In finding Jesus she lost a husband, but considering the latter's worthless character, the exchange is probably about even.

THE population of Russia amounts to over a hundred millions, for which there are eighty-five bishops, over a hundred thousand other clergymen, and twenty-seven thousand monks and nuns. Of churches there are 41,058. In Russia, monks constitute the "black clergy," and the priests, whose marriage is obligatory, are called the "white clergy." To this day, convents not only predominate over but oppress parish churches. The bishop, a monk, is an absolute master of all the priests of his diocese. The synod, a monkish body, issues the rules for hundreds of thousands of married clergymen. The clerical schools, theological seminaries, and theological academies are superintended chiefly by monks. Though it is a special vow of Russian monks to observe poverty, chastity, and obedience, yet in fact they know no poverty, and their lot is not to obey but to command. It is the monks who reap the golden crop in Russia, while the priests, who do not take the vow of poverty and obedience, are condemned to perpetual poverty and to unconditional obedience.

THE congregation of a Methodist church of Brooklyn are excited and indignant over another disgraceful scandal, involving Mr. W. K. Trippler, formerly secretary of the Sabbath-school connected with the church, and a young lady teacher in the school. It is said that on last Christmas Day one of the principal young lady teachers in the school took leave of her scholars after the Christmas festival, telling them that she was going to Boston and would probably remain away for a long time. On the same day she exhibited to her parents, who are prominent members of the church, a telegram which purported to come from an aunt in Connecticut. This telegram stated that the aunt was very sick, and the latter requested her niece to come to her bedside at once. Several days having passed, and the parents not receiving any word from their daughter, they began to grow uneasy, and the mother determined to follow her. Upon arriving at her sister's home in Connecticut she found her daughter there, but the revelation was made to the anxious parent that her daughter would become a mother in a few weeks. Trippler, whom she asserts to be her seducer, is about forty-five years old, and wears a long white beard, which givs him a patriarchal air. He was teacher of a Bible class, and evidently took some of the lessons much to heart. He has left the city. Should he ever return he will be arrested.

THE Congregationalist laments that the Rev. R. Heber Newton is "still pegging away at the Pentateuch. He works hard," says that organ, "to make out that Moses did not write the books, but cannot tell who did; perhaps 'different hands, in different ages, and summed up in the work of three great editors, each of different ideas, views, and style, whose names hav gone into utter oblivion.' Pretty much everything of the historical kind in the books he makes out to be a myth, an allegory, or a fragment from the lost annals of some neighboring Syrian people. The first chapter of Genesis is 'a simple but sublime poem of the dawn.' The lives of the patriarchs were made up from traditional and legendary accounts written long after the age in which they lived, and, at that, were probably not the lives of individuals, but of the tribes or clans. And so on, reproducing many of the views of Colenso and his tribe, tearing down the present faith of the great body of the most learned and and godly Christian scholars, and giving little but vague guesses, legends, and unsupported dicta of his own instead. How a Christian minister can feel that he can best serve this worldly, sensual, unbelieving age by so undermining what honest faith in the Bible there is left, surpasses ordinary comprehension." It is no matter for surprise that Mr. Newton's habit of telling the truth, so far as he sees it, places him beyond the comprehension of the ordinary religious editor, who, if he ever detects a lying imposition, carefully conceals it, that the glory of God may still abound.

CHAPTER III.

MRS. HIRUM BINNEY.

Mrs. Hirum Binney lived in a large house, the most splendid in town. Cupples approached it with faltering step, but was sustained by the consciousness that he was on a philanthropic enterprise. He had seen Mrs. Binney a few times, but had never spoken with her. She was a vague, imposing object to his imagination. Summoning all his courage, he rang the bell. After what seemed an age a servant opened the door, and, upon his asking for Mrs. Binney, showed him with icy stolidity into the ponderously furnished sitting-room. Unfortunately he took his hat with him and did not know what to do with it. It bothered him exceedingly. He put it on the floor, and that not seeming right, he took it up and placed it upon a chair. But the well-worn Kossuth looked too shabby for such fine surroundings, so he held it for a while. Finally a happy thought struck him; he rolled it up and thrust it into his pocket, and just as he had won this crushing victory, Mrs. Binney appeared. A little stooping woman, with a pale rigid face, was Mrs. Binney. Had she stood still she might easily have been mistaken for a wax-figure, for all the soul she had went into her quiet and dignified motion. When she ceased moving, she was like a statue. So Cupples thought as she stiffly sat in a luxuriant arm-chair.

"I have called—Mrs. Binney—to see you—on business——" Here Cupples wanted to swear in order to get a fresh impulse, as he did when talking with his boon companions. But everything was so gravelike that it was as much as he could do to utter a respectable word. Speech seemed abnormal in that shadowy realm where Mrs. Binney sat enthroned. Cupples felt like starting at once for home; but the thought of another night with that baby nerved him to further effort. He burst out like a rocket:

"Mrs. Binney, I've got a baby——"

He stopped, and Mrs. Binney stared.

"I mean a baby came into my house last night. No! it was left on the door-step, and I heard it cry and brought it in, and took care of it, and hardly slept a wink, and it's on my hands and I hardly know what to do. It's a pretty little thing, a real angel, quiet—that is, at times. I thought you'd like to take it, you've so much room. It would be a sunbeam to you, I know. I'll be——" Cupples became so much excited that he was on the point of swearing, when he thought of where he was and paused. Mrs. Binney broke in like the trickling of an icicle. Each word seemed to weigh a pound, not because there was anything in it, but because there was not. Mrs. Binney knew how to say nothing with awful ponderosity.

"I should like to do something Mr.—Mr.—"

"Cupples," said the martyr meekly.

"Cupples," rusumed the icicle, "but cannot afford it." (She was worth half a million.) "Our expenses are great" (about a thousand dollars per year), "more than usual this season." (She had bought a new carpet, price twenty-five dollars.) "I am getting old, and I dare not trouble Mr. Binney."

Mr. Hirum Binney was considered by some a myth, though Mrs. Binney frequently spoke of him. He was seldom seen, and many thought that he was really dead and buried, and that Mrs. Binney simply kept him alive in her mind's eye, and the ear of the public, that she might have some one to share with her the responsibility of refusing any and every call upon her purse. When she was particularly hard pressed, and almost compelled to yield, she would fall back upon Mr. Binney, and declare that he would certainly decline doing anything. As Mr. Binney was an unseen enemy and could not be attacked, his spouse came off victorious. Whether Mr. Binney was in the land of the living or not could scarcely be determined. Some declared they had seen him going to the post-office occasionally; some that they had glimpsed him on the gravel-walk and piazza in front of the house. The evidence on the whole was rather vague. If he were alive he might die and no one would know it. Mrs. Binney might murder him without a chance of discovery. But phantom or man, he played second fiddle to Mrs. Binney; he was the invisible echo of all her wishes. When Mrs. Binney could not say no, he could say it from his sepulchral abode, from whence the most melting appeal could not drive him or her.

Cupples felt the withering power of the unknowable Binney. Even if he could find a bit of womanhood in Mrs. Binney, that apparition would defeat him. No chance for a baby in that unsubstantial bosom. He determined, however, to try again, for if Mrs. Binney didn't take the baby, what should he do with it?

"I'm sure the baby 'll be a comfort to you and Mr. Binney" (Cupples spoke this last name with a shudder, for it seemed like invoking a ghost). "It's a cherub, and if it only had a home it would make that home so happy. I know it would. It would make this house so pleasant. What a handsome thing it would be for you to do, Mrs. Binney; you hav no children; you could do so much good; what will become of the poor thing?"

It is possible that Mrs. Binney was being moved a bit, but the invisible Hirum came to the rescue.

"It would trouble us a great deal. Mr. Binney is not well. He is suffering from nervous prostration, and can't endure noise. You can find a place for it. There's a law about such things. Of course it won't starve."

"No," thought Cupples, "it won't starve. Bad as the world is, there's some mercy in it yet. No thanks, however, to such as Mr. and Mrs. Hirum Binney. With only such respectable selfishness there wouldn't even be a 'law about such things.' Every new comer would be turned out to die."

Cupples could hardly bid Mrs. Binney a decent good-bye with the hot indignation in his heart.

"Worth half a million," said he, looking back at the stately dwelling. "Nobody in the world to care for. Almost at death's door. No use for their money. What mightn't they do for this baby; what angels of God they might be; what light it would bring into their house; and they refuse it. Oh, what damned fools!" was Cupples emphatic peroration, as he shook his fist at the grim house and its worm-like occupants creeping slowly to the grave, trembling in view of it, yet scorning the gift of heaven. What were their chances of "eternal life?" Had it not just come to their door, and had they not turned it away, the baby Immanuel.

The Liberal Congress at Liberal, Mo.

The Liberal Congress, which was extensivly advertised to take place at Liberal, Mo., commencing Dec. 21st, and ending on the night of the 24th with a grand ball, was throughout a grand success. It was one of the largest and best attended business conventions of Liberals ever held in the United States. The large and new Opera House, kindly lent for the occasion, was crowded each session with intelligent, enthusiastic people. The congress opened by electing Capt. Frank Greene to the chair, and Mrs. A. L. Andrews, secretary. On taking the chair, Capt. Greene said:

"The time has arrived when our work should become almost entirely constructiv, instead of destructiv, that, as citizens of Liberal, surrounded as we are by millions less fortunate, we should abandon whatever ideas of selfishness that we may still possess, and adopt some method by which distressed humanity could be relieved of suffering, and conditions bettered. That we should not feel satisfied with our own safety while all around us were so many yet to save. Knowing our past, and contrasting it with our present, we are enabled by reference to our experiences to ascertain just what is necessary to say and do, in order to bring mankind up to our satisfactory standard. How best to exercise the means now at our disposal is the real object of this convention. For my part, I favor the founding of an organization based upon the true principles of Liberalism—an organization with a platform broad enough to take in and extend the hand of fellowship to every human being regardless of race, nationality, color, sex, or creed; an organization that will forget the past, except to the extent that its history can be utilized for the purpose of pointing out the shoals and reefs in the ocean of life, that future generations may avoid the evil consequence of being wrecked. Such in brief is the purpose of this meeting. Thanking you for the high compliment you hav paid me in conferring this honor upon me, we will now proceed with the exercises according to program."

On motion, the chair appointed A. J. Fishback, F. L. Yale, Mrs. H. M. Allen, M.D., John McRae, and G. H. Walser as a Committee on Organization. Samuel Weyler made an able address on "Society and Government." This concluded the first evening's session.

The Opera House was beautifully decorated with pictures, mottos, paintings, and scenery. The most conspicuous was a steel engraving of our greatly honored and deeply lamented leader, D. M. Bennett. Across the hall was suspended in large and beautiful letters the memorable words of Washington, "This government is in no sense founded on the Christian religion." In a beautiful semicircle was suspended from the ceiling, "The New Era," under which in large letters, "U. M. L." At every evening meeting the Liberal Brass Band discoursed sweet music for the occasion. The singing was under Prof. J. W. Youmans, who, having charge of the juvenils, gave great satisfaction to the audience with songs and other exercises.

Saturday morning was a conference meeting. On Saturday evening A. J. Fishback made an able address on the "Coming in of the New Era." His remarks were logical and impressiv. On Sunday morning G. H. Walser spoke. At the afternoon session Mrs. H. M. Allen, M.D., in behalf of the Committee on Organization, submitted a set of principles and by-laws of the Brotherhood of Humanitarians.

A discussion followed on the utility of such an organization and the efficacy of its principles.

J. L. Andrew gave an address showing the imperativ necessity of prompt and earnest action. That the religions of the past, with their crude ideas and imperfect moral principles, were insufficient to meet the demands of this age of reform and progress. The speaker showed the necessity of reform in education, so that mankind could be made nobler, purer, and stronger.

After the exercises on Sunday evening, the Committee on Resolutions submitted the following, which was unanimously received:

WHEREAS, the return of the 23d day of Dec., 1883, which is indeed a happy and will become a memorable day in the years to come, in consequence of the birthday of the Brotherhood of Humanitarians, and that it is also the birthday of the late D. M. Bennett, one of the brightest stars in the constellation of Freethought of the nineteenth century.

Resolved, That in the efforts of D. M. Bennett to free the human mind from the chains of slavery, the Freethinkers of the world had a champion whom they will and should honor for all time to come.

Resolved, That, as the world was blessed by the birth of D. M. Bennett, man lost a great friend and benefactor by his death, which we still mourn and regret."

As the inauguration of such a movement as the Brotherhood of Humanitarians will cause much discussion among Liberals everywhere, it may be proper to giv some reasons why the Liberals here hav taken such action.

Any person who is acquainted with the Liberal League movement is aware that the greater number of our Leagues are virtually dead and inoperativ. There are hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of persons in the United States who hav no faith in nor respect for the Christian religion. The Liberal League has not secured, and cannot secure, the combined energy of even the majority of Liberals. Policy, public sentiment, and the fear of social ostracism prevent the progress of the Liberal League. This is deeply to be regretted. And yet what can be done to bring Liberals of all shades of belief into one grand army, so that the objects of Liberalism may be attained and its purposes accomplished? Although many Liberals are zealous in diffusing literature and in disabusing people's minds of the errors of Christianity, yet it is a lamentable fact that the actual force of individual Liberals is wasted through want of effectiv organization. One reason of the non-success of the Liberal League movement is that its objects and demands are too exclusivly political. The separation of church and state, the taxation of church property, the removal of chaplaincies from legislativ halls and prisons—although such reforms are greatly needed, they seem to hav no effect on the action of the majority of Liberals.

It is a fact which it requires no logical argument to sustain that no great moral and social reform can be effected by political action alone. The success of all religious and social movements has never been due to political agitation alone. Liberalism will never succeed so long as its main purpose is political reform. The reason is because, being so destitute of social means, women and children find no attraction in our Leagues. That this should be overlooked by the National League Congress is strange. Leagues are formed in almost every state and territory, and the majority of them are ineffectiv in making Liberalism "a power in the land."

I feel warranted in saying that the principal cause of the loss of activity and strength in many of the Liberal Leagues is due to the fact that but few women and children are identified with them. One of the oldest Liberal Leagues, in a city of forty thousand inhabitants, with at least two thousand Liberals, is totally inoperativ and dead; and the principal cause is that men alone were activ members. It is admitted on all sides that the sociability of the church is the principal cause of its success. Cannot Liberalism offer as many inducements to woman and child as the church does?

To meet the long-felt want of Liberalism, the Brotherhood of Humanitarians aims primarily at the social, intellectual, and moral improvement of mankind by means adapted to such ends. It purposes to bind and elevate society by moral and social means, not relying on the principle of intellectual freedom alone. It has no creed. It recognizes no god, nor any obligation to any god. This will not exclude any one who believes in a god, if he subscribe to the purposes of the Brotherhood. Since humanity is what we purpose to serve, we leave the gods to the fate of the myths of bygone ages, and by the diffusion of light, liberty, and love, pledge ourselvs to serve the supreme of nature—mankind.

On Sunday 134 persons joined the Brotherhood. Many from a distance were present, giving heart and hand to promote the grand and new movement.

Persons from a distance can become members by declaring their intention and informing the secretary, Capt. Frank Greene, Liberal, Mo.

If we may rely on present indications, we are safe in predicting for this movement, whose want has been long and universally felt, unparalleled success. It will not interfere with the Liberal League, but will work as far as possible in harmony with it.

Liberal, Mo. J. L. ANDREW.

A Correction.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your report of the Boston meeting in honor of Mr. Bennett's birthday appears this, "Jay Chaapel, one of the editors of the Golden Age, followed Mr. Cobb." This is in part a mistake. I was never one of the editors of that valuable paper, the Golden Age. I was, however, closely connected with it, having been Mr. Tilton's private secretary, and took a deep interest in each number during the year 1874, when the great Brooklyn sorrow convulsed the whole country.

Very truly yours, JAY CHAAPEL.

The Elasticity of Christianity.

Read the following extract from the Examiner, clipped from the Rochester Democrat, Wednesday, Jan. 2, 1884:

"It is a fact observed by the Examiner that the recitals of Christian experience on the part of converts are rare in these days. 'We hear,' it says, 'far less of agonizing conflict, of darkness and despair, through which the convert passed before the light of God's truth and love burst upon him and he found peace in believing. But we cannot think that this is to be deplored. There is no virtue in this soul-agony. It is in no way indispensable to a genuin experience. We do not read of such inward conflicts in the New Testament records of conversion—except, possibly, in the case of Saul of Tarsus, and in his case the agony must be inferred. Certainly the eunuch to whom Philip preached the gospel, Lydia and her household, the Philippian jailer and his household, passed through no such period of spiritual storm and stress, but received the gospel gladly and were at once baptized. Repentance of sin and acceptance of Christ as savior and lord are the New Testament standard of a Christian experience, not the suffering of a given amount of agony and a great struggle before submitting the will to him.' The fact here recorded is explained by the Examiner. It says that there are not so many old converts as formerly. They had a hard time in resolving to abandon the sinful ways that they had followed all their lives and surrendering themselvs wholly to God. People who are converted when they are young hav no such agonizing experience termed Christian experience to relate."

As the eloquent, able, and progressiv Liberal, Mr. T. B. Wakeman, said at the Salamanca Freethought Convention: "Old creeds are dying almost too fast; new equities are thrown upon us; we need to redouble our diligence in circulating scientific and Liberal literature, that the people may be educated to the emergency. For while it is true the old darkness is passing away, we must remember new light brings new obligations."

Organize! organize! Work in unity and love. Let our pet hobby rest, and unite in the great work of spreading the light of truth, seeking the greatest good to the greatest number. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

The Dominie's Encroachments.

Living next door to me is a "parson"—I wish he lived somewhere else. If it were not very wrong of Charles Dickens to speak of a certain royal English personage as "a king with a big jaw," it is not very wrong of me to say of this particular person that he is "a parson with a big mouth, and other corresponding facial characteristics," which, if there is anything in physiology, more betoken a tiller of the soil than a theologian. He lifts up his voice publicly in prayer, praise, and exhortation during a small portion of each week. The remainder of the time he is wandering about unrestrainedly to the peril of society. In his leisure hours he seems to be somewhat under the impression that he, like Robinson Crusoe, is monarch of all he surveys. He had been in possession but a few days when he came to the conclusion that my fence was not good enough for me, so he brought in some of his Christian band to raze it to the ground, which, with pious energy, they speedily did, without any other permission than that accorded by their own sweet will. If I had not known who they were, I might hav fired a charge of buckshot amongst them, as provided by law; but knowing their spiritual calling and remembering the usual unintelligent and irresponsible habits, according to ordinary standards, of the clerical fraternity, I concluded that it was useless to get angry, so looked grimly on, as I would at the operations of so many Aztecs or Zuni Indians. Nor did I even lift up my voice when the same apostolic body, with true Christian fervor, dug holes in my turf and imposed on my territory the evangelical posts supporting the substituted fence destined, thereafter, to divide the ministerial domain from my own.

The next act of true piety and Christian forbearance, which I experienced at the hands of the same most apostolic and reverend pastor, was the maiming of my peach-tree. Methinks I now see the godly gentleman, with a saintly snicker on his hallowed countenance, crawling out of his wigwam, saw in hand, and lopping off the heretical branches which, obeying the behest of the sun, stretched out their arms toward it and him. Not one solitary tree did Boanerges possess, and he evidently had determined that half a one was enough for me. So he arose bright and early, and lo! when I lifted up mine eyes, my branches had been reft from me and had crackled under his pot. Still I philosophized, complaining not. Remembering which, the holy man continued his saintly course.

The heavy snow came, and then the freezing wind; after which, a partial thaw. My roof was covered, pipes and gutters were frozen up, and fearing an overflow, I ascended to the overburdened roof to clear it. I discovered that the parson's roof had been swept clean, but alack! he had bestowed upon me his snow, that is to say, in the language of an unregenerated person who accompanied me, "the old blackguard has been chucking all his snow onto your roof. I'd giv him Hail Columbia. Chuck it all back again. He's a nice old daisy any way. Another of them 'ere parson's tricks." All along the side of my roof, adjoining his, was a Rocky mountain range of snow, surmounted by stones and other rubbish and sweepings of dirt from that adjoining roof. I called up several persons to inspect the roof before I removed the snow, well knowing that if I first removed it and then complained, I should be met with denials just as surely as if Ananias had been in charge. I furthermore made inquires from residents of continuous houses and found that the parson and his son had been observed in the commission of the act. I did not pitch it back again, as I might hav done if I had been a steadfast church-goer and communicant, and believed that two wrongs made one right. Fortunately I had a new and strong roof. But I hav now had enough of him, and if he don't, in future, more closely observe worldly usages, he will be involved in a most ungodly row. T. W.

South Brooklyn, Jan. 7, 1884.

The Anniversary of the Birth of Thomas Paine.

Among the names which shine with imperishable luster in past time by virtue of their own effulgent light, few, if any, eclipse in splendor that of Thomas Paine, who ascended from a most humble rung of the social ladder to a station equal, if not superior, to that of the great spirits with whose fame is blended forever his own.

So long as the innate love of liberty dwells in the human heart, so long will the name of the citizen-prtriot, Paine, be recognized as the synonym of freedom and of equal rights.

How very few Americans to-day know that without the pen of Thomas Paine the sword of Washington would hav been as powerless as a willow wand in establishing this, the representativ republic of the globe! Yet such is in reality the case.

To-day, in our sister-republic, France, a strongly-organized movement is in progress to sever the unrighteous bond uniting church and state.

Thanks to the glorious Infidels concerned in the framing of the United States Constitution, the bloody hand of the church, ever seeking to throttle the apostles of liberty, has been kept from the throat of the American people; let us to-day see that no unpardonable negligence on our part permits this same church to undo the glorious work of Jefferson and of Paine.

The church party, aware of their swift decadence of power, are preparing for a last desperate attempt to establish, before it is forever too late, their ancient tyranny, by uniting, in this free republic, the two radically antagonistic powers of religion and government.

Let not one of us Liberals be caught napping at this important juncture, nor let us be lulled to a false sense of security by the conclusion that all change is past. A people who would permit the outrage of the imprisonment of D. M. Bennett, the apostle of liberty, might be beguiled, by specious reasoning, into the surrender of their—and our—inalienable rights.

All honor be to Thomas Paine! Priesthood and hypocrisy hav exhausted their venom in striving to tarnish, in the eyes of posterity, his unsullied fame. In this they hav most signally failed, and already hav their outrageous falsehoods and slanders reverted upon their own heads, serving only to make themselvs appear, if such were possible, more abominable than ever.

All honor be to Thomas Paine! Let us, one and all, upon the great patriot's birthday, Jan. 29th, turn our thoughts to this grand apostle of justice and of right. ELLIOTT PRESTON.

A Suggestion for Paine Celebrations.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There will probably be more Paine celebrations this year than at any previous year. And all of these celebrations should be advertised through the Associate Press. And now allow me to make a suggestion. And that is, that on the evening of Jan. 29th, about 7 or 8 o'clock, the secretary of each celebration send a telegram directed "Associate Press, 195 Broadway, New York City," stating that a celebration is being held, about the number in attendance, the speakers engaged, etc. The earlier it is sent in the evening the better are the chances of its being published.

H. L. GREEN.

Must Hav One Wife at Least.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In his remarkably able article on "The Bible and Polygamy," which appeared in your issue of Nov. 3d, John E. Remsburg says, "Paul ordained that a bishop should hav but one wife, plainly implying the right of others to hav more than one."

In this statement Mr. Remsburg follows a very common error. Paul does not limit a bishop to one wife at all. He simply requires the bishop to be a married man. He says of the bishop, "He shall be the husband of one wife." No limiting particle, such as but or only is used, and no such particle can be supplied. This language is used in specifying qualifications, and in qualifications the minimum only is ever mentioned. No maximum limit is ever mentioned. Instead, then, of supplying the particle but or only, and thus limiting the amount of the qualification to the amount mentioned, we must in all such cases supply the phrase at least, and thus extend the qualification ad libitum. Thus, in order to be qualified to vote, a man must be twenty-one years old (at least). In order to be eligible to the presidential office of the United States a man must be thirty-five years old (at least). In order to be a father, a man must hav born to him one child (at least). And so on for a thousand other qualifications. In not one of them can the particle but or only be used. These particles can be used only in specifying disqualifications, and these Paul specifies a little farther on. Paul then means that the bishop must hav one wife at least, and may hav as many more as he pleases.

The Liberal Club.

The weather was pretty cold when the Manhattan Liberal Club held its 320th meeting on the evening of Friday, the 4th. Inside the hall, however, the temperature was congenial, and an audience of two hundred or so came together. After the secretary had read the minutes, Mr. Wakeman called attention to the literature for sale in the hall. Man was there, and had come to stay; also THE TRUTH SEEKER [whose staying powers are never questioned], which was growing better and brighter than ever. The chairman also mentioned the Salamanca Convention that he had just attended. Such gatherings were calculated to inspire the Liberal heart with hopefulness.

The next turn of business was to introduce the lecturer of the evening, who of all men in the world least needed an introduction to the club—Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews. The subject of the Great Universal Preacher's discourse was "Individuality, Anarchism, and Pantarchism." These words the speaker proceeded to dissect and to deal out to the audience in fragments. The individual was the unit of society, and the family the molecule; the individual occupying, therefore, the same relation to society that the atom does to matter. Anarchy signified no government, and was a good rallying-cry where it was needed. It repudiates the sovereignty of the individual as much as the divine right of kings. In this country it has come to mean more than it does in Russia, and is badly chosen. The people here hav the government in their own hands, and anarchy would be out of place. Pantarchism was defined at considerable length to mean a voluntary government, or government by charm, or the discovery and promulgation of natural law in place of arbitrary law. There would be a division of labor, and those best qualified for government would drift into office. Mr. Andrews lays great stress on the rights of women, especially in their relations with men. Some of his utterances on this subject would cause the worthy Mr. E. H. Heywood's hair to stand on end, and might well make the good Angela believe that she is herself rather conservativ than otherwise on the social question.

Mr. Edward King was the first to accept the chairman's invitation to discuss the able and very remarkable lecture to which the audience had listened. Mr. King is one of the peculiarities of the club. He held that Mr. Andrews was dishonest, and that he told people one thing and meant another. This he characterized as a "species of demagogry in philosophy." The carrying out of Mr. Andrews's teachings, Mr. King believed, would involve the continuity of man in undesirable complications. He does not believe in solidarity first and continuity afterward, but in that sentiment dear to every properly organized heart, of Solidarity and Continuity, now and forever, one and inseparable.

Mr. Palmer did not believe that Mr. King had understood the lecture. If Mr. King had understood it, then he (Mr. Palmer) had not. As for himself, it was the most able lecture he had ever heard. If the philosophy which Mr. Andrews had described was Universology, then the speaker was a Universologist. It seemed to him also that that which it had been Mr. Andrews's aim to explain in the whole lecture might be expressed in the one word "republicanism."

Dr. Newberry, the well-known apostle of Human Perfectibility, having been detected in the hall by the chairman, was called upon to weary the audience. The doctor confessed that he had thought on these subjects from his infancy. He exhorted his hearers to be perfect, even as the father in heaven is perfect. If they had faith, all things should be added unto them. It is not believed that the members of the Liberal Club will ever experience any appreciable additions on account of that quality.

Mr. Putnam, in respect to the lecture, said that he indorsed it. Mr. Andrews seemed to hav struck the only way possible to solve the problems involved. Mr. Putnam, while repudiating all authority, still acknowledges the necessity of leaders. He knew of no man who had thrown such a flood of light upon the subject of human liberty as the speaker of the evening. Any one who judges that there is danger of Mr. Andrews and Mr. Putnam coming to a personal collision can hardly be aware of the amount of mutual admiration existing between them.

Dr. Lambert was willing to wager a fabulous sum that Mr. Andrews had been reading Maudsley's last work, and drawing ideas from it. An auditor suggested that Maudsley got his ideas from Andrews, as the latter had promulgated them before the former was born. Dr. Lambert accepted the amendment, though maintaining that Maudsley was born some time ago. He then went on to state that he had Dr. Maudsley's book for sale. Those who would like to procure it might leave an order with him. The chairman called "Time!" and the audience called for the chairman to speak.

Mr. Wakeman said that if he had anything to offer it would be substantially what he had said at the last meeting. As for Mr. King, that gentleman was bound to misunderstand Mr. Andrews, and was under bonds to misunderstand him (Mr. Wakeman). Mr. King was a papal Positivist, and altogether uncalled for, out of place, and unnecessary.

Mrs. Leonard arose to move that a vote of the meeting be taken for the purpose of deciding whether Mr. King's intuitiv perception was proportionate to his forensic ability. The chair argued ably, in opposition, that the meeting was incompetent to decide so grave a question. The motion was not seconded, and did not come to a vote.

Mr. Andrews closed by vivisecting Mr. King with a general disregard for the latter's finer feelings. What Mr. King had said was hardly worthy of serious attention in his opinion, but others might think it was; therefore he would proceed to correct him. It is not congenial work for the Great Universal Preacher to deal harshly with any man. It is his province to set people right and to convince them that truth is all-sided. He would do this peacably if he can, forcibly if he must. Therefore it was apparently more in sorrow than in anger, and obedient to an imperativ necessity, that he administered heroic treatment to the young philosopher. Mr. King bore his affliction like a martyr, and his only attempt at retaliation consisted in buttonholing some of the Pantarch's supporters as they were leaving the hall, and compelling them, with the thermometer at zero, to hear wherein, in his opinion, Mr. Andrews was wrong and he was right. His auditors derided him, and a cold breeze scattered them off homeward. Mr. King's persistency in making himself the Ishmael among the philosophers of the Liberal Club would win him great credit if applied in some other direction.

The program of the club for January is attractiv. It is as follows: On the 11th, "Hours of Labor" by C. Osborne Ward; 18th, "Late Aspects of Dress Reform," by Celia B. Whitehead; 25th, "False Claims of the Church," by John E. Remsburg.

THE SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED.

Agreeable to the foregoing program, Mr. Osborne Ward spoke on the evening of the 11th, "The Hours of Labor" being his subject. Previous to the lecture of the evening, Mr. Wilson Macdonald read a letter in regard to a Thomas Paine National Historical Society, which he purposed publishing in the Liberal papers. This society was to be formed on the 147th anniversary of the birth of Paine. Its objects were to defend the good name of the author-hero against the aspersions of the enemies of Freethought; to provide for keeping the monument at New Rochelle in good repair, and to collect and preserve such relics of the great writer as were still in existence. Paine's birthday will be celebrated by a meeting under the auspices of the Bennett Liberal League at the rooms of the Liberal Club.

Mr. Ward was then introduced. He is a typical Socialist, both in doctrin and in personal appearance. His bony frame, cast-iron features, erect hair, and keen glance imply the man of determination whom no ordinary terrors would deter. His Socialism, however, is pervaded with philosophy and controled by reason, and there is nothing incendiary in the method of procedure which he advocates. He would make the hours of labor less which now constitute a day's work. Eight hours per diem was too much, but it was better than ten. If labor were equally divided there would not be more than three hours' work a day for any one. Workingmen were the shortest lived of all classes. Ministers and lawyers, and even thieves and gamblers, could enjoy the beauties of this existence from fifteen to twenty years longer than the working man. The workers in the quicksilver mines died at 26; printers, at 32; while professional men averaged between fifty and sixty years of life. On the part of employers who forced their men to work twelve or fifteen hours per day, it was homicide; on the part of the employees, suicide; and crime on the part of both. This question of the hours of labor pressed upon us with intense energy, and demanded our attention and our efforts at solution. Mr. Ward is an admirable combination of the philosopher and enthusiast, and while the former tempers the latter, it is equally true that his enthusiasm has a marked influence over philosophy.

Mr. Eccles was called upon for an expression of opinion. He could not in ten minutes thoroughly define his position; but he did not believe the hours of labor would be shortened. On the contrary, they would and should be lengthened. This he supported with the rather startling proposition that a laborer could not exhaust himself so much in twelve hours as he could in six. The government could not interfere with the acquisition of wealth, but might direct how it should be used when acquired.

Mr. Langerfelt made an appropriate speech; that is to say, the speech which he is addicted to the habit of delivering was appropriate to the subject and came in very neatly. The remarks of Mr. Eccles, he held, were the most addle-headed business he had ever heard in his life. Under the reign of Socialism dishonesty would be done away with, because, all the wants of the people being provided for, there would be no incentiv to steal. He did not care how capitalists spent their money. Let them dispose of it as they choose, but first let them get it honestly.

Mr. Palmer confessed that he was not so well qualified as some others to deal with the question, because he was not a workingman. However, he believed that as it had been demonstrated that the government could manage the post-office successfully, it should also take the network of telegraph wire and railroads under its control. The speaker was in sympathy with Mr. Ward for the reason that they were brother editors of the same paper. The audience might manifest their smypathy by giving the paper a boost.

Mr. Smith, who was formerly a member of the club, and who had been to the uttermost parts of the earth, had a scheme to propose. It was the redistribution of wealth. He would inquire, Now, what is the remedy? He had in mind a constitution adopted at Kaskaskia, Illinois, which imposed a two per cent tax on all assets. Two per cent was the death-rate, and the same per cent would effect a proper distribution of wealth. This was evidently the remedy.

Mr. Wakeman said that although not workingmen, he and Mr. Palmer occupied the position toward the laborer that Phillips and Garrison, not slaves themselvs, did toward the oppressed African. It was their object to do away with some of the worst atrocities of wage slavery. Mr. Wakeman looks at the labor question from a historical point of view. His remarks on government by the grace of God called Madam Delescluze to her feet to inquire why the condition of the laborer was better under the rule of the Christian religion than under any other. By a judicious application of his theory of integration and disintegration, with various interruptions by the madam, Mr. Wakeman explained the matter quite satisfactorily.

Mr. Ward's closing remarks resolved themselvs for a time into a triangular dialog between himself, Mrs. Leonard, and a protuberant German individual with exalted ideas of his own smartness, and whom the chairman had great difficulty in inducing to suppress himself. When Mr. Ward finally secured uninterrupted possession of the floor, he paid his respects to the arguments of Mr. Eccles and others, and further outlined his views on the hours of labor. His barbed rhetoric, as well as the vigorous wording of his speech, are calculated to provoke excitement, and he was rewarded with a fair amount of applause.

Next Friday, provided there is no disappointment, the interesting subject of dress reform will be discussed. The last time this question came before the club, it called forth from the members a large amount of latent information.

The Sabbatarian.

From Life.

What is this?
This, dear, is a gentleman who has been trying to observe the Sabbath.
He seems to be very tired?
Very.
And his breath—whew!
That is the odor of sanctity, my precious.
But it smells like very bad whisky.
So it does.
He has been drinking, then?
So it seems.
But I thought you said he had been trying to observe the Sabbath?
I did.
But how?
According to law.
But how according to law?
Why, by the laws of the state of New York, framed by that broad-minded jurist, Mr. David Dudley Field, there are only two ways of spending the Sabbath.
What are they?
Going to church or getting drunk.
Or both?
Yes.
But why does not the gentleman go to a library and improve his mind?
It is against the law.
Go to the museum?
Against the law.
To the art gallery?
Against the law.
To the theater?
Against the law.
Stay home?
His home is one cheerless, ill-ventilated room, and he is driven from it by loneliness.
But are not the saloons closed on Sunday by the same wise law?
Oh, yes.
Then how did the gentleman get in?
By the back door.
But why does he not go to hear the good, pious preacher?
Because it makes him tired.
Then he is a big exception to the rule, is he not?
Oh, yes.
How many other exceptions are there in the city?
About 850,000.
My!—but are there so many who do not go to church?
Yes.
And how many would go to the libraries, museums, theaters, and art galleries if they were opened?
About 1,000,000.
Then why does not the majority rule?
Because we get such wise and good gentlemen as Mr. Field to frame our laws, and send chuckleheads to Albany to indorse them.
But the poor people who work hard all the week?
Well?
They do not want to go to church all Sunday?
Scarcely.
What can they do?
Get drunk.
But for recreation?
The law forbids recreation to the poor.
Why?
Ask Mr. Field and the Sunday Closing League.
But is this not a free country?
Oh, no.
But I thought it was?
You were wrong.
What is it, then?
An absolute monarchy.
By whom governed?
On week-days by Jay Gould and Mr. John Kelly.
And on Sundays?
By the saloon-keepers and parsons.
But is there no supreme authority over all these?
Oh, yes.
Who?
The devil.

Editorial Notes.

In a lecture in Parepa Hall this city, on the 10th, Joe Cook said that Materialism is fast becoming the philosophy of the savants of Europe.

A Turkish newspaper writer has recently published a book in which he asserts that "Christianity is a school-master to lead men into Atheism." Verily religious squabbles take curious forms.

The Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club held its fourth annual festival at its club rooms on Wednesday evening, the 16th. The proceedings consisted of speeches, music, dancing, and refreshments.

The Christian religion is stretching like a giant cable. When it snaps, look out for the recoil, which will come in the shape of persecution where it has the power. The God-in-the-Constitution party is a parted strand coiling back.

A. S. de Pellegrini's contribution to the Monument Fund was acknowledged last week as $1. It should hav been $5. Mr. Hill's was 25 cents instead of 20 cents as printed. The footing remains the same, as the errors were typographical, not clerical.

The Liberals of Pittsburgh, Pa., will celebrate the 147th anniversary of Thomas Paine's birthday at Lafayette Hall on the evening of the 29th, beginning at 7:30. A banquet will follow the musical program, which is large and varied. Tickets to concert, 50 cents; children half price; banquet tickets, 75 cents.

The editor of the Christian Advocate tells this story:

"The night before Christmas, not far from the office, the editor met a matronly-looking woman in middle life. She was very drunk. On passing her he said, 'How drunk!' She turned, and with a maudlin smile said, 'Christmas!'"

If Dr. Buckley contracts the habit of staying out nights he will be likely to meet a good many of his fellow-Christians in the same condition.

Mr. and Mrs. M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa, are mourning the loss of their only child, Claude R., a beautiful golden-curled boy of four years and a half. The death occurred Dec. 20th. The funeral address was read by Matthew Farrington, the Agnostic friend of the family. To the notice in the local paper is appended these cheering words of Col. Ingersoll, "In the night of death hope sees a star, and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing."

The United States is now to hav a full-fledged "canonical" organization as a reward for being the refuge of several hundred thousand Catholics. The pope thinks he has subjects enough to warrant the expense, and since he has forced Bismarck to modify the Falk laws, grant concessions to the Catholic clergy, and reinstate over a hundred priests whom the May laws had deprived of their parishes, and brought the crown prince to Rome, he feels encouraged to do something besides missionary work in this country. During the present year a plenary council will be held here to giv effect to this purpose.

For some time there has been on exhibition in Chicago a very large painting by some celebrated artist, a picture of the battle of Gettysburg, which is highly praised. This picture has been exhibited week days and evenings, and on Sunday afternoons and evenings, and on Sundays has attracted large numbers of people to the exhibition. This of course excites the wrath of the churches, but no one has seen fit, before last Monday, to rush into print with objections, when Rev. H. H. Ryder, one of the old-school Universalists, and one of the very few Universalists now left to materialize and to parade their fallacies before us, declared war on the Sunday exhibition of the picture. It nearly took the breath out of his materialized and saintly body to think that the awful example would go far to justify theatrical exhibitions on that holy day. A correspondent next day replied that the theaters in that city had already been openly running on Sundays for a year before the picture was exhibited in Chicago. One would hardly expect to hear such nonsense from a member of a church which, only fifty years ago, was as bitterly denounced for its Liberal views as Ingersoll now is. Since then even Methodists hav advanced faster than they. The old-fashioned Universalist, once an advanced and useful man, has been dead these forty years and hasn't found it out yet. They died when they refused to "testify" against slavery—"died in their sins."

We can best accomplish the object of the following painful note by printing it:

"New York, Jan. 12, 1884.

"Friend Macdonald: I am performing a duty perhaps tardily in informing you that one of the old-time and stanchest of Liberals, William H. Peck, is very ill at his home, 231 West 42d street. He is suffering from a complication of diseases, brought on mainly by heart disease, and he thinks the end is not far off. Please draw attention to the facts in The Truth Seeker, as he has many friends, and warm ones, some of whom I know would like to call on him. He is well-known all through the Liberal ranks; in fact, so well known that he was one of the first, if not the very first, Mr. Bennett went to for acquaintance and advice when he came here to found The Truth Seeker. His life has been a very interesting one, and rich with experience in the early days of Liberalism and amongst its great men. Some exposure he underwent through the death of Mr. Bennett gave him a turn that told severely on him, and from which I think he took his downward step physically. Very truly yours, D. E. Ryan."

The Freethinkers of northwestern Pennsylvania and northeastern Ohio will celebrate the 147th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, in Linesville, Pa., on the 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th days of January, 1884. The speakers will be J. H. Burnham, of Michigan; Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, N. Y.; Ex.-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, of Rochester, N. Y.; O. P. Kellogg, of New Lynne, Ohio; J. D. Mallonee, of Cleveland, and several others. Prof. H. H. Hall, who sang at the Rochester Convention, with assistants, will furnish music. This jubilee will be held under the auspices of Auxiliary League, No. 36, C. B. Brooks, president, and G. W. Baldwin, secretary, of Linesville, Pa. This League offers a reward of $75 for any representativ Christian, of good moral character, who will attend this meeting and affirm the cardinal points of the orthodox (so-called) faith. Gentlemen about starting for India, or Patagonia, to find some one to convert, take notice.

That D. R. Burt is dead will be sad news for many of our readers who hav had the pleasure of his acquaintance. But he had lived long and accomplished much good work and this will soften the stroke. It is not often a man attains his age, and less often is it given to men to labor so long for his fellows' good. He was one of Mr. Bennett's and The Truth Seeker's warmest friends. His funeral took place from the city hall of East Dubuque, Iowa, his home for many years. The Herald of that place says:

"Long before the hour set for the funeral a large number of the former friends of the esteemed old gentleman filled the hall, and at 2 o'clock the room was crowded with people who came many of them from distant points. Gen. M. M. Trumbull, of Chicago, a warm personal friend of Mr. Burt's, delivered an address which was eloquent and pathetic. In the course of his remarks he paid a glowing tribute to the life and character of Mr. Burt. Mr. C. H. Beck, of Chicago, son-in-law of the deceased, was present at the funeral. The remains were followed to their final resting-place by a large concourse of relativs and friends."

The Paris correspondent of the London Guardian, writing of French affairs, says religious questions are daily becoming more important and critical. While there is much confusion and not a little division in Parliament on secular matters, there is great unity of speech and action on religious questions. "Whenever religious or ecclesiastical matters come up," he says, "it is astonishing how harmoniously, on the whole, a majority is found to deal with them. As M. Paul Bert expressed it, almost facetiously, on a late occasion, the only difference of opinion in that respect between himself and the government, and his good friends of the Extreme Left, was one not of principle, but of degree; not as to the end to be kept steadily in view, but as to how much more or less speedily it was to be attained. However opinions may float or be divided on politics, when religion, under the name of the church or clericalism, is to be attacked, it is wonderful how many 'groups' can be always marshaled against it to the assault." With the government and people of France in this frame of mind, the separation of church and state cannot long be delayed.

It has long been the opinion of those unfortunate males who hav been decoyed to a church fair by plump young female Christians, and then robbed by means of the grab-bag, that the latter institution is as illegal as the game of faro. At faro men are occasionally seen who hav won, but what living mortal ever came out ahead of a church fair grab-bag? The United States District Court, sitting in Oregon, has now decided that these grab-bags, when used at church fairs, are gambling devices. The decision is obiter—that is, given in deciding another point—but it will hardly be questioned. The Court said:

"It is a simple game of chance, something like 'odd or even.' The device by which it is played are little brass disks, called 'cheen,' about the size of a 20 ct. piece, with a square hole in the center, in which the conductor of the game inserts a pointed stick, for the purpose of conveniently and publicly moving them on the table as he draws them from the pile. He has probably two or three hundred of these near him. On the table when the game is played a small square is described, with its sides marked 1, 2, 3, 4. The player takes up, at random, a handful of the brasses, and puts them on the table before him, and as he does so covers them more or less with a hollow vessel, so that no one can tell what number is in the pile, or whether it is an odd or even one. The players then put down their money on the sides of the square, as they may fancy. When this is done the conductor uncovers the brasses and picks them out of the pile, four at a time, until only four or a less number are left. If the number left is an even one—either two or four—the player who put his money on this figure wins a like amount from the table, less a rebate of seven per centum to the conductor, and the table wins what is laid on the other even number, while those who put their money on the odd numbers withdraw it. If the number of brasses left is an odd one, either one or three, that number wins, and the process is reversed. The device mentioned in the statute is not cards, dice, or other 'like' device, but simply 'other' device. And if it were a 'like' device, the question would arise, Like in what respect?—like which of them? Cards and dice are in most respects very unlike—indeed, they hav no resemblance, except that they may both be used for gaming. But then, anything which may be used for that purpose is so far a like device. The coin of the realm, when used to play the game of 'match,' 'heads or tails,' 'odd or even,' for money or anything of value; a long and short straw, when used to play the game of 'draw straws,' for the same purpose; a 'wheel of fortune,' or a grab-bag, when used at church fairs or festivals, or elsewhere, to dispose of articles of value upon the chance of getting something for comparativly nothing, are, each and all of them, so far, just as much gambling devices as cards or dice can be. In short, anything which is used as a means for playing for money or other things of value, so that the result depends more largely on chance than skill, is so far a gambling device."

The softening influences of civilization upon Presbyterianism are constantly being felt. St. Cloud is a suburban hamlet of Orange, N. J. Its church facilities consist of a rickety Episcopalian building and a substantial Presbyterian structure. The attendance is cosmopolitan, the different sectaries meeting in apparent harmony and much gorgeous apparel. A gentleman about taking a house in the little cluster was assured by the vacating lady tenant, as a matter calculated to excite surprise, that a Presbyterian, a Baptist, and an Episcopalian, had met at a tea-table in the neighborhood, and conversed for nearly three hours without quarreling. Recently the wife of a Freethinker living there was prostrated by disease, and although she had never attended the church, the members vied with each other in showering kindness upon her. From an Episcopalian came one delicacy, from a Baptist others, and the Presbyterian minister forwarded beautiful flowers to cheer the sick room. This is the bright side of Christianity; would that it had no dark one. But if there were no clouds the sunshine perhaps would not be appreciated. It is the gospel of love supplanting the gospel of hate, the true religion of humanity. Sometime, indeed, we may look to see the brotherhood of man the song of the race.

Dr. McCosh, of Princeton College, a Presbyterian of the coldest and most merciless kind, has avowed for evolution. He is reported in a Boston paper:

"My first position is the certainty of evolution. Evolution is but the coming of one thing out of another. No scientific man under thirty years of age, in any country, denies it, to my knowledge. To oppose it is to injure young men. I am at the head of a college where to declare against it would perplex my best students. They would ask me which to giv up, science or the Bible. There is a general progression in nature. The theory that the world was once a vapor, from which the earth evolved, is not inconsistent with the scriptures; for they speak of its being 'void without form.' The natural struggles for existence lead to the survival of the fittest—a most benevolent law and also in accordance with the scriptures. Evolution but shows the agencies by which God's plans are carried out."

This is almost the taking of the enemy's last citadel. Dr. McCosh's references to God will be less certain when he comes to fully comprehend that men's Gods are just as much subject to the grand law of evolution as animals and plants. Men manufacture Gods, which last for a season and then pass into mythology. A God, fit to survive, must be different from any hitherto mentioned.

The recent operations of Comstock afford the French a fine opportunity to laugh at the people of this country, and the American Register, of Paris, does not neglect to add adipose tissue to its ribs. It says: "Mr. Anthony Comstock, the motiv power of the Society for the Suppression of Vice in the city of New York, has just been doing his best to make his society the laughing-stock of every educated person in the United States. Mr. Anthony Comstock is so full of ardor for the suppression of vice that he sees vice everywhere, even in photographs of pictures by the most celebrated German and French artists of the day. Fired by holy zeal and armed with a warrant from a New York magistrate, Mr. Anthony Comstock lately caused a well-known picture dealer of New York to be arrested on the charge of selling indecent photographs. The picture dealer was admitted to bail, and will in due course of time appear before the Court of General Sessions to answer for his supposed misdeeds. Among the photographs stamped by Mr. Anthony Comstock with the foul stain of indecency are copies of pictures by Makart, Cabanel, etc., among the moderns, and Rubens among the ancients. If it is thus that the pious Anthony deals with classical pictures, what would he do with 'the human form divine' sculptured in marble or bronze? Surely he would put a petticoat and shawl on the Medicean Venus, and a great-coat and trousers on Michael Angelo's David. The name of Anthony has a wonderful resemblance to Antony, and Antony was a saint, in which character he has been represented by many painters of celebrity resisting temptation. Whether the saint really did so or not, is a subject on which both painters and theologians hav agreed to differ, but it is evident that if this poor unfortunate saint were alive and in New York, Anthony Comstock would hav him arrested for encouraging vice. It may be questioned whether there is not a considerable amount of vice and indecency in discovering vice everywhere, even in pictures and statues of the great masters, and whether a good cause is not seriously prejudiced by the raids of ignorant prudery."

The New England Freethinkers' Convention, to be held in Paine Hall, Boston, Jan. 27, 28, and 29, 1884, promises to be as large and influential as the Salamanca Convention just closed. The main object of the convention will be to aid somewhat in educating the public mind upon the great questions of liberty, truth, and justice, and the rights of man generally as against despotism, monopoly, and wrongs and outrages of all descriptions; and so effect such organization as will make an effort to interpret these grand principles practically. It will not be sectarian or partisan, but will maintain a free platform, upon which all sides of the great questions now coming up for adjustment may be freely discussed so far as the limited time of the convention will permit. The names of the speakers, and the subjects they discuss, are a sufficient guarantee of the dignity and importance of the work which will come before this body of reformers, as well as the splendid entertainment they will hav. The names of the speakers and their subjects, so far as known, are in part as follows: James Parton, "Heathen Benevolence;" R. B. Westbrook, D.D. LL.D, "The Divine Origin of Humanity;" Horace Seaver, "The Freethought Movement;" Elizur Wright, "Paine and Franklin, Co-workers for Liberty;" T. B. Wakeman, reply to Rev. Dr. Westbrook's "Divine Origin of Humanity;" J. P. Mendum, subject not given; Parker Pillsbury, subject not given; John E. Remsburg, "Paine, the Apostle of Liberty;" Susan H. Wixon, "Influence of Freethought on the Family;" S. P. Putnam, "Paine and the French Revolution;" W. S. Bell, "Prohibition a Failure;' H. A, Lamb, M.D., "Turning of the Tide;" Henry Appleton, "The Anarchistic Position;" A Schell, "Girard's Will." Courtlandt Palmer, E. B. Hazzen, John S. Verity, T. C. Leland, and H. L. Green hav not handed in the questions they will discuss. The sessions will be 10 A.M. and 2.30 and 7.30 P.M. Hotel accommodations can be had at the Metropolitan Hotel, 1162 Washington street, at $1.50 per day, and at Hotel Creighton, 245 Tremont street, at $2.00 per day. W. S. Bell, 18 East Springfield Street, Boston, Mass., is the proper person to write to for information.

General Gordon, a member of Parliament, having asserted in a public speech that Bradlaugh's religious opinions were not the cause of his exclusion from Parliament, but that the members objected to sitting and making laws "with a man who had published a book of so obscene and disgusting a character that the sale of it was prohibited by the law courts of the country"—a man whose "moral and social ideas" are "revolting to human nature," Mr. Bradlaugh retorts: "Presumably Sir A. Gordon never read the report of the trial of the Queen vs. Bradlaugh and Besant. If he had read the summing up of the late Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, to which I referred in my last speech at the bar, Sir A. Gordon would hav known that, at any rate, that was not the language in which that great judge described the pamphlet of which he had carefully read every line. If Sir A. Gordon had known anything of the history of the case, he would hav known that after that trial I compelled the police to redeliver to me several hundred copies of the pamphlet which they had illegally seized, and that in 1878 I sold the whole of these. Mrs. Besant and I sold the book until the end of 1879 to vindicate the right, and then Mrs. Besant having, in the mean time, written her able pamphlet on the 'Law of Population,' we voluntarily stopped the sale of the Knowlton pamphlet, and since the beginning of 1880 not a copy has been sold by us or by our authority; but the cessation was purely voluntary on our part. But it is astounding to pretend that this, and not the religious question, is the real objection to me. Why was it not raised to John Stuart Mill? who most certainly went quite as far as myself in the matter of circulating such knowledge of checks to over-population. Sir A. Gordon talks of the revolting nature of my moral and social ideas. I defy Sir. A. Gordon to put into words the ideas which he objects to. I say that he has, in most unfair and cowardly fashion, and without inquiry, believed the circulars which scoundrels like Henry Varley sent behind my back to the various members of the House of Commons, and I say that, having either actually heard or certainly read my last speech at the bar, Sir A. Gordon is absolutely dishonorable to hav repeated this exceeding grave charge, while totally ignoring the uncontradicted reply I there made."

The mammoth state of Texas would seem to be the last place for Socialism to take root, yet Dallas has given birth to a Socialistic paper called the Iocsin. The first number is sharp and warlike. A clew to the principles to be promulgated is found in these utterances:

"Labor produces all wealth; labor must enjoy all wealth. This can only be accomplished by a co-operativ or Socialistic form of government, under which all land, all business enterprises, and all natural advantages would be the property of the people. All individuals would receive from the public fund according to the labor performed by them, and all profit, interest, and rent would go into the public treasury, to be returned to the people in public improvements, schools, libraries, etc."

This change in society is to be wrought out

"By a thorough organization of the laboring men, and a revolutionary convention representing from two to five million workers. If the workingmen are permitted to proceed quietly and peacably in this way, the change can be accomplished and the object fully attained without spilling a drop of blood or exploding an ounce of powder."

But the editor is not sanguin that the revolution can be effected quietly. He indicates the means the opposition will use:

"Whenever the capitalists, land monopolists, etc., see that labor organizations are becoming formidable, and that their vested rights are threatened, they will demand and secure legislation against the alarmists and agitators. Labor papers will be suppressed, labor advocates imprisoned, labor organizations forbidden, and an armed conflict will thus be forced upon the half-organized and unprepared toilers, who, from their lack of arms, ammunition, supplies, etc., would seem comparativly helpless."

Fifty years ago this would hav been sufficient to "crush a half-ripe and premature revolt," but

"Now it is different. Chemistry has come to the aid of the poor, and to-day ten dollars will arm a hundred men with an explosiv more terrible than the most expensiv cannon ever made. If the oppressors of the poor precipitate a conflict, their blood will be on their own heads. The laborer demands nothing but his rights, and he will hav them, forcibly it he must."

Mr. George N. Beech is the editor of the Iocsin, which is his "organ or mouthpiece only." The prospectus says the paper will be published every Thursday at $1 per year. Its aims, objects, and cause of being can be summed up in two words—Revolutionary Socialism.

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

ELLIOTT PRESTON TO "D. W. T."

Sir, or Madam: I make it a rule never to print statements I cannot fully substantiate by facts, and hence reply as follows to your friendly criticism of my essay entitled "Christianity," which essay was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 24, 1883, your criticism thereon appearing in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 29, 1883.

Relativ to your question as to the correctness of my statement that Christianity was derived from India, I will quote (to go no further back) the following passages from Col. Robert G. Ingersoll's well-known lecture entitled, "The Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," the correctness of statement of which, I believe, has never been questioned, except by Christian bigots.

The great orator says: "I read in another book what appeared to be an account of the same transaction. It was written about four thousand years before the other.

"All commentators agree that the one that was written last was the original, and that the one that was written first was copied from the one that was written last. But I would advise you all not to allow your creed to be disturbed by a little matter of four or five thousand years. In this story Brahma made up his mind to make the world and a man and woman. He made the world, and he made the man, and then the woman, and put them on the island of Ceylon. Such birds, such songs, such flowers, and such verdure! And the branches of the trees were so arranged that when the wind swept through them every tree was a thousand Æolian harps.

"Brahma, when he put them there, said: 'Let them hav a period of courtship, for it is my desire and will that true love should forever precede marriage.'

"When I read that, it was so much more beautiful and lofty than the other, that I said to myself, 'If either one of these stories ever turns out to be true, I hope it will be this one.'

"Then they had their courtship, with the nightingales singing and the stars shining, and the flowers blooming, and they fell in love." (Here I will skip a little to save space). "They were married by the supreme Brahma, and he said to them: 'Remain here; you must never leave this island.' Well, after a little while the man—and his name was Adami, and the woman's name was Heva—said to Heva, 'I believe I'll look about a little.' He went to the northern extremity of the island where there was a little narrow neck of land connecting it with the mainland, and the devil, who is always playing pranks with us, produced a mirage, and when he looked over to the mainland, such hills and vales, such dells and dales, such mountains crowned with snow, such cataracts clad in bows of glory did he see there, that he went back and told Heva, 'The country over there is a thousand times better than this; let us migrate.' She, like every woman that ever lived, said, 'Let well enough alone; we hav all we want; let us stay here.' But he said, 'No, let us go;' so she followed him, and when they came to this narrow neck of land he took her on his back like a gentleman and carried her over. But the moment they got over they heard a crash, and looking back discovered that this narrow neck of land had fallen into the sea. The mirage had disappeared, and there were naught but rocks and sand; and then the supreme Brahma cursed them both to the lowest hell."

Relativ to my spelling of "Christna," let me say that you appear to be ignorant of the fact that this name is spelled in numerous works in about as many different ways as there are popularly supposed to be ways of killing a cat—including Christna, Chrishna, Crishna, Krishna, Chrishnoo, Chreshnou, Chreeshna, Kreeshna, etc. My spelling (Christna) is that of Renan.

Lastly, relativ to your stricture regarding my statement that "history boasts upwards of a dozen crucified saviors."

I drew it too mild, friend "D. W. T." It boasts of sixteen. For a full account of their "goings on," permit me to refer you to that somewhat celebrated book, entitled "The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors; or, Christianity Before Christ," by Mr. Kersey Graves. I shall refer to this book later on in this article.

I, in that essay, set the number at only "a baker's dozen," fearing my readers might think I "drew a long bow," and that my statement saviored (pardon a bad joke) of romance; but here you hav the entire "platoon"—take your choice of the lot.

You ask if my language is intended to be merely figurativ. By no means. We hav had too much of the figurativ business in Christianity already. I mean what I say—pure and simple English.

Below I giv the sixteen saviors:

1. Chrishna, of India, 1200 B.C. 2. The Hindoo Sakia, 600 B.C. 3. Thammuz, of Syria, 1160 B.C. 4. Wittoba, of the Telengonese, 552 B.C. 5. Iao, of Nepaul, 622 B.C. 6. Hesus, of the Celtic Druids, 834 B.C. 7. Quexalcote, of Mexico, 587 B.C. 8. Quirinus, of Rome, 506 B.C. 9. (Æschylus), Prometheus, 547 B.C. 10. Thulis, of Egypt, 1700 B.C. 11. Indra, of Thibet, 725 B.C. 12. Alcestos (or Alcestis), of Euripides, 600 B.C. 13. Atys, of Phrygia, 1170 B.C. 14. Crite, of Chaldea, 200 B.C. 15. Bali, of Orissa, 725 B.C. 16. Mithra, of Persia, 600 B.C.

Of course, it is the easiest thing in the world to say that all these were not crucified, since perhaps a dozen different histories might be found of each, differing widely from one another. For illustration: Christna is said to hav died peacefully at the ripe old age of 80 years. According to another tradition (supported by ancient writings in stone, representing Christna upon the cross, and even the spear-hole in his side), he was crucified. So of Prometheus, that he was chained upon a rock, etc.

The whole gist of the matter is this: the entire business is most probably mythology, and about as likely to be true as that Christ was himself crucified, which fact was disputed by Polycarp (who claimed that he peacefully died at the age of 50), and also by many others.

The point that I wish to make is this: the idea of a crucified savior far antedated the alleged birth of Christ, and there is no reasonable room for doubt that it (Christianity) is "all borrowed thunder."

Doubtless much of Christianity did, as you claim, emanate from the Babylonians, but very much more as doubtlessly emanated from India.

I will now bid my unknown critic adieu, advising him (or her), when he (or she) next attempts to pick up an authorial porcupine, to be certain beforehand that his quills are all drawn, and to likewise bear in mind that it is not always "just as easy to call it right as it is wrong."

I hav the honor of remaining, sir (or madam), yours for exactness, ELLIOTT PRESTON.

Brahminism and Buddhism vs. Christianity.

The "friendly criticisms" of "D. W. T." are mostly answered in Jacolliot's "Bible in India." On page 108 the author says:

"The officiating Brahmins in temples and pagodas now accord the title of Jeseus, or pure essence, or divine emanation, only to Christna, who is alone recognized as the Word, the true incarnation, by the Vishnouites and Freethinkers of Brahminism."

Madame Blavatsky, author of "Isis Unveiled," vindicates the author of the "Bible in India" against the assaults of pretentious critics. In 1877 the editor of the New York Sun asserted that there never was a Hindoo reformer named Jezeus Christna. Madame Blavatsky answered him thus:

"I hav been at the festivals of Janmotsar in commemoration of the birth of Christna (which is their Christmas), and hav heard thousands of voices shouting, 'Jas-i-Christna! Jasas-wi-Christna!' Translated, they are: Jas-i—renowned, famous; and Jasas-wi—celebrated, or divinely renowned, powerful; and Chris-tna, sacred."

Christna, she maintains, is the correct spelling, and not Krishna. Jacolliot's most bitter opponent, Monsieur Taxtor de Ravisi, a Catholic, spells the name Krishna, because it means black and because the real name of Christna was Kaneya or Caneya. But Madame Blavatsky says that Krisn is black, and that Caneya means born of a virgin—Canya. Even in modern Hindustanee the zodiacal sign of Virgo is called Kanaia.

Jacolliot is therefore right, not only as regards Christna, but substantially so as regards Jezeus. There is no more reason for spelling the first with a K than for spelling Christ with a K. The Greek letter Ch differs from K by being more guttural and aspirated, and is almost equivalent to H in English, so that Christos might more correctly be rendered by H'ristos.

Jacolliot is no fraud. Ten years' residence and studies in India were surely enough to fit him to giv an opinion; and even his Catholic opponent admits that his "Bible in India" is written "with good faith, of absorbing interest, a learned work on known facts, and with familiar arguments."

The Hindoo legend of Adami and Heva, as translated by Jacolliot from the old Hindoo records, is far superior to the Biblical story of Adam and Eve. Col. Ingersoll made one of his happiest hits when he interwove the Hindoo legend into one of his lectures, and said: "I like the Hindoo story the best."

Jacolliot has published twenty more volumes. In Volume II., Les Fils de Dieu ("The Sons of God"), he demolishes the critics who attempted to decry his first work, and proves by astronomical movements the great antiquity of Indian history. Brahminism was established as early as 13,300 B.C.; and about 10,000 B.C. there was a revolt of the chiefs against Brahminical authority, the capital of the Brahmins was taken, and Viswamitra became the first king of India. Christna was born 4,800 B.C., and died 4,760 B.C. Buddhism arose several centuries later. It obtained little foothold in India, but spread widely elsewhere. The Mohammedans overran northern India, and destroyed the temples and books of the Brahmins. But southern India remained undisturbed. The northern Brahmins had to reproduce their books from copies in the south, and in doing so made variations. It is these variations that hav misled the critics. Jacolliot had access to the oldest records in southern India, where he resided ten years. The pseudo-"scholars" who denounce him are blind leaders of the blind. Some of the "Sixteen Crucified Saviors" described by the late Mr. Graves are undoubtedly myths. But he might hav added the Jesus who was stoned and hanged about 75 years before Christ who was not a myth. ANTICHRIST.

Mrs. O. K. Smith to Mrs. Juliet Severance.

DEAR MRS. SEVERANCE: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 22d you struck the key-note regarding the treatment of women (especially those occupying the public rostrum) by that great body of Freethinkers known as the Materialistic element of this country. I do heartily indorse your idea of allowing that masculin power to enjoy, to the fullest extent, a masculin convention, under the direct control of masculin officials, and let this continue until they have learned to respect woman in deed as well as word. Is this neglect from force of habit, borrowed from priest and pope, that these wise men ignore woman's abilities to lead, or even stand side by side with them upon the public rostrums? Or upon mature reflection have they decided that man only is capable of managing all public meetings for the dissemination of intellectual, moral, and Liberal thought, and the mission of woman, as in the past, must be to collect the pennies and dress for the occasion. "I suffer not a woman to speak in the churches," was said many hundred years ago by a man (he may hav been an official), but to-day the sayings of Paul are ignored, in words, by the leading lights of Freethinkers' conventions, but in example they are sustained to a lamentable extent. Paul in his day was a Freethinker, but he wanted the whole say to himself, and I regret to say that many of the Freethinking men of this country are like poor old Paul – they want to say it all themselvs. Hence, why should Mrs. Severance expect woman's voice to be heard among that august body of men soon to assemble in convention at Salamanca, N. Y. Some years ago, while Mrs. Colby and myself were sojourning at Houston, Texas, where the Liberal societies were at that time composed entirely of male membership, we inquired the reason and were informed that no women were ever solicited to join, whereupon we conspired with them to form a "woman's radical club." They were delighted with the idea, and when Mrs. Calby gave notice, at the close of her lecture, that a meeting would be held in that hall the following Wednesday, for the express purpose above mentioned, one of that august body of men arose, and, with a dignified air, inquired "if he understood aright, that it was exclusivly for women," to which she replied: "Yes, sir; you understood exactly what I meant. Tell your wife and daughter to be here." The meeting was held, an organization was effected, officers chosen, and it flourished like a green bay-tree. They held festivals and sociables, had lectures, and the men actually attended, and within a year they were urgently solicited to join, in a body, the Liberal League, to which a woman replied, "Ah! ah! this means that we hav a few dollars in our treasury that you'd like to handle." A word to the wise is sufficient. I'm not a public speaker, hence hav no ax to grind. OLIVE K. SMITH.

"Do as I Tell You, Not as I Do."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 1st appeared an article with quotations from the Advocate concerning a Methodist brother who lost confidence in his minister because he thought him (the minister) not an honest man, and therefore could not believe in his piety. He asked advice from another minister, or at least, a defender of fraudulent ministers, who, of course, advises him thus:

"Our Lord Jesus Christ has settled this question so that no follower of his need hav any trouble in coming to conclusions that it is his duty to continue to hear him so long as he occupies the position of pastor in the legal manner. Great is the self-denial requisit to do so. The duty is plain. Turn to the twenty-third chapter of Matthew, and beginning with the first verse, read the following: 'Then spake Jesus to the multitude, and to his deciples, saying, The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses's seat; all therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do, but do not ye after their works; for they say and do not.' Here, then, our savior plainly commands that we are to listen to them."

From this Bible quotation we can likewise infer that we are to listen to ministers and obey them, whether they preach morality or immorality, Christianity or Infidelity. We are to do this even though we know that they, themselvs, do not believe a word of what they preach.

This text abbreviated into "Do as I tell you, not as I do," is often made use of by theological quacks to blindfold their innocent dupes. But how absurd when rightly considered. The only honesty therein is their admitting that they are not altogether honest.

These pious frauds, it seems, do not know or do not want to know, that man, and especially little children, hav a faculty of imitation; which is at least equally as strong and activ as is that other of obedience. When mankind are taught to reverence and obey an instructor, either of religious or other matters, it is most natural for them to imitate him; and more so in our children. All men, involuntarily, to a great extent, pattern after each other. We must,

in this case, either obey the faculty of imitation, and neglect and crucify reason; or obey the latter and neglect the former. If we follow the first, we will be made dupes of; if the second, we can pay no respects to those who "preach one thing and do another." It is the imitating these pious impostors that causes the many dissemblers and hypocrits who now surround us, and blockade the progress of our welfare and happiness.

Not long since, a young man of this vicinity took to market a load of corn valued at about five dollars. All day long his load stood on the street without his being able to effect a sale. At last, however, he sold to a poor widow for something less than market price. When the bargain was closed, the poor woman began to think that, perhaps, she had not money enough, and said to him that she had only nine dollars, and if his load came to more than that he had better try and sell elsewhere. To this, he replied, that he thought his load would come to more, but since it was so late he would let her hav the load for the nine dollars, and he did; and then returned to his companions boasting of the "smart trick" he played. This fellow you can find in his pew every Sunday, striking his breast, his lips going at a "two-forty" rate, and his eyes rolled up like a "dying calf;" pays his priest very liberally, who in turn forgivs him the crime of cheating the poor widow. Of course this secures him a pew in heaven, while the widow, too poor to buy one, or to support the church, cannot get there; and in truth she deserves a better place and better companions than, as we are told, are up there. Such are thousands and thousands of the members of which the church now even boasts. But is it to be wondered at when their pious instructors go before them with so many like, and even worse, examples? Truly, modern religion is but an asylum for criminals.

I will answer their absurd "Do as I tell you, not as I do," by a far nobler and better: Teach us truth, science, and morality, and we will obey you. Go before us with good examples and we will imitate you.

French Creek, Ia. JOHN H. HIRT.

Priest and Other Craft.

It is sure to be the case that abuses will creep in where those who do the paying are not close and exacting supervisors. Witness the enormities that priestcraft has heaped up in the name of a pure, simple, humble Jesus Christ. Witness the wrongs and oppressions that legislators create in the name of government for the people. Self-defense is necessary, and abuse creeps in to raise vast standing armies. In this way the means, the tools for doing anything in time, become the grand object. Thus, at a time when all learning was in Greek or Latin books, it became necessary to learn Greek and Latin in order to study law, medicin, theology, etc.; therefore colleges were founded to instruct in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, etc. Now, to-day, when all the sciences may be learned from English books, these sleepy old colleges go on teaching nothing but the dead languages or abstract mathematics. It is utterly absurd, but, having become an institution with thousands interested to keep it up, absurdity is a God to be worshiped, and half the world never dare stop to ask about it.

The greatest men, the best races of men, hav received their educations in very humble schools. Education, like religion, is not promoted by the splendor and pretension of surroundings. It is not possible that any people will ever surpass the Scotch of the eighteenth century, who were educated in humble parish schools. It is a matter of common knowledge that applicants from our schools and academies for positions requiring common education are far inferior to applicants fifty years ago.

It is also known that taxes are much higher now than they were forty or fifty years ago, although we hav five times more people—even ten times more in many counties—and fifty times more wealth. Counties that forty years ago had five or ten thousand inhabitants, good schools, good roads and bridges, and ample public buildings, and that levied a tax of five mills on the dollar, and where wealthiest citizens paid not over twenty-five dollars in taxes, now, with from thirty to fifty thousand inhabitants, poor roads and bridges, and perhaps using the same old public buildings, levy from fifteen to twenty-five mills, and some of their wealthiest citizens pay a thousand dollars taxes per year! Is not this wonderful? Let us study the past, and contrast it with the present. It is wise to do so. "I hav but one lamp," said Patrick Henry, "to guide my feet, and that is the lamp of experience." There is something wrong somewhere. It is universal, wide-extending, deep-plumbing, and high-ascending. Could we see results, fruits for this expenditure, we ought not to complain. Much as the rising generation thinks of its accomplishments, the elders will laugh to scorn any pretensions of their superiority. Did it exist it would be proudly acknowledged. More costly school-buildings are erected, and education has its priesthood. We know what that means—abuse, imposition—in a word, all the ways by which cunning idleness taxes sweating toil—to wit, humbuggery. I say toil, for all these costs are finally paid by the workers with hands. The landlord takes it off his domestics and head farmers; the head farmers take it off the sub-lessees, the sub-lessees off the poor wretched shantier and dug-outer, and the wretched poor put less salt in their bread and less bread into their stomachs. And there it ends in premature graves, save when it flames up in wild, mad havoc. And this thing has grown to be so powerful, so proud-stomached, that no one dare criticise or question it. Scorn and contempt are heaped on him as "an enemy to education," "foe to progress," "friend of ignorance and darkness."

Not intending to write a volume, I must break off here, merely asking, Are we not in danger of making the means whereby education is obtained the sole grand object of the whole system? Are there not also too many parents instilling into the minds of children, and too many professors into the minds of the pupils, the idea that the object of education is chiefly to allow scholars to liv without manual labor? A great English duke had three fine sons whom he had educated to perfection, as we now think is perfect education. One prepared for the cabinet, one for the bar, another for the church, as he informed his American visitor. A few years later the visitor returned and found the three sons farming. They explained that the professions were overcrowded, while there was plenty of room on the farm. They were all content and happy, and were real, working, practical farmers. If we go upon the continent of Europe we shall see that most great families, even royalty, educate their children to do manual labor. 'Tis only the sovereigns of our United States can afford to educate their heirs to evade labor of the hands, and despise it. "Go to school, my son, and learn, that you may never hav to work like your poor father," says the parent. "Study, be diligent," says the professor to his pupils, "in order that you may not hav to dig like those workers out there." Whereas it should be said, "Learn, be diligent, in order that the enlightened brain shall direct the skilful hand, and because, before and above all.

"It is not all of life to liv,
Nor all of death to die."

Mr. Fletcher Corrects Mr. Hull.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In a recent copy of your interesting paper I see a letter from Moses Hull, in which he criticises the action of Ed. L. Wheeler in regard to Mrs. Kendrick's not being allowed to giv a lecture at Neshaminy Falls while Mr. Wheeler was acting as secretary for the association. As Mr. Wheeler and Mrs. Kendrick were both intimate friends of mine, and I was consulted by both in regard to the affair, I feel that I can speak with authority of this matter. Mr. Wheeler was the secretary of the First Association of Spiritualists, but he was not the association. He received from that body instructions whom to engage, and if any change was to be made it devolved upon him to make it. Mrs. Kendrick was not known to the committee, except as Mrs. Kendrick, and when it was known who she was they decided not to hav her speak, and it became Mr. Wheeler's duty to inform her of that fact. Personally he had a warm regard for Mrs. Kendrick, and often spoke with regret of the part he was obliged to take in that affair. When it is known that the same association canceled Mr. Wheeler's engagement after the Lake Pleasant trouble it is not difficult to understand their position in this matter. A more cowardly proceeding was never seen in the days of the antislavery movement, when the advocates of reform were hounded from town to town, than disgraced Lake Pleasant last year, and I know that Mr. Hull, who has personally endured so much at the hands of those canting hypocrits, would be the last to throw a shadow over the fair name of a man who gave his all in the cause of human liberty.

A Letter From a Veteran.

I hav just been reading Parton's "Biography of Jefferson," and it pleases me so much that I feel like asking all your readers to giv themselvs the pleasure of reading it, and not only that one biography, but every one which he (Mr. Parton) has written. He seems to me to be the prince of biographers; you are made acquainted with so much that when you hav read the life of the one man you find that you hav learned a great deal of many men and women, and of the times as well; and then the language that drops from Mr, Parton's pen is like a picture, not only rich in beautiful coloring, but the shades, or, rather, shading, is perfect; and, more than all, you feel and know that the writer is giving you the truth, as far as he has been able to obtain it.

Not long since I read "The Bay Path," written by Dr. Holland—a story of the times of witchcraft in the "old Bay state," full of truth, and interesting to any one who likes to follow reform and reformers through the history of our own country. Dr. Holland in that story makes the reformers of both sexes, persons of sound morals, even though in their zeal they outrage the feelings of the respectable people of their time, as much as do our friends, the Heywoods, Comstock,.and his misguided followers to-day, but the particular ininterest which I felt in reading "The Bay Path" was in contrasting the Dr. Holland of that book with the Dr. Holland who wrote the "Apotheosis of Dirt," and prophesied that the women who went up to New York to attend the reception given to Mr. Bennett would liv to be ashamed of it. Alas, that some of those same women should hav lived to bury the dear, good man, as much a martyr as any other of the dead who hav died for opinion's expressed not held at the time to be orthodox. If I could believe that Mr. Bennett, as Mr. Bennett, still exists in organic form, so that he can take cognizance of the things he once loved, I should think he would rejoice at the continued improvement of his precious paper. I am sure it must delight all his friends. Miss Wixon is making her page a pleasant one for everyone to read. It is a great talent that can delight the young with real sense.

I must not make my letter too long, but I like sometimes to shake hands through THE TRUTH SEEKER with old friends. How fast they are disappearing from us! Mr. Denton has gone! Alas! alas! I mourn him as a brother. Would that I could comfort his bereaved wife, but death is just death. This separation from loved ones is dreadful. Only time can giv us comfort. But this is nature's law, and we can only submit.

With great interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER and all its readers, I am, Very truly,

Syracuse, Dec. 30, 1883. LUCY N. COLMAN.

The Morning Star.

We hav the morning star,
O foolish people, O kings!
With us the daysprings are,
Even all the fresh daysprings;
For us, and with us, all the multitudes of things.

O sorrowing hearts of slaves,
We heard you beat from far!
We bring the light that saves,
We bring the morning star.
Freedom's good things we bring you, whence all good things are.

The strife of things and beauty,
The fire and light adored,
Truth and life-light'ning duty,
Love without crown or sword,
That by his might and godhead makes man god and lord.

These hav we, these are ours,
That no priests giv, nor kings;
The honey of all these flowers,
The heart of all these springs;
Ours, for where freedom livs not, there liv no good things.

Rise, ere the dawn be risen;
Come, and be all souls fed;
From field, and street, and prison,
Come, for the feast is spread;
Liv, for the truth is living; wake, for the night is dead.

Ought Freeman to be Imprisoned for Life?

I see a little article in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER taken from the Christian Advocate, in which is taken the affirmativ of this question. "Though he may appear ever so sane, as well," he says, "turn a tame lion loose in the streets." To which you added a few words of very proper comment. I think myself that it is much the better way to dispose of these religiously insane creatures, rather than to hang them, as the nation did with that other religiously insane creature but a few months since.

But then, Mr. Editor, as an intelligent humanitarian, don't you think that by putting even a Bible Christian lunatic under proper treatment for a sufficient length of time, there might be a possibility of their being restored mentally, so that society would not be endangered by their having their liberty? My own opinion is that when the religion of humanity, based on common sense, comes in to take the place of this Bible religion, based on gods, angels, and ghosts, this will be a matter that will be taken into consideration, and eventually carried out, not only with this class of murderers, but with all others.

"As well turn a tame lion loose in the streets," our Christian editor says. Now, Mr. Editor, if we had this animal caged up long enough, and had pulled all its carnivorous teeth and claws out, then we might afford to let him out on his good behavior. Just so with one of these Bible-religion lunatics—keep them shut up until they make it manifest to their keepers that they would do no harm if they had their liberty; then remove from their reach this old Bible and their religion built upon it, that had been the cause of their crime against society, and in the place of this old superstition let them hav the advantage of good, sound reading matter pertaining to this world and this life, and thus develop and bring into activity their intellectual and moral powers in the stead of their emotional nature, and with this kind of treatment we would hav reason to hope that with their liberty they might fill the place of good citizens. Then let them out on trial, and if they should begin to manifest religious symptoms again by ruminating over the pages of that old book, then shut them up again.

"Incorporated Benevolent Institutions."

It is probable that in nothing more than charities, except it be the loss by exemption from taxation, is the state swindled by the various churches. "Charity covereth a multitude of sins," and also throws its mantle over a vast amount of indirect peculation, for by no other word can the work of many "benevolent" societies be designated. It is the boast of the churches that they support organized charities, and that without them the poor and sick would be badly off indeed.

But this pretense is cruelly overthrown by the array of cold figures furnished by the State Board of Charities and Commissioners of Lunacy in their last report. From these it appears that the value of the property held by the various charitable institutions on the first day of October, 1883, was $42,935,360.04, of which $35,415,555.45 was in real estate, and $7,519,804.59 in personal property.

The receipts of all these institutions for the year ending Sept. 30th, 1883, were as follows:

State institutions,	$909,221
County and city institutions,	2.363.720
Incorporated benevolent institutions,	7,157,002
Total,	$10,429,944

Of this sum $719,753.98 was derived from the state, $4,876,519.37 from cities and counties, and $1,520,571.15 from legacies and donations.

The expenditures during the year were as follows:

By state institutions,	$1,435,242
By county and city institutions,	2.363,720
By incorporated benevolent institutions,	6,492,431
Total,	$10,291,393

Of course the state supports its own institutions, the cities and counties theirs; but do the "incorporated benevolent institutions" do the same? It appears not. The state institutions received less than one million dollars, those of cities and counties but a little over two and a quarter millions, while the private church associations absorbed over seven millions.

Where did they get the money? From the churches? No. From the public treasury. Less than a sixth was from legacies and donations. The cities and counties of the state paid more than twice the amount expended on their own institutions. The church properties (hospitals, asylums) spent six and a half millions, of which the outside public furnished three-fourths, raised by payments from patients, and by taxation.

Now no one objects to a body of churchmen building a hospital and caring for patients who might otherwise be neglected. Such work is to be commended. But when the church starts an "asylum" or "protectory" in which the efforts of the conductors are expended in proselyting, and compels the state, by means of its lobbyists in the legislature, to largely maintain it, then the taxpayer (and everybody is a taxpayer) should protest. A case occurred not many months ago in which a literary man of this city, whom we will call Mr. B., was taken to an "incorporated benevolent institution." He was able to and did pay for his medical treatment. When convalescing he sent word to a friend, who may be called Mr. R., that he wanted to see him, and asked that some books be brought him to read. On his visit Mr. R. took one of the volumes of Mr. Bennett's travels, as the sick man was not only a Freethinker but an acquaintance and friend of Mr. Bennett. He was stopped at the door of the hospital, and informed that the book must be taken to the office for inspection. Mr. R. explained what the book was, upon which he was informed that Mr. B. could not be permitted to hav it.

This was as impertinent a case of censorship as ever took place. Both of these men are profound scholars, and hav written many of the articles that are considered authoritativ in our standard cyclopedias. Yet the choice of reading for the sick man was limited by the pious clerks, who probably hadn't brains enough to write a penny ballad! Although the sick man paid the price asked for his material comforts and medical attendance, he was not allowed to judge for himself as to what he would read!

Again. Appeals are constantly made to the public of this city for reading matter for the hospitals. Having a large number of TRUTH SEEKERS and other Liberal reading on hand that he had no further use for, a Liberal gentleman took them to the people who appealed for literature for the sick and offered them. He was politely informed that such reading matter would not be handed to the patients. "But," said he, "many of your patients may be glad of these papers and books." "That may be true," replied the official, "but they cannot hav them."

After a little investigation, and running across a few cases of this kind, no one can doubt that the "incorporated benevolent institutions" upon which the people bestow millions of dollars annually are run in the interests of the churches, and are vast proselyting concerns.

Part of the money which THE TRUTH SEEKER pays for rent goes for taxes on the building. It is not justice that that money should be used to support institutions into which THE TRUTH SEEKER will not be admitted by the puffed-up pietists who guard their doors.

Silencing a Heretic.

The Episcopal church has come to the rescue of Moses against Newton, and the latter has had to succumb. He is silenced, but not convinced, and the probability is that his silence will speak more eloquently against the ancient character than anything he could say.

For several Sundays past Mr. Newton has devoted his afternoons to explaining the Pentateuch from the standpoint of advanced Biblical scholarship. This involved the rejection of the inspiration theory, and a relegation of Genesis to its true place among childish religious legends. While nothing was advanced by Mr. Newton that has not been known and said by other biblical investigators, his presentation of the subject has angered his fellow Episcopal ministers, and for days they hav been saying all manner of evil things of him—among other things, accusing him of being insane.

Assistant Bishop Potter, his ecclesiastical superior, has now asked him to desist from further pulpit promulgation of his heresy, and Mr. Newton "for the sake of peace" submits to be muzzled. In announcing his compliance with the bishop's order, he used the occasion to say several heretical things. The object of his lectures, he said, was to enable his congregation to disentangle the overgrowth of legend and myth existing in the Old Testament, that they might read Genesis without affronting their consciences trying to make science of its myths, or history out of its legends. The pulpit on this had kept culpable silence, and the intelligence of the age is increasingly drifting away from the church because of that silence, or of what is worse, the continued utterance of outworn conceptions. "In every birth-age of a new thought of religion harm has been done by those who squared to the new light. Christianity did such harm in its dawn, and its apostles were Infidels and Atheists. The Reformation did such harm; and the men whom we are now honoring were charged by the priests of their day with destroying faith and opening the floodgates of moral disorder."

With this parting shot, Mr. Newton passed to the preaching of a sermon scarcely less heretical than his lectures. He said:

"Christianity did not begin with Jesus Christ. It is as old as true religion, as old as the instinct of divine light in man. And since the round, full-orbed incarnation of Christ the incarnation is still going on. The Romish church laid hold of this truth and put it in gross form in the doctrin of the real presence, which enshrines a truth that Protestantism may correct. The word is ever bodying itself in the flesh. It abides with saints and sages. No council of priests or bishops ever had the power to say: 'Thus endeth the inspiration of the Almighty.' The truth is that the ever-incarnating God is manifesting himself. What did the Reformation mean if not that Christ came again in the monk Martin? What does the Reformation mean to us if not that the soul of it is as true as the epistles of Paul and of Peter and as truly a revelation from on high? There is no line to be found even in revelation from on high? There is no line to be found even in revelation by which we can circumscribe the manifestation of the divine. If this be the true philosophy of the divine incarnation, Infidelity is not on the part of those who see and face and square themselvs to and follow the light, but Infidelity is on the part of those who see the light, can't disprove it, and, knowing they dare not face it, refrain from studying it, and deny it when they see it, and would remand us to the darkness of the past. The Infidelity is on the part of those men, whosoever they be, howsoever they be named, who, feeling not the glimmering light beaming in on man, shut their windows and remand us to darkness. I hold that the one danger to religion to-day is not in any new light which is coming, for if it be light, then is it of God, and if it be not true, then will it pass away with the ephemeral fancies of men. You should follow the light wherever it shows itself, whatever the difficulty, so long as you keep peace with your brother. The old and the new will be reconciled. The poles of science and scripture will yet be one. Will we see it in our day? We hope so. But it will not be seen by those who bury themselvs in darkness. They hinder God by clogging the channel."

When this is simmered down and divested of superfluous words, Mr. Newton would seem to mean that, in his opinion, the Infidels (he uses the term in an opprobrious sense) are those who will not advance with him. In short, the orthodox are the traitors to Christianity, and not he.

If Mr. Newton had said that religion did not begin with Christ, his words would be more intelligible. It is true that Christianity began with Paul and not with Christ, but it is upon the latter's shoulders that the superstructure popularly rests. While claiming to be still a Christian, Mr. Newton, by his utterances upon the divine incarnation, would appear to be a religious evolutionist, and to believe that the coming of Christ was but a link in the chain of not much more vital importance than the advent of Luther. His next apostolic link will probably be Auguste Comte and Herbert Spencer.

Mr. Newton is a Christian who has grown beyond his creed. He sees the untenableness of the church's position, but not being willing to let go all at once, he is building fanciful improvements upon Christinity, utterly forgetting the scriptural injunction not to put new wine into old bottles.

He and Mr. Beecher ought to study John Stuart Mill's work on logic.

Catholics and the School Funds.

We do not claim any prophetic credit for pointing out the meaning of Mgr. Capel's warlike speech on the school question. There was but that one initiatory step which could be taken without a revolution. But the Monsignor's utterance becomes more significant every day. Father Ducey's explanation of the meaning of the papal order to found parochial schools patterned after those of the Middle Ages, and his cautious insinuation that a request might be made of the state to appropriate a share of the schools funds for their support, has been very naturally followed by an actual demand. Fortunately the school board to whom the priest made his petition was prevented by law from complying, and it is well that the law existed, as the board was altogether too complacent in its treatment of the prayer.

The case occurred in Doyleston, Pa. Henry Stommel is pastor of the St. Mary's Catholic church at that place. Connected with the church is a parochial school, with an average attendance of ninety scholars. A few weeks ago Mr. Stommel conceived the idea of obtaining financial aid from the borough school board for this parochial school. He addressed a petition to the school board reciting that the expense of the public schools of Doylestown had been reduced by the establishment of the parochial school and that many of St. Mary's congregation were paying school tax and receiving no benefit from it. The petition closed by alleging that much good work had been accomplished by the school, and asserted the claims of the petitioner "to the sympathy of the good people of Doylestown." Father Stommel then submitted his paper to the leading citizens of Doylestown and obtained over fifty signatures. None of the signers were Catholics. Subjoined to the petition and preceding the names of the signers was a statement to the effect that those whose names appeared below fully understood the petition and also approved it.

The school board, being debarred by law, could not grant the prayer of the petitioners, but the matter has raised a ruction in the town, and the newspapers hav been full of it. A Liberal opened the warfare through the columns of the Doylestown Democrat. He was replied to by the priest, who demanded his name, and concluded by hurling God's wrath upon all Infidels. The Protestant ministers then took up the cudgels, and a lively scrimmage ensued between them and the priest. The Liberal, after showing that school funds could not legally nor rightly be used in the manner proposed, stepped out, and the Christians and politicians are having an old-fashioned religious fight.

The features of this affair that should not escape serious attention are: 1. The petition of the Catholics for the money; 2. The fact that the signers were Protestants; 3. The friendly manner in which the school board received the petition—it being by no means certain that it would hav been refused had there been no law in the way of granting it; 4. That the Protestant objections to the Catholic demands consist of the inconsequential charge that the latter would remove the Bible from the public schools, and teach Catholicism in the parochial institutions, when, in Protestant opinion, the state should not only cause the Bible to be daily read, but Protestantism should be inculcated. They hav no word of censure for the violation of justice in such partisan distribution of funds rised by impartial taxation; they raise no voice in favor of free secular schools. The burden of their complaint is that their religious enemies are getting privileges they do not, because unwilling to burden themselvs with parochial schools. They desire the state to do all the supporting (taxing Freethinkers for the purpose), and then leave the Bible in the schools to warp the minds of the children in favor of Christianity.

It may do for the present to leave this question to be fought over by the two great religious bodies, but the example of the withdrawing Freethinker cannot always be safely followed. Neither the Catholic nor Protestant church has the slightest idea of true freedom. All contests between them are simply struggles for supremacy. The principle of free secular government should ever be kept in view in discussing this question, and who is to do it but the Freethinker?

Clergymen as Legislators.

The distrust of clergymen entertained by the people of many states is evidenced by the incorporation into their constitutions of provisions making ministers ineligible to law-making positions. The attention of the public has been directed to this by the election of a local preacher to the Maryland Senate. As he had never been ordained, however, he was allowed to sit.

The provision of the Maryland constitution upon which the question arose is this:

"No minister or preacher of the gospel, of any religious creed or denomination, shall be eligible as senator or delegate."

Substantially the same prohibition was contained in the Constitution of 1776. This Maryland case has led the Sun to look for like provisions in the fundamental law of other states. It finds similar articles in the constitutions of Delaware, Kentucky, and Tennessee. In Delaware the language of the constitution is as follows:

"No ordained clergyman or ordained preacher of the gospel of any denomination shall be capable of holding any civil office in the state, or of being a member of either branch of the Legislature, while he continues in the exercise of the pastorial or clerical functions."

Here the prohibition extends even further than in Maryland. It extends not only to membership in the legislature, but to the holding of any civil office. The constitution of Kentucky proscribes thus:

"No person while he continues to exercise the functions of a clergyman, priest, or teacher of any religious persuasion, society, or sect . . . shall be eligible to the general assembly."

In Tennessee the framers of the constitution of 1870 go so far as to giv a reason for the exclusion of clergymen from the law-making body of the state:

"Whereas, ministers of the gospel are by their profession dedicated to God and the care of souls, and ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their functions; therefore no minister of the gospel or priest of any denomination whatever shall be eligible to a seat in either house of the legislature."

In New Hampshire a constitutional provision has long prohibited Catholics from holding a state office. A few years ago an effort was made to repeal the paragraph, but, we believe, was unsuccessful. The adoption of these provisions was due in most cases to sectarian jealousy, and they were not the decrees of Freethinkers. If our Christian forefathers who knew all about each other were so afraid to trust a clergyman with legislativ power, what would they not hav done with the God-in-the-Constitutionists of today?

The Sun intimates that however bad the clergymen used to be, their admission could not now make our legislatures any worse. Which is equivalent to saying the pot cannot call the kettle black.

Chainey's Sunday Evening Lecture Course.

Over one hundred tickets per month hav been subscribed for this course, and its success is now assured. The lectures will begin next Sunday evening, Jan. 20th, at the German Masonic Hall. The subject of the opening lecture will be "The Present Condition and Prospects of Freethought in America." It is hoped that all the Liberals of this city will take an earnest interest in this course of lectures, and increase, if possible, the list of monthly subscribers, and also to fill the hall on Sunday evenings. The well-known ability of Mr. Chainey must be seconded by the efforts of the Liberal public. One way to overthrow the tyranny of the church is to put in its place, for the time being at least, something of a similar nature, unwedded to the ancient superstitions, and this is the Sunday evening lecture platform, where the best thought of the age can be spoken. Something of the sort must be maintained in this great metropolis, and now that an opportunity is presented every one interested in the progress of truth and humanity should endeavor to make it a permanent success. Price of single tickets, 25 cents; season tickets, $1.50; to be had at THE TRUTH SEEKER office; of T. B. Wakeman, president of the Liberal Club, or Samuel P. Putnam, 219 West 25th st. Let there be a large sale of tickets and a full attendance and support of these valuable lectures.

Book Notices.

Mr. Putnam has had his "Problem of the Universe" printed in neat pamphlet form, and we hav it for sale; price, 20 cents. It is a Materialist's statement of his ideas of force and matter, and things in general, and nowhere hav we seen a more beautiful exposition. The success of Mr. Andrews in pulling the structure to pieces will depend upon whether mind is co-eval, co-eternal, and co-equal (if not exterior to) with matter, or whether it is but a function of the latter. The difference between Mr. Putnam and Mr. Andrews can be finally simmered down to the difference between a scientific Spiritualist and a scientific Materialist. Mr. Putnam asserts that mind is the result of organized matter; that without the matter mind is nothing, any more than is the motion of the piston when steam is shut out of the cylinder. Mr. Andrews, on the contrary, holds that mind is all mixed up with matter, has existed just as long and will continue to exist just as long. Mr. Andrews stands with his philosophy midway between the extreme Materialist and the extreme Theist, and endeavors to be the peacemaker. He gets a good many blows in the face in consequence of his pacific attitude, not the least forcible of which our genial friend Putnam has inflicted by his criticism of the Pantarch's method of deducing analogies.

We feel sure that every Materialist will want Mr. Putnam's pamphlet to fortify his position, and every Spiritualist will want it to learn how and where his strongest enemy is entrenched; and this opinion, we see, is shared by the Investigator, whose editor says:

"In this pamphlet of thirty-nine pages may be found a great deal of ability, thought, and reflection in favor of the philosophy according to nature, or Materialism and Atheism. The author, who is a superior writer, earnest, forcible, and clear in his ideas, and remarkably strong and vigorous in his language, says that 'this essay is the result of years of mental conflict;' he has 'tried both theology and metaphysics, and they hav turned to dust and ashes. They hav given me no solution of the universe, and hence no joy and no comfort.'

"As a substitute for them he adopts science as found in the teachings of nature, and it demonstrates to him that there is nothing supernatural; that this world is the only one known; that human intelligence is all there is; that matter is eternal, and that mind is an effect rather than a cause—in a word, that Materialism solves the problem of the universe, and is the only reasonable, logical, and scientific view that can be taken on this great subject.

"We recommend Mr. Putnam's pamphlet to all thinkers, reasoners, and arguers. They will find it to be one of the ablest, clearest, and most conclusiv essays they ever read on the subject of mental and moral philosophy, and it furnishes a great theme for contemplation, thought, and study. Every Materialist, especially, should hav a copy."

Of "False Claims" the Olive Branch says: Mr. Remsburg "has, in this address, an array of facts that must awaken the slumbering faculties of all who are willing to look facts in the face." Of the "Crimes of Preachers" the same paper observes: "This pamphlet of one hundred pages has been gathered from the records of the public press, and are, without doubt, all true. But we see no other way only for the author to issue another and an enlarged edition. Facts of this kind are accumulating rapidly. The showing is a painful one, when we take into account that every one whose name appears in this pamphlet claims to hav been called by God to administer his word to a fallen world. Price 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York."

What is Going to be the Result?

From the New York Sun.

Another clergyman of the Episcopal church has been propounding views regarding the Bible and its inspiration which are decidedly unorthodox. It is probable, however, that they are not unlike those of many of his brethren of the ministry, who differ from him only in being more discreet about committing themselvs on a subject so perilous.

Indeed, the clergyman in question, the Rev. Dr. Bush, of Staten Island, says that his opinions touching inspiration and revelation, which are substantially the same as those of the Rev. Heber Newton, hav been "indorsed and commended by some of the leading men in the Episcopal church." There is nothing surprising in the statement, for Mr. Newton continues to be rector of a very prosperous parish, and it does not now seem probable that he will be subjected to ecclesiastical disciplin because he applies to the Bible methods of criticism which ignore or directly antagonize the teachings of his church as to divine revelation. Of course he would not remain undisturbed if faith in the Bible was as strong, as entire, and as universal as it once was among Episcopalians. A quarter of a century ago he would hav been promptly unfrocked.

The Rev. Dr. Bush, however, has not had so good fortune. He has not been called to account by his ecclesiastical superiors, but he has been obliged to resign his rectorship, while Dr. Newton apparently is more popular than ever in All Souls' parish.

It is true that Dr. Bush gave offense to the Staten Island church, or members of it, in other ways, as by opposing a church raffle; but the efficient cause of his resignation was the difference of opinion his sermons on the Bible excited. Yet even he seems to hav had the majority of his parishioners on his side. "It is not true," he writes, "that the rector had the condemnation of one-half of the congregation."

Is it not strange that the Episcopal church permits the utterance in its pulpits of views regarding the Bible which undermine the very foundations of its theology? Take away faith in the scriptures as the inspired, all-sufficient word of God, and there remains nothing for that theology to rest upon. Reason has replaced faith, and criticism has supplanted devout belief in the written Word.

What Ingersoll is to an Irishman.

From the Boston Traveller.

A gentleman of Milesian descent was overheard yesterday describing Col. Ingersoll as an "amethyst." This reminds one of the man who wrote to his friend: "Dear John he is not a Swedenborgian. He is a Norwegian."

Lectures and Meetings.

MR. REMSBURG will deliver his famous lecture of "False Claims" before the Friendship Liberal League, at Hancock Hall, 815 Girard Ave., Philadelphia, Sunday, January 20th, at 10:30 A.M. All the town should hear him.

C. B. REYNOLDS, who drew the largest house at the Salamanca Convention, is now permanently in the lecture field, and would like engagements. His terms are very reasonable. His recent papers in THE TRUTH SEEKER hav been highly commended, and his speech printed last week is a scholarly and eloquent effort. From a personal acquaintance with Mr. Reynolds we are sure he will make warm friends wherever he goes. He will attend the Linesville, Pa. celebration on the 29th, and would like engagements in towns between that place and Rochester. Mr. Reynolds is also the authorized agent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will carry a supply of books along with him, and take orders for any that he may not hav on hand, to be promptly filled from this office. Address him until the 21st at Box 104 North Parma, New York. After the 21st and till the 25th telegraph him at 93 Broadway, Rochester, New York.

JAY CHAAPEL an earnest worker in the broad field of reform, will answer calls to lecture anywhere in New England. The following are the names of some of his subjects. "A Trio of Reforms; or, the Evils and Errors of the Priests, Doctors, and Lawyers;" "Is Siritualism True?" "Christianity and Spiritualism Contrasted." Of his speech at the Rochester Convention the papers of that city said:

"The speaker possesses a good voice and pleasing personal appearance and he was closely listened to throughout."—Post-Express.

"The speaker illustrated his points with many instances in his own experiences, and the address was greeted with applause."—Morning Herald.

"The address, 'A Trio of Reforms,' was, earnestly delivered and listened to with the closest attention, and was freqently applauded by the large audience."—Democrat and Chronicle.

Mr. Chaapel's address during the month of January is No. 3 Concord Square Boston, Mass.

Let us giv a little attention, now, to the prevalent scientific position, iterated by Mr. Putnam, that matter is a real, permanent, thinglike affair, but that mind is a mere process, a flow, an on-going, like that of a stream. This is an idea that has grown up into special prominence within a few years, out of the fact that matter is a denser, grosser, more obvious and obtrusiv something than mind is; and that dense minds can best appreciate dense things; and that naturo-scientists, as a class, are the dense-minded order of mankind, as compared with metaphysicians and Spiritualists, who are the thin, attenuated, or tenuous order of thinkers, who can, by the adaptation and analogy, best appreciate thin, fine, delicate matters or affairs. This is not said to depreciate either party, but simply to state a fact; it is as possible to be too fine as to be too coarse; or too coarse as too fine; and the truth of these matters being known, each party will become anxious to learn of the other that which their different orders of faculty qualify each to learn, to appreciate, and to teach. Our so-called scientists, engaged perpetually—and led to be so by organization and habit—in the study of matter, appreciate the reality of matter only, and are often as unfit to study or to hav an intelligent opinion upon mental or spiritual affairs as a horse is to play the piano, or, rather, as a blacksmith is to repair a chronometer; while mere metaphysicians and Spiritualists are equally unqualified to decide a chemical or a mechanical question. Hence the need of a new order of thinkers who can cross the boundaries, see from opposit ends, compare, adjust, enlarge, and complete the knowledge of the other two styles of men. A wedge will illustrate. The Materialists are the butt-enders of the wedge in respect to knowledge or perception; and matter the butt-end in respect to being; and they two are analogical, or belong together; and the Mentalists are the thin-enders (of the wedge) in respect to knowledge; and mind the thin end of being; so that they two again are analogical or belong together. Each tends to deny or belittle the other, and to expound the whole universe from its own single point of view. Integralists or Universologists are those who attempt at least to compass the whole wedge; the butt-end, with its solid, massiv character, and the mere thin edge vanishing into nothing, and at the very nothing-point being the most efficient, and, in a sense, by far the most important part of the whole wedge. Let anybody think closely of what an edge really is, and try to define it, and he will meet with all the difficulty which there is in conceiving the reality of the most tenuous metaphysical or spiritual substances. But it is not the forte of Materialists to think closely and sharply upon any subject. They crush by the weight of their generalizations, and evade the keen blows of their antagonists by a mental thick-skinnedness which fails to know when it is hit.

But we hav drifted away a bit from our point, which is the assumption that matter is a real something (an "entity"), but that mind is a mere process. Nothing of the kind is true, except in appearance. Mind being (as we think it) thinner (more tenuous) than matter, it is easier to analyze it into successiv instants of movement, mere change or flux, than it is to do the same with matter so that the Materialists, who are feeble as metaphysicians, or in this mental exercise of analysis, are still strong enough that way to effect this feat and to proclaim that mind is a mere flux; but the metaphysician, who is accustomed to carry this sort of analysis out to rigorous ultimates, knows that, with a little more force put to the mental analyzing machinery, matter is resolved in precisely the same way into mere flux, and that all we know about it (from that point of view) is that it, precisely as in the case of mind, is a mere succession of changing states. It is exactly as in the case of microscopes of lower and higher power; or of telescopes, one of which will leave a nebula (the little cloud of stars so close that they are not seen apart) as a mass (matter-like), and another of which will resolve it or show the stars separate. Or it is the same as in the melting of substances—some must hav a higher temperature than others. To a high mental power of analysis, matter is resolved into a flux, the same as mind; but the Materialist, having a mental magnifier of a low power merely, sees mind resolved into a mere process; while he holds to matter as unresolvable, and calls it entity.

Heraclitus, two thousand years ago, knew better; he had the mental microscope of the higher power; he knew that matter, as well as mind, is a constant flux. He said, "All things flow" (everything is a process). "The ancients unite in ascribing to him the principle that the totality of things should be conceived of as in an eternal flow in an uninterrupted movement and transformation, and that all continuance of things is only an appearance. 'Into the same stream,' so runs a saying of his, 'we descend, and at the same time we do not descend; we are, and also we are not. For into the same stream we can not possibly descend twice, since it is always scattering and collecting itself again, or rather it, at the same time, flows to us and from us'" (Schwegler's Hist. of Phil., p. 32).

But while it is thus true that motism, motion, flow, flux, is an aspect (a way in which we think and must think) of the universe (alike matter and mind), it is true on the other hand, that this is only one of two opposit and equally necessary aspects. All things, both mind and matter, must be, and habitually are, thought of, on the contrary, and at the same time, as stationary realities; or as embodying statism, station, stability, permanency, rest, and, therefore, as entities (thingimies). It is not at all true, in any special sense, that mind as we think it (and this is all we hav to do with it) is exclusivly, or even habitually, conceived of as a flux or flow. On the contrary, it is, and always has been, and always will be, as really conceived of as entical (thingy) as the material world is; as really, but not so distinctly, because, as I hav said, it is a less obtrusiv entity; and it is now my business, in part, to bring out, or develop (as we develop the obscure image on a daguerreotype plate), that all-prevalent, but never heretofore clearly perceived, image of mind, which we all carry about with us, and to which we constantly refer, in all our spontaneous thinking about mind, whatever our theoretical crotchets may be.

The way, then, in which the whole world, in all ages and among all nations, as shown in the unconscious testimony of their languages, when compared, has conceived of mind, is as itself a world of a kind of its own, but a world still, precisely copying, repeating, or analogous with, the outer or material world we liv in. We are in the outer, objectiv, material world, and the inner, subjectiv, mental world is within us, the two answering to each other, as the image-world within a mirror answers to the image-causing world outside. There is quite as much of the static or stationary character in the image (while the two are in presence) as there is in the outer; and just as much of movement. The one is an exact copy of the other (inverted). Now what and how much an image is, in itself, or what or how much the things are in themselvs outside (Mr. Putnam says they are "substance, whatever that may be;" a metaphysical what-is-it), I am not concerned to inquire. (I am not so intensely and perversely metaphysical.) What I am concerned about is that we naturally, and necessarily, think of an image as a something which exactly counterparts in generals and particulars, in stationary features and in moving features, that of which it is the image; and that we naturally, habitually, and necessarily conceive of mind in the same way as an internal image-world, exactly answering to an external matter-world, filled with the same variety of image-things, in the same relations to each other as the matter-things which fill the exterior matter-world and so of their relations, static and mobile, to each other. This, as I mean it, is a new discovery in science, with the most far-reaching consequences; with nothing more than a mere poetical trace of any comprehension of it in either the science or the literature of the past. Out of it grows the possibility of a universal language, all of the words of which shall apply equally well to the matter-world and the mind-world, item for item (as some of our words now do), and other immense consequences in science too numerous to be even hinted at here.

The words of existing languages testify, as I hav said, to the unconscious, instinctiv, all-pervasiv presence to the mind of man, of the possibility of rendering a material phenomena into the terms of mind, or inversely, those of mind into the terms of matter; but nobody has, apparently, ever suspected this underlying law of metaphor to be universal, and as important, to say the least, as the law of gravitation. That law (gravitation) unifies the matter-world with itself; this law (that of metaphor) unifies the matter-world and the mind-world with each other. Take for example the word inclination. It applies equally well to matter; my body inclines on a couch; or to mind as I incline to visit a friend. This congruity of everything, everything, EVERYTHING of mind, to everything of matter, is the new idea. It is this which, in a great measure, founds Alwato.

Let me, in conclusion of this matter, demonstrate the fact that, on the testimony of extant words, we always conceive (however unconsciously) of mind as of a world, with all sorts of things contained, and all sorts of transactions going on in it, precisely as we conceive of this outer or material world. I say, for example, that "I hav such a thing in my mind," that such another thing "has gone out of my mind," etc. The mind forms always a grand receptacle, theater, or world where these things happen. Compare the following list of words:

Mind.	Matter.
Inclination (leaning).	Inclination (leaning).
Uprightness (downrightness).	Uprightness (downrightness).
Right (straight).	Right (line, angle) straight.
Wrong	Wrung ("crooked whisky")
Integrity (wholeness).	Integers (whole numbers).
Fractious (breaky, balky).	Fractions (broken numbers).
Understanding (platform of thought).	Platform, pedestal, basement.
Conation (mental effort).	Cone, as wedge, driving and splitting instrument.
Information.	Forming in.
Instruction.	Building in.
Education.	Drawing forth (as an army out of its quarters).
Structure.	Build.
Organ (of mind).	Organ (a material instrument).
Function (a doing).	Function (a doing).
Re-member (to reunite separated parts).	Re-member (the same).
Vacuity (mental).	Vacuity (emptiness).
Contents (of mind)	Contents (material).
Realize.	Thingify.
Process.	Go, proceeding, process.
Research.	Back-looking.
Intro-spection; Intuition.	In-looking.
Restraint.	Back-holding.
Con-ception (of an idea).	Conception (of a child).
Perception.	Taking in through (an opening).
Elevation (of mind).	Elevation of a bird (in the air).
Etc.	Etc.

These four dozen words can readily, when space is given, be made into four hundred, or four thousand—or, if we go to other languages, forty thousand—all illustrating the same wonderful coincidence between our natural ideas of the outer world and of the world within. This discovery, for it is really such, opens up an immense new field of scientific investigation, making the inquiring into ideas, and the comparison between the outer and the inner world, the most intensely interesting study ever offered to the human mind—opening the way to the intellectual unification of all the parts of the universe; founding a universal language, to be to the two or three thousand languages on the earth what the railroad is to the common road; expounding all sects, parties, and doctrins to each other; reconciling differences, harmonizing mankind; giving everybody just what everybody is seeking for, in every department of life; and, in a word, inaugurating the intellectual, scientific, and social millennium. Universologists and Alwatoists are engaged in exploiting this immense new field of investigation, and realifying its consequences. What do we care for the old effete metaphysical questions about what matter is, what mind is; which is first, which is second, etc.? We are investigating the phenomena of each (true scientific work), and the echo of relationship of the phenomena of the one to the phenomena of the other (still higher scientific work), in the most exhaustiv particularity and detail—exact scientific work, inductiv, Baconian, positivistic to the last degree. Will Mr. Putnam and that ilk not hav the kindness to take the pains to begin to understand us as we really are, instead of supposing that they know a priori what we must be, and classifying us with the musty schoolmen of the past, to whom they are themselvs far more closely related? They still hav the shell of the old egg sticking to them, which so confuses their vision that in looking at us they think we are back inside the shell; whereas, in fact, we pecked our way completely out of the shell some time ago, and are already chickens several days older than Mr. Putnam is, or they are.

I beg the opportunity for one more article in continuation of this reply, for the purpose of giving a sample of real Universological work as a curiosity for the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and just to giv Mr. Putnam a small dose of that particularity which he calls for; and when he shall know that we are prepared to pour out volume after volume of similar matter, he will perhaps giv up his idea that we are dealing in general deduction not resting on adequate detailed investigation.

I say real Universological work, for all that Mr. Putnam has said, and all that I hav said, has been talking about Universology, and not talking Universology itself (except incidentally). I know that what I shall present next is not exactly ordinary newspaper matter, even for so advanced and scientific a sheet as THE TRUTH SEEKER; nor is its milk for babes for scientific men themselvs; but I hope for once I shall be forgiven. So much has been said about Universology that it will be well to hav a specimen brick out of this new edifice, by which some advanced minds may be able to judge of it correctly. My subject will be "The Five Senses." As Mr. Putnam thinks we neglect the senses, that will be appropriate.

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

Brother Masquerier's Message of Despair.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Our aged brother, Lewis Masquerier, is a very discouraging reformer. He says that S. P. Andrews, with all his learning, "cannot explain his Universology of unism, duism, and trinism." And at the end of the same paragraph he adds that none of the leading phoneticians, naming five of them, with the Pantarch at the head and Prof. March at the foot, "has ever discovered the distinction between sonants and consonants, which can be seen by looking in the mouth with a glass." For thirty-two years Mr. Masquerier has been striving to teach this thing which any one can see by opening his mouth and looking in a glass; but nobody has yet seen it except the teacher. And the venerable Pantarch, Mr. Masquerier says, is trying to teach something which he himself can't explain.

"O squint-eyed science! hast thou wandered there
To waft us back the message of despair?"

Letters from Friends.

SYRACUSE, Dec. 13, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to your postal received today, reminding me of the expiration of my trial subscription, will say that I am much pleased with the paper and here inclose $2.50, the amount for one year.

Hoping you success and prosperity in the good cause and that THE TRUTH SEEKER will always find a place among my many other papers,

I am most truly yours, DE WITT C. JENKINS.

READING, MICH., Dec. 20, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I thought I would try to get along a short time without THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I take so many others, though none none excel your paper, if they equal it. So I made my intent known to my wife, and it would hav done you good to see the blood in her eye. Her Yankee was up at once. So here goes $2.50 for the paper another year, and I presume it will be the means of making me a life subscriber, as wife says we cannot keep house without it. H. N. PROUTY.

NORTH LAWRENCE, O., Dec. 28, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: A Liberal wedding took place at our friend Cardwell's yesterday, the 27th inst., the contracting parties being Mr. William West, of Carbon, Wyoming, and Maggie, third daughter of Mr. Henry Cardwell, of this place. The marriage ceremony was performed by I. M, Taggart, justice of the peace. A form was used from "The Truth Seeker Collection," it being the bride's desire to be married from them, believing more in the efficacy of love in joining together than in the old "Whom God hath joined together," etc. Their friends wish them a happy and prosperous voyage through life. A number of very beautiful and useful presents were presented to the newly married pair, some of which were from Carbon, Wyoming territory.

Yours truly. GEO. MUSGROVE.

HEMPSTEAD, ARK., Dec. 12, E.M. 283.

MR. EDITOR: I hope this may reach you before the first day of January next, as my subscription expires then. I hope, however, I may be in time. Inclosed you will find $5.

We want to send something to the Bennett Monument Fund; we want to send something to old Brother Hacker; we want to contribute something to every Freethought movement, but we are not able; we are both as poor as a church mouse. But we are like a bad dollar, always on hand about the time for renewing our subscription. Were it not for THE TRUTH SEEKER we should starve to death on dry prayers, for we hav plenty of them. Nothing more, but, Remaining yours truly, { D. G. MELEAR, A. E. CHAMBLESS.

ST. JOHNSBURY, Dec. 24, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $13 75, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to the inclosed names. And for the balance of money send me "Crimes of Preachers;" and also a few of "False Claims," and "Fall and Redemption," by Charles Watts. I believe this completes the list for this time. I shall try and get more subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER by and by. This is a hard town for Infidels, but I find, once in a while, one sticking out of the mud; I giv him a yank on to solid ground and he soon stands alone. Then he begins to wonder how he happened to stick there so long. THE TRUTH SEEKER will do it every time if I can get them to read it. We hav thirteen churches in this town; nine in the village; one to three hundred and twenty-five people. So you can see that it is up hill here.

Truly yours, JOHN BELKNAP.

HARWICH, Dec. 24, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Our TRUTH SEEKER still holds its own and still meets the demand of the age; indeed, it is indispensable. How any Freethinker can do without such a valuable paper, I am at a loss to know. I know of many rich Freethinkers in Harwich who cannot be prevailed on to subscribe, and yet will spend money for luxuries with a free hand. I know, too, of Christians here who are self-sacrificing for their religion, and spare no pains to sustain it as though their eternal all depended upon their every exertion in the maintenance. I hav often thought that if Freethinkers were as earnest as are the Christians, or were as liberal with their money as they are in their ideas, we might soon rid the country of the great scourge called Christianity and turn the churches into halls of useful knowledge.

I am just now disappointed in one upon whom I confidently relied to subscribe, but who refuses for some reason or other; but I am not without hopes that I shall succeed yet. I spoke of him in my last.

Please find within $3, for which continue THE TRUTH SEEKER; and send me the "Age of Reason." I had the book, but somebody has taken it away and, I presume, destroyed it. They havn't entirely forgotten the fashion of burning books, and would be glad to burn bodies, but the power to do it has slipped from their fingers and so now a resort must be had to alleged obscenity in order to secure victims. A little more leavening by science and good sense, and that miserable subterfuge will also cease to avail them. B. F. ROBBINS.

MT. FOREST, CAN., Dec. 28, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2.50, being the amount of subscription required to pay my fare to depot, May, 1885.

As the Hibernian said, "I think I am taking an unfair advantage of you," but, if I do not mistake your notice to subscribers that those who pay before the 1st of Jan., 1884, in advance, may hav those terms, you will see that my passage is paid up to May next, so this will extend it to one year after that time—that is, if this letter reaches you before the first, which I think it will—though I hav delayed past the eleventh hour, and near to the fifty-ninth minute past twenty-three o'clock, railroad time.

Now, if this arrives in time, accept the compliments of the season, with my best wishes for the good old TRUTH SEEKER, which I would not like to be without, as you will see by the few lines inclosed.

Yours truly, WM. LEWIS.

ALTOONA, PA., Dec. 27, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $4, for two steel lithographs of Bennett and Paine, for our Liberal League room, the balance to be sent in tracts, for gratuitous distribution, the majority cheap leaflets.

We hav opened a League room, the furnishing of which has cost us $200, a pretty heavy expense on the few of the faithful. We propose to open our room as a public reading and lecture room as soon as we are able to do so. We first want to start a library of standard Freethought and scientific books, also allowing Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans to put theirs on file, and having also all the Liberal press. But as yet we must begin small. Our room is sixteen by sixty feet, right in the center of the city, and over the R. R Men's Christian Association. Mr. Lewis Plack is our president. Our League organized last June.

I hav the papers and tracts you sent, and am distributing them.

Wishing you success, I am, very respectfully,

JOHN R. KEMP.

PEKIN, ILL., Jan. 3, 1884

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $7.75 to renew my subscription, and for a year's subscription for a new subscriber. Also in payment of "History of Christianity," by Edward Gibbon; one dozen "False Claims," by John E. Remsburg, for distribution, as I make it a point to send every copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to some one whom I think would read it. It only costs a cent to do that. Liberal lectures are too expensiv for two or three to pay for. So we must try and do the next best thing, buy and distribute papers, tracts, and books.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to me. I hav read articles on the philosophy of Spiritualism ever since the days of Judge Edmondson, as published in the New York Tribune, and read much of other's experience, but hav no knowledge or experience of my own in support of its truth, and would now rather receive some demonstration than more theory and experience.

Hoping a prosperous and happy New Year to THE TRUTH SEEKER, W. H. PEARCE.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Dec. 25, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Once more I send you an order for $5 to renew my subscription for my favorit paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to pay for other reading matter to enlighten my own and others' minds in this bigoted place of ours, although, in my humble opinion, there has been a great change for the better within the past twenty years; and there is still plenty of room for improvement.

I am much pleased that THE TRUTH SEEKER has fallen into such good hands as yours, and hope you will, as you hav in the past, treat all alike, whatever they call themselvs. Giv everyone a show to prove what he thinks is right. As for myself, my humble opinion is that right is only a matter of opinion, after considering everything concerning the same.

I am sorry my present circumstances will not allow me to giv more toward the monument to our lamented friend, D. M. Bennett, but such is fate, you know. I would like very much to see a hall built, and think it would be much more appropriate, lasting, and beneficial to the cause of truth and mental liberty.

Yours, for more of that universal knowledge best adapted to the present age and time, and the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER and all connected therewith, J. J.

CALMER, IOWA, Dec. 14, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office order for $3 50—$2 50 for my next year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $1 for the Monument Fund.

I was in hopes some able writer would reply to Thomas Winter's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 1st. How does Mr. Winter know that all other religionists and Spiritualists are a deluded set? I will venture to assert that there are just as intelligent people outside of Materialistic belief as anywhere to be found—even Thomas Winter himself. Believing a thing don't make it so. If it did the Bible would surely be an inspired book, as there are thousands who believe it to be so.

He says good, sound sense must convince everybody. I say not. I claim that in order to hav men believe a thing, there must be some evidence beside mere assertion. I hav read Mr. Winter's articles for a long time, and this last one is the most uncharitable in the list. I claim the right to think for myself in politics and in religion, and I accord the same right to others; and I desire better evidence than mere assertion to convince me that Materialism is any better or safer than the old orthodox religion.

Mr. Thomas Winter, Materialist, the next time you write another article accusing all that differ with you of being "deluded and deceived," please tell us how you know. Very respectfully, M. HINES.

ALMOND, Dec. 24, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3.75—$2.50 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the year 284 for myself, $1 to pay for two trial subscriptions, and 25 cents for a copy of "Crimes of Preachers." I want it to show to my clerical friends, that they may see what a purifying influence Christianity has on the clergy.

I hope to put in some work to aid THE TRUTH SEEKER the coming year. I wish I could send fifty subscribers instead of two from this town. They are going to come, however; take my word for it. The fields are ripe for the harvest, and if every friend of Freethought will do his best to circulate papers, books, and tracts among the people, his efforts, in conjunction with the labors of our brilliant corps of lecturers in the field, will giv the cause of Freethought such an impetus in 284 that we ourselvs will be surprised at the result.

The record of the last year has been a grand one for Liberalism in this country, and such as to encourage every Liberal who has any heart in the cause. Friends, let us put in a good amount of work the coming year. Success awaits us—nothing more sure.

I want, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, to wish all my Liberal friends, and especially those connected with the publication of the paper, a happy New Year. I will not say anything about Christmas, as that is a fraud, you know. But still I want everybody happy, and hope they will get their stockings full, and sing the good old song—which the angels didn't sing—of peace and good will. Fraternally yours,

O. D. WALLACE.

CEDAR SPRINGS, MICH., Dec. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to be heard once more on the subject of prohibition. I think I hav a right to speak on this great and important subject, as I am one of six sons, none of which has formed the habit of smoking, chewing, or drinking. I hav never dealt in the so-called luxuries. This will surely giv me a passport to honesty of purpose.

I see in your issue of Dec. 1st an article from A. W. Shuck, M. D., which strikes me as being very much out of place. I will not attempt to criticise his letter. It would take too much time and space. I would like to ask these Prohibitionists how they propose to prohibit the use or sale of liquor. Will they cuggle them to the bar, as some of our pioneer farmers used to do their cattle from the straw stack? It is well known fact to farmers that if their stock don't seem to relish the poor feed, they may, by cutting a gad and using it freely on the cattle in driving them away two or three times, cause them to return with renewed appetites. Man is animal in his nature. I say, giv us your ideas of how you propose to prohibit the evil of intemperance, or to prohibit it entirely if you please. If you hav any plan, please state it.

The people hav been fooled too often with high-sounding names. We had an act to strengthen the public credit. This act was passed in 1866. In 1873 the people had no credit throughout the land. But the act was meant to enhance the value of money and depreciate the value of property. We saw the result, bankruptcy, all over the land. To these fanatical Prohibitionists I would say, Giv more heed to the land question, the money monopoly, and let the good Christians purify the blood of the savior.

Usury is the thief that steals the poor man's earnings. I would be heartily glad if all Liberals would cease to see man's inhumanity to man in regard to usury. I am furnishing a Methodist minister with the Irish World and TRUTH SEEKER. He is inclined to be Liberal. He givs more lectures than sermons. It is only a matter of time. His nine children must be fed, and he has nothing left but the pulpit to support them.

No less than three beggars called one day to get money to pay what they owed their ministers. My wife told the ladies that the Lord would feed his lambs if they would only trust in the Lord. With kind regards to all the noble patrons of our paper and especially the noble crew that stand at her helm I remain in the faith, A. S. CROXTON.

GRESHAM, ILL., Dec. 12, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read a few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER which a friend furnished me, and I like it. I believe I am an Infidel, but did not know it till since reading your paper. It does me good to tell men that I am reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that I am an Infidel, as people all know me, and know that I hav been a Methodist for a long time. I am a justice of the peace and a school teacher, and hav been for about seven years. Will write more at some future time. R. E. MANSELL.

LOWELL, NEB., Jan. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I sent you a remittance of $5 a few days ago, to renew the subscription of J. F. Bloodgood and myself. I intended to inform the readers of your paper that there is a good opening in this place for a good family doctor. I shall be pleased to giv any information to anyone that you may know or recommend. No saint, no bigot, no drunkard, no tea-totaller wanted. CHICHESTER SPIRE.

PATCH GROVE, Wis., Dec. 13, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find postal order for renewal of the subscriptions of James Hicklin and Henry F. Young.

The brave paper has become a household necessary in both our families, and we do not like to hav a number delayed. Miss Wixon's corner for the children is just the thing. We Liberals are slow to see the need of Freethought literature for our children, so I welcome any provision for the mental growth of our future Liberals. MRS. DELIA W. YOUNG.

CLEVELAND, Jan. 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday the Cleveland Liberal League elected officers for the ensuing year. Mr. C. C. Gibson was re-elected president, Mr. J. D. Malloney was elected vice-president, Mr. Joseph Gillson was re-elected treasurer, and W. I. Irving re-elected secretary. The League has been organized only about three months, but has made fair progress. We now propose to hold a banquet in memory of the 147th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, of which I think we hav every assurance of success. We hav had some of the bright stars of Liberalism address us, and hav made arrangements for others. I should very much like to hav the League Congress meet in Cleveland. It is centrally located, and its hotels, halls, and opera houses are commodious and convenient. It is easily accessible from all parts of the country by rail and water. Everything being considered, I think no more preferable place could be suggested. Yours fraternally, W. I. IRVING.

LONGMONT, COL., Dec. 11, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1883-4. I wish to express my gratitude for your kindness in sending me the paper for the past year. Of course had you stopped it when my subscription expired I should hav done without some actual necessity rather than do without your valuable paper. I could not estimate the amount of pleasure and profit it has been to my family. I commenced taking it four years ago for my aged father (who is still with me). He was eighty-five years old last June. His eyesight remains good, and he can read for hours at a time. He reads and re-reads your paper a dozen times over, quarrels with the writers, and thinks such gifted minds as write for THE TRUTH SEEKER should exercise more charity for those that differ from them in opinion as regards the future, the unknowable. The letter of friend Isaac Paden gave him much pleasure. After reading it he remarked, "How I wish I could write. But my hand shakes so that they could never read it." But if he could, it would only be another added to the list to pick to pieces your many able writers. We liv in what can be termed an orthodox community; not that there are no Liberals here, but policy keeps them from expressing their honest opinions. When I solicit my friends to subscribe for your paper they reply, "Oh, I think the writers go too rough for the Bible." At the same time they hav not a particle of reverence for the book. Notwithstanding my abilities are limited, I shall always do all in my power for the cause of Liberalism. I mean to be a life subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I inclose 25 cents for the "Truth Seeker Annual."

MRS. GEORGEANNA RICE.

HOOPER, UTAH, Dec. 18, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please forward me the "Truth Seeker Annual," also the "Agnostic Annual," London, Cattell & Co.?

In my opinion, these two 25-cent works should be in the hands of every Freethinker in the land who loves humanity, equality, truth, justice, and universal liberty to all. These annuals of course will contain reliable statistics of the party known as the scientific progressionists, or, as we love to be called, Infidels, or Freethinkers. With these two annuals, every lover of liberty will be able to stop the mighty torrent of falsehood that is being manufactured and launched all over the earth by the priestly servants of the horrid and diabolical superstition of the past and present. The right and proper way to crush out Christian intolerance and superstition from the enlightened mind is to furnish facts and figures demonstrating that the priesthood and theology are the real foes of humanity, and the greatest danger this republic has to fear is from them, for this class of knaves is behind every giant swindle and monopoly that is causing humanity to mourn all over the earth. Kingcraft, priestcraft, and thiefcraft is, and always has been, the trinity of theology. Down with the monster of the past, the vampire of the present! Will not some of the wealthy Liberals of the states furnish me with a few TRUTH SEEKER leaflets to sow the truth in this beautiful territory, although the most priest-ridden spot on the earth? If any man ever deserved a monument on this earth, it was D. M. Bennett. The small thing you are soon going to plant above the noble dead is but the mustard-seed which in the future will grow to a gigantic, beautiful tree. None can find fault for your noble efforts toward the grand, good, truthful, fearless Bennett. There are none who can object, save some miserable, miserly, metaphysical crank. A happy New Year to THE TRUTH SEEKER and all its friends. Inclosed find one dollar—fifty cents for the two annuals, and fifty cents toward Mr. Bennett's monument. I wish my mite was fifty dollars.

Yours truly, EDWARD F. MUNN, SR.

BUFFALO, WYO., Dec. 15, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Here we come, forty-four strong! Send along your tracts of your own selection. I presume I hav traveled over the ground covered by the missionary documents a dozen times, but I hav some friends with whom I liv who hav never heard the different phases of the Infidel doctrin preached straight from the shoulder. They are non-believers, however, else I could not bide with them in the peace and harmony that characterizes our home. The list of names inclosed are of skeptics in the main, and I trust you will gain some new subscribers through them. Will send other names from time to time. I went above the designated number, for in numbers there is strength. I will read the tracts, when they arrive, to members of my household, and then distribute them where I think they may bring forth fruit. I think your plan of sending out sample copies a good one, and the tracts may prove an entering wedge in some instances. I hav never been intimately associated for any length of time with a man since I've been an Infidel that I did not succeed in converting him, or leading him out of the dark into the light; but it is hard work sometimes, and not so good a way as to slip into their hands the silent pleader on paper.

Buffalo is a new and flourishing town, building up very rapidly. The newspaper (the Echo) urges the observance of the Sabbath and attendance at church and Sunday-school, and preparations are going for ward to establish a gospel-shop at an early date. Already one of the black-coated gentlemen is on hand for the winter, quartered on the good citizens who got on very well before he came, and built up a flourishing town without his assistance, conquered the rough element that infest all new frontier towns, and now the shepherd comes in to organize and fleece his flock. He will doubtless look closely after the ewe lambs of the fold, as is the custom of the parson. I hope in time to locate in the town to do business, and then I'll do what I can to counteract his teachings—perhaps organize a Liberal League. I've been in the harness now ten years, and though I'm not so enthusiastic in the cause as during the first year of my mental emancipation, I never lose a good opportunity to strike a blow where I think it will count. I am a sort of natural communist, and hav invariably found those with whom I shared the fruits of my labor ready to rob me when the slightest opportunity offered. Such a disposition on the part of others has rather dampened my ardor on that subject. I am a Greenbacker in principle, but am rather disheartened as to its chances to win. The God idea is easier removed than the gold idea. People hang tenaciously to the golden idol. They seem utterly unable to divest their minds of the idea that gold does not possess in itself all the attributes of a veritable money.

Mr. Wettstein defines my position much better on the mind and matter question than I could do it myself. He is a trump, and I follow suit, not because he or anybody else says so, but because I can't do otherwise by the lights set before me. I can't do otherwise than regard Spiritism as a worse form of superstition than that of orthodox Christians. I hav read all their fine-spun theories, and listened respectfully to those who claim to be in daily communication with spirits, yet all they offer appears very absurd to me, when jugglers and sleight-of-hand performers do all and more than the Spiritualists do, and make no claim upon the supernatural. I am loth to believe in what appears to be so unnatural. Scarcely any two Spiritualists entertain the same theory of the manifestations which hav led them to believe in a future state of existence. One by one their great mediums hav proven to be humbugs and frauds. We are told by one that an unlettered boy, or servant, woman, or girl, receives and delivers messages in a tongue or language to which they are utter strangers. Another excuses the bad grammar of a medium on the ground that the medium is unable to deliver the messages of the departed except in their own simple style. Messages are received from Christ and his apostles, notwithstanding Antichrist and hundreds of his disciples place Jesus of Nazareth in the same category with William Tell. As for myself, I regard Christ as an allegorical character. I don't think he ever had an actual existence. Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Humboldt, Voltaire, and hundreds of other great minds whom Spiritualists claim hav communicated through their mediums don't seem to be as progressiv as when on earth. Can it be possible that these great men hav ceased to explore the regions of science, and are leisurely basking in the balmy breezes and the soft rays of the sun of the summer-land, content to let truth seekers such as Wakeman, Putnam, Seaver, Andrews, Mrs. Slenker, Susan Wixon, Mr. Tucker, and thousands of others grope their way in the dark. Why, our old hero, D. M. Bennett, if there be another and higher life, has been in the summer-land long enough to communicate to his thousands of warm friends through THE TRUTH SEEKER. He was never known to neglect us so long before; even behind the prison bars his brain and pen were never idle. From the remotest corner of the globe he wafted us long and interesting letters and kindly greeting. Why don't he enlighten us now on the many vexed questions the pros and cons of which hav been discussed in his beloved TRUTH SEEKER for years. Why are Spiritualists so touchy when we propound such questions as the foregoing. Why, it is nine chances to one that they will call us a fool for propounding them. I do not go so far as some Materialists and say that I hav no desire to liv forever. If Mother Nature so arranges prolonged existence, "Barkis is willin' " to tackle it. I am not going to picture an eternal existence as monotonous, and hav no fear of stagnation from ennui. No, if there is such a life, it will be perfectly natural, and doubtless varied enough. Brother Eugene and Sister Elmina are a little precipitate when they draw on their imagination for the kind of life a life eternal would be. We'll climb that mountain when we get to it. In fact, we hav got as many obstacles to surmount in the present life as we can well attend to. Free lands, free money, free thought, a free press, and a thousand other things are to be done, and the laborers are few.

This last hit at two of my favorit believers in Nirvana ought to prove a sufficient offset againt what I hav ventured to say about our Spiritualistic friends, but I'll wager my chances of a future state of everlasting bliss that the latter get riled up and say something naughty about me, while Eugene and Elmina will only smile and set their brains to work to extricate themselvs from the awkward situation in which they place themselvs in their zeal for the one and only one world theory. J. ALLEN EVANS.

SPRING FORGE, PA., Dec. 22, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for books and tracts. These tracts are to be a poor Infidel's Christmas gifts to some of his wealthier Lutheran and Reformed acquaintances. Here where I liv seems to be the focus of bigotry and sectarianism. Though there are but two churches in the town itself, which are well frequented every Sunday—one Lutheran, the other Reformed—there exists quite a number of "meeting-houses" of the different sects of Protestantism in this neighborhood, where revivals and prayer-meetings are held, where the gospel is preached, where the poor, miserable sinners make a noise unto the Lord. It is indeed oftentimes most undoubtedly a noise, or, rather, a nuisance, to obtain forgivness for their transgressions, where man, women, and children lie for hours on their knees in thoughtlessness, sobbing and listening to the outbursts of some farmer-theologian, or some converted member, who tells them in one breath that he knows that he is saved and redeemed, and still is a miserable sinner, not worthy of all that mercy and goodness that heaven bestowed upon him. Then again they make a noise unto the Lord singing, or, rather, shouting, some of those horrible Moody and Sankey hymns, which resemble more the drinking songs and battle-cries of soldiers than chorals and psalms of an emotional assembly! Sunday-school, church, prayer-meeting, eat, drink, work, sleep—this is the life, the entire import of the concept life as led by these Christian country folks. I hav often sat, together with some of the older people, who are all of German descent, and yet speak a corrupt German, and tried to giv them some more Liberal views, and there I found such an ignorance and stupidity combined with such horrid superstition that immediately I ceased to throw pearls before the swine, and waste words and time. The majority of the older people do not know enough of either language to read anything besides Bible, prayer-book, and, perhaps, newspapers; all other things they shun as diabolic and antichristian invention. Where is our civilization? This government sends out missionaries to convert the heathen, while there are millions worse than heathen in our midst! Alas! and the Christian rabble ventures to condemn antiquity and paganism, but the poor ones are misled, stupefied, hav sacrificed their reason to obtain a policy for an imaginary life beyond the grave, where they are to be rewarded by an imaginary being. A Short Sermon.

Children who read my lay,
This much I hav to say:
Each day and every day
Do what is right;
Right things in great and small;
Then, though the sky should fall,
Sun, moon, and stars, and all,
You shall hav light.

This further I would say:
Be you tempted though you may,
Each day and every day,
Speak what is true—
True things in great and small;
Then, though the sky should fall,
Sun, moon, and stars, and all,
Heaven would show through.

Figs, as you see and know,
Do not from thistles grow;
And though the blossoms blow
White on the tree,
Grapes never, never yet
On the limbs of thorns were set,
So, if you good would get,
Good you must be.

Life's journey through and through,
Speak what is just and true,
Doing what's right to do
Unto one and all,
When you work and when you play,
Each day and every day;
Then peace shall gild your way,
Though the sky should fall.

Earth's True Kings and Queens.

A DIALOG FOR THREE CHARACTERS.

Emma.—Mary, dear, we read a good deal about Queen Victoria, and she seems to be quite a celebrated character. Who is she, anyway?

Mary.—Victoria? Why, she is the queen of Great Britain, Canada, and all the British possessions, and it is all a very large country, too, over which she rules, I can tell you. There's Scotland and Ireland, and lots of islands in the British seas, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Wight; then the rock of Gibraltar, of which I hav a little fragment that my father brought from there, one time. Then, there's some parts of Asia she has rule over too, and even Africa. And in America, besides Canada, there are islands that belong to the throne, and besides, her sway extends away to Australia, all those places you study about in your geography.

She reigns over a country upon which the sun never sets, they say.

Emma.—Why, she must be ever and ever so rich!

Mary.—Well, she is.

Emma.—Say, can queens hav everything they want, and go and come just when they please?

Mary.—Why, yes; I suppose they can hav everything that gold can purchase, but, there are some things that gold cannot buy, nor jewels bright can bring. Ordinarily, I suppose they can go and come as they choose; but then, there is Parliament, and court-parties, and one thing and another that has to be attended to.

Emma.—You said there were some things that gold and jewels could not buy, and, to be frank, I don't believe that.

Mary.—Well, it is true, however.

Emma.—I wish you'd name something that gold can't buy, if you can.

Mary.—I can. There is a pure, unsullied conscience; gold cannot buy that. It can't buy a pure, unselfish devotion, nor a heart of true love and tenderness.

Emma.—Oh pooh! that is preaching. I wish I was a queen. Oh, wouldn't I prance around like a spread eagle! (She walks proudly round the room.) Wouldn't I dress in royal purple velvet—silk velvet, mind you; none of your cheap velveteen—and oh, such silks and satins as I'd wear, every day too! And such diamonds! O Lordy! Lordy! It just makes my head dizzy to think of it! I'd hav my gowns made with long trains, and all trimmed with gold bands, and on my head I'd wear a golden crown, you know, all stuck full of jewels. My! but wouldn't it be gay?

Mary.—I guess your head would ache some. I hav read somewhere that "uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

Emma.—I don't believe a word of it. It wouldn't be any more uneasy to wear a crown than it is to hav your hair all braided, and twisted up with hair crimpers, so now! I'd hav such a good time traveling, and seeing the sights of the world, and when at home I'd sit by my castle window, and bow to my lords and ladies as they passed. (Aside.) Oh, wouldn't I queen it over that haughty, naughty, saucy Addie Jernegan, the spiteful, hateful, good-for-nothing creature! (tossing her head).

[Enter Albert.]

Albert.—What's that you said? You'd like to be a queen? Well, I would like tip-top to be a king! I'd hav a pony then—a dozen if I chose—and a pocket full of money all the time! I'd hav balls, tops, and kites, and marbles without number, and all made of solid gold! I'd hav a sword and gun, and a candy store at my right hand—yes, I would, Billy Jones called me a liar to-day, and I made his nose bleed for it, but had I been a king, I would hav waved my hand (waving his hand) thus, and to my warriors said, "Off with his head!"

Emma.—A pretty king you'd be, with your turned up nose, squinting eyes, and lollopy ears!

Albert.—I'd be as pretty a king as you would be a queen, I guess—such a freckled face as you hav! Yes, I should be as good a king as you would be a queen, any day.

Emma.—You wouldn't.

Albert.—I would.

Emma.—You just hold your tongue!

Albert.—Hold your own tongue!

Emma.—You're a horrid thing—a saucy, impudent, good-for-nothing little monkey—there!

Albert.—You're another!

Emma.—You'll never be a king!

Albert.—You'll never be a queen!

Mary (approaching and laying a hand on the shoulder of each).—"He that ruleth his spirit is better than he who taketh a city." You, Albert, may be a king, and you, dear Emma, may be a most lovely and powerful queen.

Albert and Emma both together speaking.—"How?" "How?"

Mary.—In men and women, in boys and girls, there is always a right and wrong side, a good and an evil disposition, holy and unholy desires, wishes, and tendencies. Those who bury deep their evil natures, who ever hearken to and heed the voice of the inward monitor, who strive to let the right come uppermost, who do not quarrel and slander their neighbors, who are not covetous, who try to conquer their bad passions, who can say, "I am by my self obeyed," all such, whether dwelling in marble halls, or in some poor and lowly cottage, whether walking in lofty courts or digging with pick and spade, are earth's true kings and queens! And thus may you—may each and all—be kings and queens, and reign supreme over the empire of their own being. Strive, then, to be ever just, generous, and true, and you, Albert, may thus be a most royal king, and you, Emma, a very noble and attractiv queen. But I do not like the title king and queen, very well.

Albert.—"Why, what would you substitute for it that would better?"

Mary.—Well, I think man and woman, in the best sense of those words, much better than the silly title, king and queen. A good and useful man, a good and useful woman, I like far better, and if, as a boy, Albert, you are useful and good, of course it follows that you will be the same as a man, doesn't it?

Albert.—Of course.

Mary.—Then you'd better make that your aim in life, hadn't you? And you, Emma, do not get silly notions in your head about queens and fine dresses, but try to be a smart, intelligent, and industrious girl, and you will then grow into a woman far superior to that which you picture as a queen. Don't you believe it?

Emma.—"Yes; I suppose what you say is true."

Mary.—Then strive always to

"Be a woman—brighest model
Of that high and perfect beauty,
When the mind, and soul, and body,
Blend to work out life's great duty—
Be a woman—naught is higher
On the gilded list of fame;
On the catalog of virtue
There's no higher, holier name.

"Be a woman—on to duty!
Raise the world from all that's low,
Place high in the social heaven
Virtue's fair and radiant bow!
Lend your influence to effort
That shall raise our natural human;
Be not fashion's gilded body,
Be a brave, whole-souled, true woman.

Poetry.

A Pugilistic Theologian.

If a home or foreign duffer wants to find a fisticuffer
Who will make his sinews suffer, and his backers bring to book,
He should never treat too lightly any challenge from the slightly
Reverend person known to theosophic circles as Joe Cook.

Boston's own John Lawrence Sullivan can't earn his title fully
As the champion Yankee bully, quite beyond a shade of doubt,
Till he tries his pugilistic art upon the Calvinistic
Teacher who aspires to be the greatest living knocker out.

Once he crossed the broad Atlantic to destroy the hierophantic
Olcott and the psychomantic priestess of the mystic rites,
And he tells us that he plugged them, tapped them, hammered them, and slugged them,
Coming off unquestioned victor from a dozen desperate fights.

Now he wants the world to know his own opinion of his prowess,
And delights to tell us how his muscles can be made to act.
He can touzle any drummer, any stalwart tramp or bummer—
Yes, can easily knock out a half a dozen such, in fact.

He should favor us with starring exhibitions of his sparring,
And should teach the art of marring human features in a show;
For, if cheek can giv assurance of unlimited endurance,
Not a fighting man can stand against the slightly Reverend Joe.

The Schoolmarm's Story.

A frosty chill was in the air—
How plainly I remember—
The bright autumnal fires had paled,
Save here and there an ember;
The sky looked hard, the hills were bare,
And there were tokens everywhere
That it had come—November.

I locked the time-worn schoolhouse door,
The village seat of learning,
Across the smooth, well-trodden path
My homeward footsteps turning;
My heart a troubled question bore,
And in my mind, as oft before,
A vexing thought was burning.

"Why is it up-hill all the way?"
Thus ran my meditations;
The lessons had gone wrong that day,
And I had lost my patience.
"Is there no way to soften care,
And make is easier to bear
Life's sorrows and vexations?"

Across my pathway, through the wood,
A fallen tree was lying;
On this there sat two little girls,
And one of them was crying.
I heard her sob: "And if I could,
I'd get my lessons awful good,
But what's the use of trying?"

And then the little hooded head
Sank on the other's shoulder,
The little weeper sought the arms
That opened to enfold her.
Against the young heart, kind and true,
She nestled close, and neither knew
That I was a beholder.

And then I heard—ah, ne'er was known
Such judgment without malice,
Nor queenlier council ever heard
In senate house or palace!
"I should hav failed there, I am sure.
Don't be discouraged; try once more,
And I will help you, Alice."

"And I will help you." This is how
To soften care and grieving;
Life is made easier to bear
By helping and by giving.
Here was the answer I had sought,
And I, the teacher, being taught
The secret of true living.

If "I will help you" were the rule,
How changed beyond all measure
Life would become. Each heavy load
Would be a golden treasure;
Pain and vexation be forgot;
Hope would prevail in every lot,
And life be only pleasure.

—Treasure Trove.

Am I a Scot, or am I Not?

If I should bring a wagon o'er
From Scotland to Columbia's shore,
And by successiv wear and tear
The wagon soon should need repair:
Thus, when the tires are worn through,
Columbia's iron doth renew;
Likewise the fellies, hubs, and spokes
Should be replaced by Western oaks;
In course of time down goes the bed,
But here's one like it in its stead.
So, bit by bit, in seven years,
All things are changed in bed and gears,
And still it seems as though it ought
To be the one from Scotland brought;
But when I think the matter o'er,
It ne'er was on a foreign shore,
And all that came across the sea
Is only its identity.

I came, a Scotchman, understand,
By choice, to liv, in this free land,
Wherein I've dwelt from day to day,
Till sixteen years hav passed away.
If physiology be true,
My body has been changing too;
And though at first it did seem strange,
Yet Science doth confirm the change;
And since I hav the truth been taught,
I wonder if I'm now a Scot,
Since all that came across the sea
Is only my identity.—Scientific American.

The True Preparation.

Thou must be true to thyself,
If thou the truth wouldst teach;
Thy soul must overflow,
If thou another soul wouldst reach;
It needs the overflow of heart
To giv the lips full speech.

Think truly, and thy thoughts
Shall the world's famin feed;
Speak truly, and each word of thine
Shall be a fruitful seed;
Liv truly, and thy life shall be
A great and noble creed.

Don't Stop My Paper.

With a thousand subscribers like the writer of the following simple but earnest verses, how happy would be the life of the wearied, toilsome, and impecunious printer! How cheerfully would he write, and how much more interesting, instructiv, and entertainlng would he make his paper! But out of a thousand how few act in accordance with the sentiments expressed in the last stanza!

Don't stop my paper, printer,
Don't strike my name off yet;
You know the times are stringent,
And money hard to get;
But tug a little harder
Is what I mean to do,
And scrape the dimes together,
Enough for me and you.

I can't afford to drop it;
I find it doesn't pay
To do without a newspaper,
However others may.
I hate to ask my neighbors
To giv me theirs on loan,
They don't just say, but mean it—
Why don't you hav your own?

You can't tell how we'd miss it,
If it by any fate
Should happen not to reach us,
Or come a little late;
Then all is in a hubbub,
And things go all awry,
And, printer, if you're married,
You know the reason why.

I cannot do without it,
It is no use to try,
For other people take it,
And, printer, so must I.
I, too, must keep me posted,
And know what's going on,
Or feel and be accounted
A fogy simpleton.

Then take it kindly, printer,
If pay be somewhat slow,
For cash is not so plenty,
And wants not few, you know.
But I must hav my paper,
Cost what it may to me,
I'd rather dock my sugar
Than do without my tea.

So, printer, don't you stop it,
Unless you want my frown,
For here's the year's subscription,
And credit it right down;
And send the paper promptly
And regularly on,
And let it bring us weekly
Its welcomed benison.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud o suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances nder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

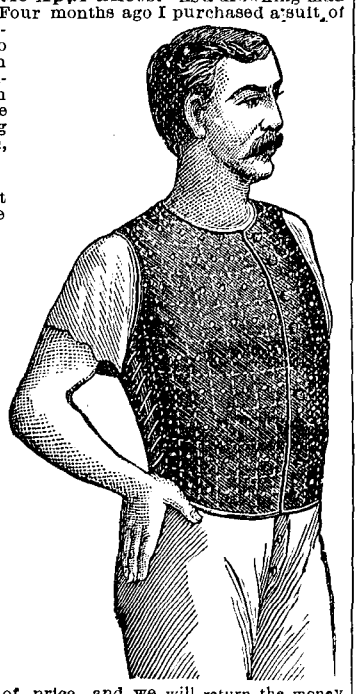
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Gems of Thought.

PRIESTS hav been leading men astray for thousands of years; they hav set up their own inventions in place of reality; they represent the universe as a thing made a little while ago from nothing; they teach that the gods made it in a few days, and for pastime; they cry Nature down and speak lightly of her, as though she were something to be despised and hated; they set their gods above her as being wiser, truer, better; but at the same time they claim that their gods cannot be understood and comprehended only as they themselvs go between and vouchsafe to make known the same. Truly this class of men are enemies to the world, because they teach falsehood instead of truth, darkness instead of light, supernaturalism instead of naturalism.—D. M. Bennett.

THE soul immortal! Why then doth the mind
Complain of death? Why not rejoice to find Herself let loose, and leave this clay behind,
As snakes, whene'er the circling year returns,
Rejoice to cast their skins, or deer their horns?
—Lucretius.

LET anyone but look back upon his past career—look inward on his daily life—and then say what effect would be produced upon him, were the conviction once fixedly imbedded in his soul that everything done is done irrevocably—that even the omnipotence of God cannot uncommit a deed—cannot make that undone which has been done; that every act must bear its allotted fruit according to the everlasting laws—must remain forever ineffaceably inscribed on the tablets of universal nature. And then let him consider what would hav been the result upon the moral condition of our race, had all men ever held this conviction.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

THERE is a want too much lost sight of in our estimate of the privations of the humbler classes, though it is one of the most incessantly craving of all our wants, and is actually the impelling power which, in the vast majority of cases, urges men into vices and crime. It is the want of amusement. It is in vain to declaim against it. Equally with any other principle of our nature, it calls for its natural indulgence, and cannot be permanently debarred from it, without souring the temper and spoiling the character. Like the indulgence of all other appetites, it only requires to be kept within due bounds, and turned upon innocent and beneficial objects, to become a spring of happiness; but qualified to a certain extent it must be, in the case of every man, if we desire him to be either a useful, activ, or contented member of society.—Sir John Herschel.

RASHNESS would be very remarkable when anything unknown or false was approved of; and nothing could be more discreditable than for a man's assent and approbation to precede his knowledge and perception of a fact.—Cicero's Academic Questions.

THE war against amusements that is carried on by narrow-minded and ignorant persons is a hopeless war. Man is so constituted that he will hav them. The religion that wars against this natural craving must go to the wall. Why should not men learn to discriminate between the uses and abuses of things? A little common sense in this matter would, as it seems to us, lead to a harmonious verdict in regard to amusements.—Dramatic Chronicle.

M. A. ANTONINUS compares the wise and humane soul to a spring of pure and sweet water, which, though the passer-by may curse it, continues to offer him a draught to assuage his thirst; and, even if he cast into it mire and filth, hastens to reject it and flows on pure and undisturbed. This recalls the equally beautiful image in the oriental scripture of the sandal-tree, which in the moment when it falls before the woodman's stroke, gives its fragrance to the axe which smites it.—Samuel Longfellow.

THE parts and signs of goodness are many. If a man be gracious and courteous to strangers, it shows he is a citizen of the world, and that his heart is no island cut off from other lands, but a continent that joins to them; if he be compassionate toward the afflictions of others, it shows that his heart is like the noble tree that is wounded itself when it gives the balm; if he easily pardons and remits offenses, it shows that his mind is planted above injuries, so that he cannot be shot; if he be thankful for small benefits, it shows that he weighs men's minds and not their trash; but, above all, if he hav St. Paul's perfection, that he could wish to be an anathema from Christ for the salvation of his brethren, it shows much of a divine nature and a kind of conformity with Christ himself.—Bacon's Essays.

IT is the mind that makes the body rich;
And as the sun breaks through the darkest clouds,
So honor 'peareth in the meanest habit.
What! is the jay more precious than the lark
Because his feathers are more beautiful?
Or is the adder better than the eel
Because his painted skin contents the eye?
O, no, good Kate; neither art thou the worse
For this poor furniture and mean array.
—Shakspere's Taming of the Shrew.

"THE judgment of heaven was upon them, sir," said a Tory bishop, speaking of the Regicides to Quin, the famous actor. "The judgment of heaven was upon them—almost all of them came to violent ends!" "So, my lord," replied Quin, "did almost all the apostles."—Dr. Goldwin Smith.

NOTHING is more characteristic of our age than the vast range of inquiry which is opening more and more to the multitude of men. Thought frees the old bounds to which men used to confine themselvs. It holds nothing too sacred for investigation. It calls the past to account, and treats hoary opinions as if they were of yesterday's growth. No reverence drives it back. No great name terrifies it. The foundations of what seems most settled must be explored. Undoubtedly this is a perilous tendency. Men forget the limits of their powers. They question the infinit, the unsearchable with an audacious self-reliance. They shock pious and reverend minds, and rush into an extravagance of doubt, more unphilosophical and foolish than the weakest credulity. Still, in this dangerous wildness, we see what I am stating, the tendency to expansion in the movements of thought.—Dr. Channing's Present Age.

Odds and Ends.

THE Japanese hav taken to using patent medicins. The Japanese must go.

STANLEY has discovered a river in Central Africa called Kissmelonga. It cannot be very far from Lake Nyum-nyum.

WHY isn't a turkey like a girl? Because a dressed girl will walk about and a dressed turkey won't. And vice versa the other way.

WHEN the types are made to say that an honest man is the nobbiest work of God it is time to throw glass bombs into the composing-room.

IT is sometimes charged that newspaper men indulge too much in strong drink. This is wrong. I is an excess of reading. Bacon says, "Reading maketh a full man."

THE director of a matrimonial agency in Paris says the young girls ask only, "Who is he?" the young widows, "What is his position?" the old widows, "Where is he?"

HE blew into his gun to see
If loading up it needed;
The jury to a man agree
The gun blew after he did.

THERE is a difference between Christmas and the Fourth of July. Christmas comes but once a year, and when it comes it brings good cheer. The Fourth of July brings three cheers and a tiger.

THE New York Christian Witness publishe d the Ten Commandments the other week, and now Texas papers are reprinting them under the headline of "A New Heresy," and crediting them to the Witness.

A MEDICAL journal says, "Much of the distress and sickness attributed to dyspepsia is occasioned by humor in the stomach." This is believed to be an awful grind on the paragraphers who hav said funny things about the doctors.

"WHY is it," asks the Independent, "that when a a church is burnt nothing is so difficult to save as the organ!" The same authority on religious matters then answers the conundrum: "Because the fire engin cannot play upon it."

TOWARD the close of summer in New York state the minister passed one of his people cleaning corn. "Ah, Mr. Johnson," said he, "a fine dry day for corn." "Yes, parson; but death on the wheat." Next day it was raining, and the minister drove by. "Splendid day for wheat, Mr. Johnson." "Ah, yes," with a groan, "but damned rough on the corn."

A GOOD Methodist asked John Wesley what he thought as to the marrying a certain woman, well known to both. Wesley advised him not to think of it. "Why," said the other, "she is a member of your church, isn't she?" "Yes," was the reply. "And you think she is truly a Christian woman?" "Yes," said Wesley, "I believe she is." "Well, then, why not marry her?" "Because," replied Wesley, "because, my friend, the Lord can liv with a great many people you and I can't."

HERE entombed lies a church, choir, chancel, and steerle;
Congregation and pastor here wait for the dawn.
Ah, sad was the fate of these miserable people.
Engulfed in a worshiper's cavernous yawn.

Before any soul in the church could emerge, he Had swallowed them all—English, Irish, and German.
He could swallow the church, congregation, and clergy,
But, alas, he was choked by the minister's sermon.
—Henry Emerson in Life.

A FABLE.

One day an oyster set out to cross a neck of land to save himself a long swim around it, and as he journeyed along the dusty highway, content with the weather, the climate, and his surroundings, he suddenly heard a harsh voice crying out to him to halt. As he rolled into the shade of a pigweed, a peacock advanced with lordly strut and demanded:

"How now, sirrah? Where are you going, and what is your errand?"

"I'm simply crossing from water to water, and tired enough I am. I believe I hav been three good hours making half a mile."

"Three hours! Why, I could strut over the distance in three minutes! Ah, me, but you don't amount to much for size."

"No; a child could swallow me at a gulp."

"And you aren't the least bit pretty."

"That's true. My shell is coarse and full of ridges."

"And you can't sing?"

"Not a note."

"Nor fly?"

"Not a fly."

"Well, well, I really pity you. Now, then, if you want to see something gaudy, just gaze on me."

The bird strutted up and down, head up and tail spread out, and the oyster was compelled to say that it was a sight to do sore eyes good.

"While you creep I walk, strut, and fly."

"Yes."

"While you whisper I sing."

"Yes."

"While you tumble around in the mud and sand I reflect all the colors of the rainbow on the lawn."

"I must admit it," said the oyster.

"And while a pigweed shelters you, it takes a whole apple-tree to giv me shade. You see——"

And the oyster saw. An eagle had been looking for a breakfast. The humble oyster hidden away under the weed escaped his piercing glances, but the gorgeous peacock was instantly seen and spotted. There was a whirr, a scream, and the eagle had ascended with the vainglorious bird fast in his claws.

"Come to think it all over," said the oyster, as he squinted his larboard eye aloft, "it is about as well to be an oyster under a pigweed as a peacock in the claws of an eagle. I guess I'll move on."

Moral.—Those who were born to strut should not exult over those who were born to creep.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Boston Post says that "pitching pennies during the sermon is no longer considered au fait in the best churches in Chicago."

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE BLAINE is evidently making a high bid for the support of the Baptist church. He now declares that he is thoroughly immersed in literary work.

THE traveling shows are exhibiting three skeletons of Guiteau—his skeleton when he was a boy, his skeleton before he shot Garfield, and his skeleton after he had been hanged.

IT costs sometimes as much as $100,000 to buy up the members of a city council in the northern states. They come high, but the railroads and other monopolies must hav 'em.

HENRY BERGH is now vigorously striving to hav the sale of Shakspere's works suppressed, because one of the eminent dramatist's characters casually remarked: "Let the galled jade wince."

THE trustees of a Methodist church at Greenwich, N. Y., hav closed the door of the house of worship against all comers, pastor included. They offer as an excuse the fact that the church was run by worldly people.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD is now telling the people of the West that they are more intelligent, more civilized, and more prosperous than their brethren in the East. Mr. Arnold is very popular out there and is making money.

THE pope of Rome can afford to keep his cook and not curtail his household expenses for a while, at least. A rich lady, recently deceased in London, has given by her will to Pope Leo the rather comfortable sum of $2,500,000. With this nice little filling up of his cash box, the "holy father" could also afford to let up on the collection of "Peter's pence" from his devoted but starving subjects in Ireland.

THE reading-boys employed in a large printing firm in the city, reports the London Freethinker, hav to attend a morning school held for an hour before beginning work. On one morning in each week the boys are instructed in the bad old book by the chaplain. "Jenkins," said the chaplain, one morning, lately, "is there any man in this wide world whom Christ would be powerless to save?" "Oh, yes, sir—Mr. Bradlaugh."

PREACHING to a congregation of English workingmen recently, a bishop declared that "he did not believe that any man was ever directed by God to do a wicked thing." Upon which Dr. Aveling asks: "Now does he believe that God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son, Moses to slaughter the Midianites, Joshua to butcher his adversaries, Samuel to hew in pieces Agag, and Hosea to take a wife of whoredoms?—or were these things not wicked because commanded by the Jew-god Jahveh?"

CALIFORNIA newspapers, summing up the statistics of the Golden State's progress in the thirty-six years since Sutter electrified the world with his discovery, say that the state's agricultural product has risen until it has thrown the auriferous metal into the shade, being now about $100,000,000 a year. The fruit product alone almost equals that of the mines, and now that a court has decided against hydraulic mining, it may be prophesied that wine making and silk culture will ere long be more important industries than gold seeking.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY has declared that in his voyage around the world, and in all his studies of savage life, he found no people so miserable, wretched, and degraded as those who exist in the poorer quarters of London. The barbarians, who liv in a constant state of violence and depredation, and who are exposed to the worst rigors of climate and weather, hav more enjoyable and independent lives than these miserable workers and artisans, and he says that if he had to make his choice, he should unhesitatingly prefer the existence of the former.

SOME of our neighbors are inclined to lament over the prospect of a more complete separation of church and state. They should rejoice, rather. If ecclesiastical history records any clearly demonstrated experience, it is that religion is never more directly in the path to corruption than when it enters into alliance with political powers. There is not a single notable exception. Wherever the sword and purse of civil politics hav been called in to support ecclesiastical sanctions there true religion has begun to vacate her throne, and to giv place to venality, formalism, hypocrisy, and their countless retinue.—Home Journal.

IF the colored Baptist ministers of Louisville did not err in some of their averments the other day, there is a queer state of things in that city. "Veracity Among Ministers" being under discussion, G. W. Ward said that some of the Baptist ministers had become so corrupt that it was easier for them to lie than to tell the truth. They played lottery and wouldn't even pay their subscriptions for newspapers. Joe Preston thought that if the lay members gave to the church the money they spent for whisky and gambling their pastors would hav no cause for lying. Jackson Riley observed that the Baptist ministers in this city, as a class, were the biggest liars the devil ever produced. Q. B. Jones expressed his feelings in the sentence: "Untruthfulness among our Baptist preachers has broken my heart."

THE effects of too much religion are shown in the case of Henry Stephens, a well-to-do farmer of Bridgeville, O. He attended several revival meetings, with most disastrous results to himself and family. One night after reaching home he compelled a man who was boarding with him, and who had a lame leg, to get down on his knees and pray. The man got down on one knee, but could not bend the other, when Stephens became enraged and forced the poor fellow to bend his lame knee. The excited man then grabbed an old Bible and his fourteen-year-old child, and, mounting one of his fleetest horses, rode at breakneck speed for five miles through a terrible storm. When he returned he chased his wife around the house with a knife, and she was so greatly frightened that she became ill and died in a few hours. Stephens is calm at times and rational, but every hour or two he becomes a raving maniac.

ANOTHER cherished delusion is gone, says the Pall Mall Gazette. Every one has hitherto imagined that the Eskimo were diminutiv men, with enormous appetites, and most travelers hav brought back reports that they were not particularly truthful or hospitable. But all these notions hav been completely upset by Dr. John Rae's lecture at the London Institution. He distinctly denied that the bodies of the Eskimo were any smaller or their appetites any larger than those of other people; and as for their moral character, they really seem to possess many excellent and even episcopal virtues. Dr. Rae asserts, from the experience both of himself and others, that the Eskimo are much "given to hospitality." Then, too, with very rare exceptions, they are the "husbands of one wife," and, what is more remarkable, the men never beat the women and the women never beat the children. And, lastly, Dr. Rae declares them to be "most truthful relaters" as well as "accurate observers."

THE London Freethinker tells this story: Some time ago a Polish Jew in poor circumstances happened to be standing near the "Home for the Conversion of Jews," when he was accosted by a gentleman in the following words: "Do you wish to become converted to the Christian religion?" "Well," said the Jew, "if that is anything to eat, I will gladly become converted to it." The gentleman then said, "We keep you in our home, feed you and clothe you for three months on condition you study the Bible." To this the Jew assented, and entered the home. At the end of the appointed time he was asked if he believed in it, and made the following reply: "There are some things which I do believe, and there are some things which I do not believe; but if you will giv me three months more, perhaps I shall then believe those things which I do not now believe." The extension of time was granted him, and again he made the same reply. At the end of a year a special committee was appointed to inquire into his case. When one of the committeemen asked him to state what he did believe and what he did not, the Jew's reply was as follows: "I do believe Christ fed 5,000 with two loaves and a few fishes, but that the 5,000 were satisfied I do not believe. I believe Christ walked on the water, but that the water was not frozen I do not believe." It is unnecessary to add that the committee adjourned immediately.

SLAVERY on the Hawaiian Islands has been investigated by a correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle. He says that the laborers on the sugar plantations usually contract with the planter for three years, and that after the contract is signed the laborer is virtually a slave. He must work eleven hours a day, and his overseer is the sole judge of his ability to work. The pay is $8 a month. The writer goes on to say: "As there is often but one planter to two or three hundred laborers, it is going to be an impossibility to build up a country bearing the most remote resemblance to America on any such lines as these. The present government in Hawaii is more autocratic than in any country in Europe, with perhaps the exception of Russia. The ministry hold their positions solely at the pleasure of the king, and consequently are bound to do his will. He is a partially educated savage, covered with a veneering of civilization. The country is largely falling under the control of the Chinese, and eventually the Portuguese will share it with them. The latter are an exceedingly frugal and prolific race; so frugal that a large portion of their clothing is made from the sacks in which their flour, potatoes, and meal come. The nativs are decreasing alarmingly."

A FITTING finale to the career of the Rev. Mr. McCarthy, a verdict against whom for assault was recently rendered in favor of his servant girl, is his flight, after this escapade, as related by the Sun of the 17th inst.: A portly, red-faced man, wearing a clergyman's coat and a silk hat with a high top and flat brim, paced the prisoners' box in Yorkville police court yesterday, and awaited the appearance of the court attendant. It was the Rev. Florence McCarthy, pastor of St. Cecilia's Catholic church at Greenpoint, and recently defendant in the suit for assault brought by Miss Bridget Cronin, in which a verdict of six cents damages was returned. When he had been arraigned before Justice O'Reilly the policeman said that the prisoner had been taken into the One-hundred-and-twenty-sixth street police station on Thursday afternoon intoxicated. Mr. McCarthy said that he had been drugged. Justice O'Reilly fined him $10. Mr. McCarthy had no money, and waited four hours in a cell. Finally a woman with disheveled hair rushed into court and paid the fine, and he was free. Michael Gerth, a cabman, who has a stand at One-hundred-and-forty-ninth street and Ninth avenue, told the court that Mr. McCarthy stepped up to him on Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock and hired him to drive him and a gaily dressed woman through the annexed district, and upon their return to take them to the home of the woman, who he said was Lillie White, at 158 Thompson street. The vehicle chosen was a sleigh. Gerth said that he drove the couple up to Fordham, stopping at the road houses. Finally, near High Bridge, a dispute arose between a barkeeper and McCarthy, and it was evident that he had no money. Fearing that he would not get his fare, Gerth whipped up and drove to the One-hundred-and-twenty-sixth street police station. On the way, he says, the woman jumped from the sleigh. McCarthy held on to the back of his seat until he reached the station, when he jumped out and set off for Lexington avenue. A policeman overtook him. At the Rev. Mr. McCarthy's house in Brooklyn a servant said last night to Mr. McCarthy's lawyer, who had come over to see if he could be of service, that Mr. McCarthy had been at the house for ten minutes after his release, and had packed a small valise and taken it away with him.

News of the Week.

WM. H. GUION, of the Guion line of transatlantic steamships, retires from business insolvent.

A BRAKEMAN on the Erie railroad has recovered $5,250 for a crushed hand sustained while coupling cars.

IT is reported that there has been a massacre of Christians at Khartoum, Egypt, by the followers of El Mahdi, the False Prophet.

IT is said that Professor Felix Adler has offered to arrange with Theodore Thomas and the Philharmonic Society for a series of concerts for the benefit of the trades unions of this city.

A GARFIELD MEMORIAL church was dedicated in Washington last Sunday. Garfield belonged to the Disciples church, which fact, in the opinion of many, was small honor to either church or man.

THE steamship City of Columbus was wrecked in a snowstorm off New Bedford last week. Many lives were lost, sixty passengers being swept away by a single wave. The whole number who perished is put at 101.

INSPECTOR FELL has discovered that 12,000 children are employed in 7,000 factories in New Jersey. He found everywhere that the child labor system left indelible traces of mental and physical degeneration in the children.

A NEGRO was ordained as a preacher in this city on the 20th. The brother who swore him in warned him to avoid discussion on philosophy and science, and to preach. The elder brother has doubtless experienced the dangers to which his young colleague will be exposed.

A DISPATCH from Rome says that the pope has received assurances that the projected visit of the Emperor Francis Joseph, of Austria, to the king of Italy will be so conducted as not to wound the pope's susceptibilities. It has not been hinted before that the pope had any susceptibilities.

THE Irving Hall Democracy last Saturday night passed resolutions of sympathy with the persecuted liquor dealers of this city. There is no doubt that a great deal of fanaticism is exercised in dealing with the liquor sellers, though the calling of these men is not such as to excite the sympathies of all.

THE Rev. J. J. White, a Methodist preacher of New York, acknowledged last Sunday that "each issue of the newspapers contains accounts of vices in various forms found in the churches of all denominations." He believed, however, that the Lord will gather the wheat and cast the tares into the fire.

DANIEL MORRIS, of Salt Lake City, a Mormon with three wives, committed suicide on the 16th inst. by hanging. This suggests a practical way for the disciples of Brigham Young to settle the Mormon problem themselvs, and relieve the agony of the Rev. Mr. Talmage and other Eastern agitators who are exercised over the question of polygamy.

THE Rev. Mr. Stoddard, of Jersey City, N. J., whose wife died last summer from the discharge of a pistol held in his hand, found it necessary last Sunday to preach a sermon excusing his conduct since that melancholy event. He is charged with giving dinner parties and going to the theaters. He acknowledges he committed both of these offenses, but did so to divert his mind from his grief.

Ingersoll Interviewed.

An Analysis of Orthodox Belief.

BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

During the last month several clergymen hav selected Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll as the subject for various discourses. Mr. Talmage, upon his last lecture tour in the West, directed much of his talk to criticism of the great Agnostic. Yesterday evening I called upon Colonel Ingersoll and had a long talk about the criticisms made. The colonel was in one of his happiest of moods. What was said was equal to any of his later lectures, and as he has withdrawn for a time from the lecture field, the interview has, therefore, a special interest.

I.

Q. Do you intend lecturing any this winter?

A. I am not certain. At present I hav too much business to attend to, and cannot, in justice to my clients, leave the city.

Q. I see that the clergy are still making all kinds charges against you and your doctrins?

A. Yes, sir. Some of the charges are true, and some are not. I suppose that they intend to get in the vicinity of veracity, and are probably stating my belief as it is honestly misunderstood by them. I admit that I hav said, and that I still think, that Christianity is a blunder. But the question arises, What is Christianity? I do not mean, when I say that Christianity is a blunder, that the morality taught by Christians is a mistake. Morality is not distinctivly Christian, any more than it is Mohammedan. Morality is human, it belongs to no ism, and does not depend for a foundation upon the supernatural, or upon any book, or upon any creed. Morality is itself a foundation. When I say that Christianity is a blunder, I mean all those things distinctivly Christian are blunders. It is a blunder to say that an infinit being lived in Palestine, learned the carpenter's trade, raised the dead, cured the blind, and cast out devils, and that this God was finally assassinated by the Jews. This is absurd. All these statements are blunders, if not worse. I do not believe that Christ ever claimed that he was of supernatural origin, or that he wrought miracles, or that he would rise from the dead. If he did, he was mistaken—honestly mistaken, perhaps, but still, mistaken.

The morality inculcated by Mohammed is good. The immorality inculcated by Mohammed is bad. If Mohammed was a prophet of God, it does not make the morality he taught any better, neither does it make the immorality any better nor any worse. By this time the whole world ought to know that morality does not need to go in partnership with miracles. Morality is based upon the experience of mankind. It does not hav to learn of inspired writers, or of gods or divine persons. It is a lesson that the whole human race has been learning, and learning from experience. He who upholds, or believes in, or teaches the miraculous, commits a blunder.

II.—WHAT IS MORALITY?

Now what is morality? Morality is the best thing to do under the circumstances. Anything that tends to the happiness of mankind is moral. Anything that tends to unhappiness is immoral. We apply to the moral world rules and regulations as we do to the physical world. The man who does justice, or tries to; who is honest and kind, and givs to others what he claims for himself, is a moral man. All actions must be judged by their consequences. Where the consequences are good, the actions are good. Where the consequences are bad, the action is bad; and all consequences are learned from experience. After we hav had a certain amount of experience, we then reason from analogy. We apply our logic, and say that a certain course will bring destruction, another course will bring happiness. There is nothing inspired about morality, nothing supernatural. It is simply good, common sense, going hand-in-hand with kindness.

Morality is capable of being demonstrated. You do not hav to take the word of anybody; you can observe and examin for yourself. Larceny is the enemy of industry, and industry is a good; therefore larceny is immoral. The family is the unit of good government; anything that tends to destroy the family is immoral. Honesty is the mother of confidence; it unites, combines, and solidifies society. Dishonesty is disintegration; it destroys confidence; it brings social chaos; it is therefore immoral.

III.—THE MOSAIC ACCOUNT ABSURD.

I also admit that I regard the Mosaic account of the creation as an absurdity, as a series of blunders. Probably Moses did the best he could. He had never talked with Humboldt nor Laplace. He knew nothing of geology or astronomy. He had not the slightest suspicion of Keppler's three laws. He never saw a copy of Newton's "Principia." Taking all these things into consideration, I think Moses did the best he could.

The religious people say now that "days" did not mean days. Of these "six days" they make a kind of telescope which you can push in or draw out at pleasure. If the geologists find that more time was necessary they will stretch them out. Should it turn out that the world is not quite as old as some think, they will push them up. The "six days" can now be made to suit any period of time. Nothing can be more childish, frivolous, or contradictory.

Only a few years ago the Mosaic account was considered true, and Moses was regarded as a scientific authority. Geology and astronomy were measured by the Mosaic standard. The opposit is now true. The church has changed; and instead of trying to prove that modern astronomy and geology are false, because they do not agree with Moses, it is now endeavoring to prove that the account by Moses is true, because it agrees with modern astronomy and geology. In other words, the standard has changed; the ancient is measured by the modern, and where the literal statement in the Bible does not agree with modern discoveries they do not change the discoveries, but giv new meanings to the old account. We are not now endeavoring to reconcile science with the Bible, but to reconcile the Bible with science.

Nothing shows the extent of modern doubt more than the eagerness with which Christians search for some new testimony. Luther answered Copernicus with a passage of scripture, and he answered him to the satisfaction of orthodox ignorance.

The truth is that the Jews adopted the stories of the creation, the Garden of Eden, forbidden fruit, and the fall of man. They were told by older barbarians than they, and the Jews gave them to us.

I never said that the Bible is all bad. I hav always admitted that there are many good and splendid things in the Jewish scriptures, and many bad things. What I insist is that we should hav the courage and the common sense to accept the good, and throw away the bad. Evil is not good because found in good company, and truth is still truth, even when surrounded by falsehcod.

IV.—OUR MISTAKES.

Q. I see that you are frequently charged with disrespect toward your parents—with lack of reverence for the opinions of your father.

A. I think my father and mother, upon several religious questions, were mistaken—in fact, I hav no doubt that they were; but I never felt under the slightest obligation to defend my father's mistakes. No one can defend what he thinks is a mistake without being dishonest. That is a poor way to show respect for parents. Every Protestant clergyman asks men and woman who had Catholic parents to desert the church in which they were raised. They hav no hesitation in saying to these people that their fathers and mothers were mistaken, and that they were deceived by priests and popes.

The probability is that we are all mistaken about most everything; but it is impossible for a man to be respectable enough to make a mistake respectable. There is nothing remarkably holy in a blunder, nor praiseworthy in stubbing the toe of the mind against a mistake. Is it possible that logic stands paralyzed in the presence of parental absurdity? Suppose a man has a bad father; is he bound by the bad father's opinion, when he is satisfied that the opinion is wrong? How good does a father hav to be in order to put his son under obligation to defend his blunders? Suppose the father thinks one way and the mother the other, what are the children to do? Suppose the father changes his opinion, what then? Suppose the father thinks one way and the mother the other, and they both die when the boy is young, and the boy is bound out; whose mistakes is he then bound to follow? Our missionaries tell the barbarian boy that his parents are mistaken, that they know nothing, and that the wooden god is nothing but a senseless idol. They do not hesitate to tell this boy that his mother believed lies, and hugged, it may be to her dying heart, a miserable delusion. Why should a barbarian boy cast reproach upon his parents?

I believe it was Christ who commanded his disciples to leave father and mother; not only to leave them, but to desert them; and not only to desert father and mother, but to desert wives and children. It is also told of Christ that he said that he came to set fathers against children and children against fathers. Strange! that a follower of his should object to a man differing in opinion from his parents. The truth is, logic knows nothing of consanguinity; facts hav no relativs but other facts; and these facts do not depend upon the character of the person who states them, or upon the position of the discoverer. And this leads me to another branch of this same subject.

V.—THE OPINIONS OF GREAT MEN.

The ministers are continually saying that certain great men—kings, presidents, statesmen, millionaires—hav believed in the inspiration of the Bible. Only the other day I read a sermon in which Carlyle was quoted as having said that "the Bible is a noble book." That all may be, and yet the book not be inspired. But what is the simple assertion of Thomas Carlyle worth? If the assertion is based upon a reason, then it is worth simply the value of the reason, and the reason is worth just as much without the assertion, but without the reason the assertion is worthless. Thomas Carlyle thought, and solemnly put the thought in print, that his father was a greater man than Robert Burns. His opinion did Burns no harm, and his father no good. Since reading his "Reminiscences" I hav no great opinion of his opinion. In some respects he was undoubtedly a great man, in others a small one.

No man should giv the opinion of another as authority and in place of fact and reason, unless he is willing to take all the opinions of that man. An opinion is worth the warp and woof of fact and logic in it and no more. A man cannot add to the truthfulness of truth. In the ordinary business of life, we giv certain weight to the opinion of specialists—to the opinion of doctors, lawyers, scientists, and historians. Within the domain of the natural, we take the opinions of our fellow-men; but we do not feel that we are absolutely bound by these opinions. We hav the right to re-examin them, and if we find they are wrong we feel at liberty to say so. A doctor is supposed to hav studied medicin—to hav examined and explored the questions entering into his profession; but we know that doctors are often mistaken. We also know that there are many schools of medicin—that these schools disagree with each other, and that the doctors of each school disagree with each other. We also know that many patients die, and so far as we know, these patients hav not come back to tell us whether the doctors killed them or not. The grave generally prevents a demonstration. It is exactly the same with the clergy. They hav many schools of theology, all despising each other. Probably no two members of the same church exactly agree. They cannot demonstrate their propositions, because between the premis and the logical conclusion or demonstration, stands the tomb. A gravestone marks the end of theology. In some cases, the physicians can, by a post-mortem examination, find what killed the patient, but there is no theological post-mortem. It is impossible, by cutting a body open, to find where the soul has gone; or whether baptism, or the lack of it, had the slightest effect upon final destiny. The church, knowing that there are no facts beyond the coffin, relies upon opinions, assertions, and theories. For this reason it is always asking alms of distinguished people. Some president wishes to be re-elected, and thereupon speaks about the Bible as "the corner-stone of American liberty." This sentence is a mouth large enough to swallow any church, and from that time forward the religious people will be citing that remark of the politician to substantiate the inspiration of the scriptures.

The man who accepts opinions because they hav been entertained by distinguished people is a mental snob. When we blindly follow authority we are serfs. When our reason is convinced we are freemen. It is rare to find a fully rounded and complete man. A man may be a great doctor and a poor mechanic, a successful politician, and a poor metaphysician, a poor painter and a good poet. The rarest thing in the world is a logician—that is to say, the man who knows the value of a fact. It is hard to find mental proportion. Theories may be established by names, but facts cannot be demonstrated in that way. Very small people are sometimes right, and very great people are sometimes wrong. Ministers are sometimes right.

In all the philosophies of the world, there are undoubtedly contradictions and absurdities. The mind of man is imperfect and perfect results are impossible. A mirror, in order to reflect a perfect picture, a perfect copy, must itself be perfect. The mind is a little piece of intellectual glass, the surface of which is not true, not perfect. In consequence of this, every image is more or less distorted. The less we know, the more we imagin that we can know; but the more we know, the smaller seems the sum of knowledge. The less we know the more we expect, the more we hope for, and the more seems within the range of probability. The less we hav the more we want. There never was a banquet magnificent enough to gratify the imagination of a beggar. The moment people begin to reason about what they call the supernatural, they seem to lose their minds. People seem to hav lost their reason in religious matters, very much as the dodo is said to hav lost its wings—they hav been restricted to a little inspired island, and by disuse, their reason has been lost.

VI.—IMMORTALITY NOT TAUGHT IN THE JEWISH SCRIPTURES.

In the Jewish scriptures you will find simply the literature of the Jews. You will find there the tears and anguish of captivity—patriotic fervor, national aspiration, proverbs for the conduct of daily life, laws, regulations, customs, legends, philosophy, and folly. These books, of course, were not written by one man, but by many authors. They did not agree, having been written in different centuries, under different circumstances. I see that Mr. Beecher has at last concluded that the Old Testament does not teach the doctrin of immortality. He admits that from Mount Sinai came no hope for the dead. It is very curious that we find in the Old Testament no funeral service. No one stands by the dead and predicts another life. In the Old Testament there is no promis of another world. I hav sometimes thought that while the Jews were slaves in Egypt, the doctrin of immortality became hateful. They built so many tombs; they carried so many burdens to commemorate the dead; they saw a nation waste its wealth to adorn its graves, and leave the living naked to embalm the dead, that they concluded the doctrin was a curse and never should be taught.

Q. If the Jews did not believe in immortality, how do you account for the allusions made to witches and wizards, and things of that character?

A. When Saul visited the witch of Endor, and she, by some magic spell, called up Samuel, the prophet said, "Why hast thou disquieted me, to call me up?" He did not say, "Why hav you called me from another world?" The idea expressed is: I was asleep; why hav you disturbed that repose which should be eternal? The ancient Jews believed in witches and wizards and familiar spirits, but they did not seem to think that these spirits had once been men and women. They spoke of them as belonging to another world, a world to which man would never find his way. At that time it was supposed that Jehovah and his angels lived in the sky, but that region was not spoken of as the destined home of man. Jacob saw angels going up and down the ladder, but not the spirits of those he had known. There are two cases where it seems that men were good enough to be adopted into the family of heaven. Enoch was translated, and Elijah was taken up in a chariot of fire. As it is exceedingly cold at the hight of a few miles, it is easy to see why the chariot was of fire, and the same fact explains another circumstance—the dropping of the mantle. The Jews probably believed in the existence of other beings—that is to say, in angels and good and evil spirits—and that they lived in other worlds—but there is no passage showing that they believe in what we call the immortality of the soul.

VII.—THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

Q. Do you believe or disbelieve in the immortality of the soul?

A. I neither assert nor deny; I simply admit that I do not know. Upon that subject I am absolutely without evidence. This is the only world that I was ever in. There may be spirits, but I hav never met them, and do not know that I would recognize a spirit. I can form no conception of what is called spiritual life. It may be that I am deficient in imagination, and that ministers hav no difficulty in conceiving of angels and disembodied souls. I hav not the slightest idea how a soul looks, what shape it is, how it goes from one place to another, whether it walks or flies. I cannot conceive of anything existing without form, and yet the fact that I cannot conceive of a thing does not prove that the thing does not exist, but it does prove that I know nothing about it, and that being so, I ought to admit my ignorance. I am satisfied of a good many things that I do not know. I am satisfied that there is no place of eternal torment. I am satisfied that that doctrin has done more harm than all the religious ideas, other than that, hav done good. I do not want to take any hope from any human heart. I hav no objection to people believing in any good thing—no objection to their expecting a crown of infinit joy for every human being. Many people imagin that immortality must be an infinit good; but after all there is something terrible in the idea of endless life. Think of a river that never reaches the sea; of a bird that never folds its wings; of a journey that never ends. Most people find great pleasure in thinking about and in believing in another world. There the prisoner expects to be free; the slave to find liberty; the poor man expects wealth, the rich man happiness; the peasant dreams of power, and the king of contentment. They expect to find there what they lack here. I do not wish to destroy these dreams. I am endeavoring to put out the everlasting fires. A good, cool grave is infinitly better than the fiery furnace of Jehovah's wrath. Eternal sleep is better than eternal pain. For my part I would rather be annihilated than to be an angel, with all the privileges of heaven, and yet hav within my breast a heart that could be happy while those who hav loved me in this world were in perdition.

I most sincerely hope that the future life will fulfil all splendid dreams; but in the religion of the present day there is no joy. Nothing is so devoid of comfort, when bending above our dead, as the assertions of theology unsupported by a single fact. The promises are so far away and the dead are so near. From words spoken eighteen centuries ago, the echoes are so weak, and the sounds of the clods on the coffin are so loud. Above the grave what can the honest minister say? If the dead was not a Christian, what then? What comfort can the orthodox clergyman giv to the widow of the honest unbeliever? If Christianity is true, the other world will be worse than this. There the many will be miserable, only the few happy; there the miserable cannot better their condition; the future has no star of hope, and in the east of eternity there can never be a dawn.

VIII.—THE RELIGION WE SHOULD HAV.

Q. If you take away the idea of eternal punishment, how do you propose to restrain men; in what way will you influence conduct for good?

A. Well, the trouble with religion is that it postpones punishment and reward to another world. Wrong is wrong because it breeds unhappiness. Right is right because it tends to the happiness of man. These facts are the basis of what I call the religion of this world. When a man does wrong the consequences follow, and between the cause and the effect a redeemer cannot step. Forgivness cannot form a breastwork between act and consequence.

There should be a religion of the body—a religion that will prevent deformity, that will refuse to multiply insanity, that will not propagate disease—a religion that is judged by its consequences in this world. Orthodox Christianity has taught, and still teaches, that in this world the difference between the good and bad is that the bad enjoy themselvs, while the good carry the cross of virtue with bleeding brows bound and pierced with the thorns of honesty and kindness. All this, in my judgment, is immoral. The man who does wrong carries a cross. There is no world, no star in which the result of wrong is real happiness. There is no world, no star in which the result of right doing is unhappiness. Virtue and vice must be the same everywhere. Vice must be vice everywhere because its consequences are evil; and virtue must be virtue everywhere because its consequences are good. There can be no such thing as forgivness. These facts are the only restraining influences possible—the innocent man cannot suffer for the guilty and satisfy the law.

IX.—THE NUMBER OF CHRISTIANS.

Q. How do you answer the argument, or the fact, that the church is constantly increasing, and that there are now some four hundred millions of Christians?

A. That is what I call the argument of numbers. If that argument is good now it was always good. If Christians were, at any time, in the minority, then, according to this argument, Christianity was wrong. Every religion that has succeeded has appealed to the argument of numbers. There was a time when Buddhism was in a majority. Buddha not only had but has more followers than Christ. Success is not a demonstration. Mohammed was a success, and a success from the commencement. Upon a thousand fields he was victor. Of the scattered tribes of the desert he made a nation, and this nation took the fairest part of Europe from the followers of the cross. In the history of the world, the success of Mohammed is unparalleled; but this success does not establish that he was the prophet of God.

Now it is claimed that there are some four hundred millions of Christians. To make that total, I am counted as a Christian; I am one of the fifty or sixty millions of Christians in the United States—excluding Indians not taxed. By the census reports we are all going to heaven—we are all orthodox. At the last great day we can refer with confidence to the ponderous volumes containing the statistics of the United States. As a matter of fact, how many Christians are in the United States—how many believers in the inspiration of the scriptures—how many real followers of Christ? I will not pretend to giv the number, but I will venture to say there are not fifty millions. How many in England? Where are the four hundred millions found? To make this immense number, they hav counted all the heretics, all the Catholics, all the Jews, Spiritualists, Universalists, and Unitarians; all the babes, all the idiotic and insane Infidels, all the scientists, all the unbelievers. As a matter of fact, they hav no right to count any except the orthodox members of the orthodox churches. There may be more "members" now than formerly, and this increase of members is due to a decrease of religion. Thousands of members are only nominal Christians, wearing the old uniform simply because they do not wish to be charged with desertion. The church, too, is a kind of social institution, a club with a creed instead of by-laws, and the creed is never defended unless attacked by an outsider. No objection is made to the minister because he is liberal, if he says nothing about it in the pulpit. A man like Mr. Beecher draws a congregation, not because he is a Christian, but because he is a genius; not because he is orthodox, but because he has something to say. He is an intellectual athlete. He is full of pathos and poetry. He has more description than divinity, more charity than creed, and altogether more common sense than theology. For these reasons thousands of people love to hear him. On the other hand, there are many people who hav a morbid desire for the abnormal, for intellectual deformities, for thoughts that hav two heads. This accounts for the success of some of Mr. Beecher's rivals.

Christians claim that success is a test of truth. Has any church succeeded as well as the Catholic? Was the tragedy of the Garden of Eden a success? Who succeeded there? The last best thought is not a success, if you mean that only that is a success which has succeeded, and if you mean by succeeding that it has won the assent of the majority. Besides, there is no time fixed for the test. Is that true which succeeds to-day, or next year, or in the next century? Once the Copernican system was not a success. There is no time fixed. The result is, we hav to wait. A thing, to exist at all, has to be to a certain extent a success. A thing cannot even die without having been a success. It certainly succeeded enough to hav life. Presbyterians should remember, while arguing the majority argument and the success argument, that there are far more Catholics than Protestants, and that the Catholics can giv a longer list of distinguished names.

My answer to all this, however, is that the history of the world shows that ignorance has always been in the majority. There is one right road—numberless paths that are wrong. Truth is one; error is many. When a great truth has been discovered, one man has pitted himself against the world. A few think; the many believe. The few lead; the many follow. The light of the new day, as it looks over the window-sill of the east, falls at first on only one forehead.

There is another thing. A great many people pass for Christians who are not. Only a little while ago a couple of ladies were returning from church in a carriage. They had listened to a good orthodox sermon. One said to the other: "I am going to tell you something—I am going to shock you. I don't believe the Bible!" And the other replied: "Neither do I!"—Detroit Sunday Times.

Mr. Watts and the Preachers of Canada.

Seeing through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Charles Watts, the great English Freethought lecturer, would visit Ontario in the course of his lecturing tour in this country, I entered into correspondence with Mr. Watts, with the view to having him deliver one or more lectures in this the baby city of Ontario. It being impossible to get him here before he went West, we agreed to hav him upon his return to the East. In the mean time, Messrs. Watts and Chainey had entered into arrangements to travel together, giving joint lectures. So, instead of one, we had both of these talented gentlemen here on the evenings of Nov. 19th and 20th, when they were greeted, for this benighted and priest-ridden corner of the Lord's vinyard, with good, attentiv, and intelligent audiences on both nights of their lectures, notwithstanding it had rained for some time previous and during the time they were here, making the roads almost impassable and preventing many from the surrounding country from being present. Yet, with these drawbacks, their lectures were a grand success, and hav created an interest in Secularism here that must and will bear good fruit in the not very distant future. It goes without saying that the dry bones of old orthodoxy got such a severe shaking as they never received here before. I need hardly say to those readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who hav had the pleasure of listening to these gentlemen, that they fully sustained the reputation that preceded them. Mr. Watts is a clear reader, logical reasoner, and incisiv speaker of fine elocutionary abilities. Mr. Chainey is a talented, eloquent, forcible, impassioned, and persuasiv orator. In a word, these lectures were a rare intellectual treat that is seldom enjoyed by any audience. As Mr. Watts invites discussion at the close of lectures, the secretary of the committee was instructed to specially invite Rev. A. M. Phillips (Methodist), of this city, to be present at these lectures, to take part in a discussion at the close of Mr. Watts's lectures. This reverend gentleman was specially invited by us, from the fact that he on several occasions advertised and preached sermons (a short time before) for the especial benefit of Agnostics, and, to his own satisfaction at least, had answered all the objections that could be offered by Agnostics to the religion of his lordship, Jesus Christ & Co. As the outcome of such invitation, a two-night's debate was arranged between Messrs. Watts and Phillips, which took place on the evenings of Dec. 5th and 6th, before crowded houses on both nights. Subject, first night, "Fallacies of Popular Theology." Second night, "Agnosticism or Christianity, Which the Better Gospel for Mankind?" The chairman for both nights was Colin Macdougal, Esq., Q.C., also an elder in the Presbyterian church here, who discharged the duties of the chair in a fair and impartial manner. Of these debates there is and can be but one opinion; that is, that Mr. Watts had the debate all to himself, Mr. Phillips never on either evening attempting to reply to his (Mr. Watts's) arguments, or advancing any arguments in support of his side of the question for Mr. Watts to reply to. His abilities as a debater would not reflect any credit upon a schoolboy, and gave color to the oft-expressed opinion of some who knew him, that he could only hav been prompted by his vanity to accept a challenge to debate such subjects with such a foe as Mr. Watts. In his introductory (first night) and closing remarks (second night), he said he accepted the challenge to debate with Mr. Watts, not for the purpose of putting his debating qualities against Mr. Watts, but because of the love he bore for the young men of the city, many of whom were being ruined by pernicious doctrins. His speech on both nights of debate gave the lie direct to the above statement by his studiously and persistently (although often requested by Mr. Watts to reply to his arguments) avoiding the questions under debate, never attempting to refute the arguments advanced by Mr. Watts in support of the, to him (Mr. Phillips), pernicious doctrins. If Mr. Phillips is a novice at debate, he is an adept in the use of those weapons with which all Christians are familiar, and to which they (being unable to answer the arguments of their opponents) invariably resort—the cowardly weapons of false and malicious slander and misrepresentation. He (Mr. Phillips) received a severe, scathing, and well-merited castigation from Mr, Watts in his closing speech of the second night for his cowardly conduct in slandering our honored dead and living exponents of the principles of Secularism.

There is a movement on foot here in Ontario, I believe, having for its object the transporting of the Secular Review, Mr. Watts, and family, from London, Eng., to Toronto, Ont., a project that must meet with the hearty approval of all the Liberals of Canada. There is a great deal of latent Freethought here awaiting a Watts to develop and organize it into a power for good in this Canada of ours. Were we organized as we should be, justice would not hav been so long denied us by the Tories of Canada (under the lead of Sir John A. Macdonald) by having the Oaths and Evidence Amendment act rejected in the two last sessions of the Dominion Parliament, denying to Agnostics the right to testify on affirmation in criminal cases, a right they now enjoy in civil cases in Ontario, a right extended to them by the Liberal government of Ontario.

Public opinion here is growing daily more favorable toward Agnostics. As an evidence of the above, we can point to the fact that only two years ago, when Col. R. G. Ingersoll was in Canada lecturing, all the leading papers of Ontario ignored the fact by a contemptuous silence, and refused to insert as an advertisment a notice of his lectures. The Watts-Chainey lectures were advertised in all the papers where they lectured, the lectures fairly and reasonably fully reported, receiving also in many cases fair and lengthy editorial notice. A church-of-England clergyman of this city said since Messrs. Watts and Chainey were here, that the leaders, and a great majority of the rank and file, of this great Freethought movement were men whose lives were above reproach, living more correct lives morally than great numbers of those calling themselvs Christians.

Since Mr. Watts has left here (as we fully expected), several of the occupants of the cowards' castle hav grown very valiant and buckled on their armor, and, like David of old, are slinging small, smooth stones at random at the head of the blasphemous Infidel, which fail to reach their mark and can produce harm only to themselvs. From the first announcement of these lectures until the debates had ended and Mr. Watts gone, as they hoped, forever, not a sound was heard from one of these blatherskite skypilots. Mr. Phillips, fearing that the course of his brethren of the cloth in replying to Mr. Watts after he had gone would draw, also advertised to repeat his arguments in the late debate, finding it easier to reply to Mr. Watts in his own church, with an audience of old women of both sexes, than before an audience of intelligent men and women. He invited all who sympathized with Mr. Watts's views to be present, and invited criticism of his discourses only by letter. A local secularist replied, and he is now wrestling with the reply.

Before I close this rather long letter, I must thank you for so promptly responding to the request of a number of your readers in establishing a Children's Corner, so ably conducted, proving that you are willing and determined to make the grand old TRUTH SEEKER the most interesting Freethought paper to the greatest number, as well as being the largest Liberal paper published. Such a feature must add greatly to your hosts of readers, as I hope and believe it should also to your list of subscribers. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER and staff, and all truth seekers throughout the world, a happy New Year, I remain

Yours fraternally, D. NEILSON.

St. Thomas, Ont.

Would be Insane if He Did Believe It.

If the Rev. Heber Newton is to be adjudged insane for not believing the inspiration of the Book of Blunders, belief in the impossible will become the test of sanity.

As a matter of fact, not one man in ten thousand believes the biblical fictions for rejecting which Mr. Newton is denounced as a lunatic by some of his clerical brethren.

It is next to impossible to find a man who believes the universe was manufactured in a week, not counting Saturday.

It is rather a pueril story that "in Adam's fall we sinned all."

The deluge was impossible, and the story of the ark an absurdity.

Why should Ham be cursed for laughing at the old man when he found his father disreputably drunk?

The building of Babel is manifestly untrue, for there is no trace of it.

It is more likely that Lot's wife became a barrel of vinegar than a pillar of salt.

Belief in such fictions as these requires the abnegation of reason and common sense. Mr. Newton would be more likely to be insane if he believed them than in disbelieving them.—Truth.

The Liberal Club.

The lecture on "Late Aspects of Dress Reform" did not occur, as announced, at the 223d meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, and a discourse by Mr. Wilson Macdonald, on "Art, Industry, and Education," was substituted. Prior to introducing the speaker, the chair, represented as usual by the Hon. T. B. Wakeman, gave notice that upon the secretary's table would be found "The Truth Seeker Annual," which was absolutely the best and most beautiful thing of the kind that Liberals had ever had an opportunity to purchase. There was nothing like it on either side of the pond. Previous to this announcement, however, the audience had discovered the presence of the "Annual," which was conspicuous on account of its ornamental appearance, and the secretary's large stock had become seriously depleted.

Mr. Macdonald's lecture was devoted to the advocacy of industrial schools to be founded by the government something after the pattern set by Peter Cooper. Incidentally the subject of free trade was touched upon. The speaker believed in the efficacy of a protectiv tariff. He gave many statistics to show that while laborers in this country were paid on an average nearly twice as much as in Europe, the necessaries of life were accessible at about the same prices here as there. This he regarded as an irrefutable argument in favor of protection. Free trade would reduce wages in America to a level with the remuneration of European laborers, while the cost of living must be increased. The lecture was long and earnest, and the figures given would appear to support Mr. Macdonald's view of the advantages of protection.

Mr. Cohen was demanded by general acclamation, and, upon taking the platform, responded vociferously. Free trade or protection, he held, was of no benefit to the workingman. The tariff as now administered favored only the manufacturer. A case was cited of a mill-owner in northern New York, who could go into Canada and procure workmen for less than an American citizen could afford to labor; but when the American citizen wished to procure lumber he must buy it of the mill owner because, although it was cheap in Canada, the duty would increase the expense to a figure above what the aforesaid mill owner charged for it. Therefore protection, so far as the laborer is concerned, does not protect. Mr. Cohen's argument, it will be perceived, is equally as conclusiv on the one side as Mr. Macdonald's is on the other.

Mr. Andrews wished that he could possess the serene confidence in regard to these matters that the previous speakers seemed to hav. He declared his inability to decide whether there should be a duty on imports or not. He did not pretend to hav knowledge enough to giv a final solution of the problem. He would hesitate about recommending the establishment by the government of industrial schools. We could trust to individual enterprise for that. However, he could not express himself either way. When the Great Universal Preacher holds his judgment in suspense regarding any subject, it is considered safe to set it down as an open question.

The persons leaving the hall at the close of Mr. Andrews's remarks having absorbed what few copies of the "The Truth Seeker Annual" the secretary had left at their commencement, the reporter volunteered to procure some more at headquarters. He therefore missed hearing the remarks of the next speaker, except to learn that his name was Wiley, and to hear him enunciate the proposition that the devil is not as black as he is painted, no matter how marked a brunet he may in reality be. When the scribe returned with an armful of "Annuals," Dr. Lambert had one of the felicitous speeches, for which he is so distinguished, in the process of delivery. Sufficient credit had not been given by the previous speakers to the industrial schools already established, Professor Adler's Kindergarten among others. He had lectured on the subject himself years ago.

Mr. Macdonald renewed the subject of protection with much energy in his closing remarks. He believed in a protectiv tariff because he was the workingman's friend, and he defied anyone to show that protection was not a blessing to American industry.

This week, Friday night, we are to hav Mr. John E. Remsburg, of Kansas, who will deliver his now famous lecture on "False Claims."

Mr. Chainey in New York.

The Liberal Club had another meeting Sunday night, when an audience came together to listen to Mr. George Chainey, of Boston. Snow had been falling all day and so far into the edge of the evening, that when the sky cleared and stars came out, few were aware that it had ceased storming. To the weather, therefore, can be attributed the small-sized audience that greeted Mr. Chainey.

The speaker was introduced by Mr. Wakeman, who said that Mr. Chainey had become one of the recognized pastors of Liberalism, and had a larger parish than any one he knew of. He was doing stated preaching of the new gospel at Boston, Philadelphia, and New York.

The subject of Mr. Chainey's lecture was "The Nature and Present Condition of Freethought in America." "Every sermon nowadays," said he, "to attract attention needs to be tinged with heresy. Fifty years ago every sermon was a theological argument; now no orthodox minister agues, and no one thinks of going to church to learn anything. The church is prosperous because she employs the best musical and elocutionary talent procurable and keeps as far from the precipice of theological dissussion as possible. The ravages of time she attempts to conceal with paint and powder and enamel." "There is a class of Freethinkers," the speaker continued, "who are neither with us nor against us—who are Freethinkers simply because they cannot close their eyes to the truth. They may best be designated as Nothingarians. Next to these are the Unitarians, who, though they belong with us, are found in the ranks of the enemy. Then comes Free Religion. The church will tolerate any form of heresy except that of which says, 'Out of the way with you; into your graves, ye gods and demons; out of the way you priests! Turn all your churches into schools, and instead of prayers and hate giv us reason and love.' Free Religion may hav done some good, and it may hav been helpful to some while fleeing from bondage to the promised land. It is a pleasant resting-place, but you cannot stop here any more than you can build a city around one well and one palm-tree in a desert." In the course of his remarks Mr. Chainey gav a new rendering of a portion of the Athanasian Creed, substituting law, force, and attraction for the father, son, and holy ghost, and for the first time in history, perhaps, that remarkable piece of formulated obscurity was, in a measure, made intelligible.

The lecturer touched upon the iniquity of the Sunday laws, and the defects of Christian morality. That Liberalism promotes morality was illustrated by the good morals of those professing it. Unlike the ancient Greeks and Romans, Christians paid little attention to physical culture. Next to good health is sound thinking. Many do not think at all—not because they hav no thinkers, but because they are afraid to use them. When he was a Christian, every time he had a new thought he was smitten with the fear that it was a heresy. The notion that boys or girls are to be taught to think for themselvs is foreign to Christianity. "Make your lives perfect," said Mr. Chainey, "and for you shall shine all truth and shower all blessings." Though Christians profess to deny themselvs luxuries in this world, they expect nothing but cake and wine in the next. They cry vanity of vanities here, and look forward to kingdoms in the world to come. They decry the theaters, and yet heaven, in their eyes, is an eternal musical and dramatic entertainment.

If there are angels, it is their duty to minister to us. If there is a God, it is his duty to serve us. How foolish to attempt to add to the glory of the infinit! Men and women are encouraged by your applause. God can get along without it. If he has not angels and seraphs enough to chant his praises and shout "Holy, holy art thou, Lord God Almighty," he can create a few more.

Mr. Chainey closed with a beautiful allegory, tracing man's progress to the goal of humanity, over the gate of which were inscribed the words: "Blessed above all are those who come here through the temples of Study, Reality, and Ideality."

Mr. Chamberlain's Opinion.

I heartily rejoice to see the cordial expressions of sympathy and assurances of support for the Heywoods which hav appeared in recent numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. If the TRUTH SEEKER family will do as good and efficient work for the Heywoods as they did for Bennett, they may hasten the advent of that which is; in any event, certain, the ultimate triumph of the Heywoods. Let each one remember that these bold and vigorous reformers are struggling for that which we hold dearest in life, the liberty of thought—that they are fighting for a principle which is worth more to mankind than any religion ever revealed, the principle which is the foundation of our government, that the expression of opinion shall be absolutely free, and that there shall be no censorship in our machinery of government. In a private letter Mr. Heywood writes: "It is six years December last since these persecutions began. They hav well-nigh ruined our business, and balked almost every other power to earn our living, keeping me oscillating between prison and poor-house, and constantly crowding my family nearer the verge of destitution. Lacking adequate means to provide necessary food, fuel, and clothing from month to month, I do not now know how I am to get my family through the winter without actual suffering. Still, the fruit of this struggle will be worth to the world all it costs us, and in no event will citizen right, now assailed in our person, be yielded." When will the licentious gang who are crying "crucify him" ever learn that such a spirit cannot be put down, that the spiritual is beyond the reach of the physical, that an idea cannot be annihilated by the infliction of physical torture, that cruelty induces sympathy, and that humanity will honor those who fight its battles? It is shameful that in our times, and in our country, a man of high character and high purposes should be steadily and systematically persecuted, maligned, and vilified for six years because his sentiments and expressions hav aroused the hatred of a little clique of fanatics, and I rejoice to see that there are many people throughout our country who realize that, inasmuch as it has been done to one of the least of these, it can be done to them, and that if such outrage is permitted to go unchecked there will be no safety for anyone, and who hav made up their minds pretty sternly that this business must stop, and that no inquisition shall be established on American soil. "There is still a strong flavor of tea in Boston harbor." The number of truth seekers is now double what it was when Bennett was made the victim of the assassin Benedict, the principles involved are more generally understood now than then, and there is no good reason why the champions of natural human rights should not receive adequate and ample support, both moral and substantial. Let us remember that our country expects every truth seeker to do his duty.

ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

That Pamphlet.

Observing in THE TRUTH SEEKER a notice that a discussion of the social questions had taken place between the editor of the Olive Branch and Mrs. Juliet H. Severance, and that the same was in pamphlet form and for sale by the latter, I wrote at once for a copy. By the kindness of a couple of my very dearest friends, the Olive Branch has several times been given to me to read. As a whole, its contents were very gratifying as well as instructiv, and, therefore, as far as Mr. Jones was concerned, my impressions regarding him were very favorable. As regards Mrs. Severance, I hav known her for years as a noble woman and practical worker, and, therefore, was prepared to expect that the discussion would be able, just, and creditable to both sides. I did not anticipate for one moment that the editor of the Olive Branch would deign to misrepresent or falsify the position of his opponent, and had too much respect for his professed opinions as an exponent of Spiritualism to deem it possible for him to cater to the time-serving conservatism of the age, and to pettifog in defense of customs and laws that are indefensible according to all the principles of the spiritual philosophy, that knows no distinction of rights on account of sex. So far as Mr. Jones is concerned, two or three things are fully established. In the first place, his readiness to slander parties quite as conscientious as himself for human well-being, whose methods differ from his, is put on record. Secondly, his inability to cope with said parties in fair argument. Thirdly, his lack of justice, and his assumption that Spiritualism is at war with the most radical ground of the social question. Fourthly, his moral cowardice to face the issue that is forcing itself to the front, and which no boaster like himself can sweep back. Fifthly, his white-feather-coward-castle policy to avert an exposure of his injustice and inability to meet and defend an issue created by himself. Mrs. Severance went at her part of the work as an able, sensible woman should. No evasion, tergiversation, or misrepresentation is anywhere shown in her part of the discussion. Her remarks are clear-cut and chaste, which no pure true mind can read without feeling convinced that a true soul is behind the letter, whose spirit is fully imbued with the integrity, necessity, and sacredness of her mission. It is true that there is honest room for difference of opinion, but there should be none as to the necessity of a thorough understanding of the relations the sexes sustain to each other; upon the exercise of which depends the weal or woe of humanity. Mrs. Severance, in her inimitable manner, makes very clear what has hitherto seemed inexplicable points in this much vexed (and too little understood) question; and to all honest and inquiring minds that desire a clear conception of the matter at issue in this debate, I would say, Lose no time in sending for the pamphlet, for it will richly repay a thorough examination of its contents, and will add one more to the manifold evidences that truth and justice in the long run are triumphant.

Let Freethinkers Watch This Association.

The movement to "put God into the Constitution" is now organized as the National Reform Convention, and announces as its foundation principles that "God the sovereign has vested the government of the world in his son, Jesus Christ; that nations are expressly commanded to yield allegiance and obedience to him; and that the will of God revealed in the Bible is of supreme authority in civil affairs."

Among the supporters of this movement to enthrone the Bible in politics, while it is being pressed in religion, are, in this state, President Seelye, Prof. Bennett of Boston University, Editor Bicknell of the Journal of Education, Rev. Dr. Miner, and Judge Rockwell; and fifteen hundred contributors in nineteen states and territories keep the association in funds.—Boston Transcript.

"THE Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac" is out. 25 cents.

Editorial Notes.

J. E. REMSBURG spoke in Philadelphia on the 20th, in this city on the 25th, and will be at Boston during the New England Freethought Convention.

THE Independent had as its literary treat week before last a semi-glorification of Harriet Martineau, the Atheist. This is an improvement on the usage of Atheists by Christians a few decades ago.

AT the annual meeting for the sale of pews in the Brooklyn Tabernacle the chief clown informed the people that he "hated bigotry as he hated the devil." Their is scarcely a more bigoted Christian in the country than he who uttered these words. How Dr. Talmage must hate himself!

MR. GREEN'S magazine for January is a little superior to any preceding number, which is a sign of healthy growth pleasing to record. The articles by the editor are on the Bible, Girard College, and the kind of arguments orthodoxy presents. The contributors include Elizur Wright, Judge and Mrs. Krekel, Allen Pringle, T. B. Wakeman, Mrs. Slenker, Milton Woolley, and H. H. Hall, the minstrel. The Directory is growing. Mr. Green's address, it will be remembered, is Salamanca, N. Y.

THE Home Secretary of England has still further shown his despicable spirit of persecution by refusing to allow Mr. W. S. Ramsey, lately released from prison, to make a business visit to his companion, G. W. Foote, who will not hav served out his sentence till some time next month. The Home Secretary is more stringent with these Freethinkers than he is with the most brutal criminals. By no manner of equitable law can their acts be stretched into a crime, but the same cannot be said of Harcourt's acts, which are a flagrant crime against liberty and justice.

ARTHUR M. DENT, M. D., of Coshocton, Ohio, writes to the Banner of Light that the legislature of that state convened on the 8th inst., when both "Democratic and Republican members vied with each other" in taking steps toward the repeal of the odious "Russell" law, of whose unjust bearing upon Spiritualist mediums our readers hav been already apprised. "To Hon. G. H. Barger," he states, "the leader of the Democratic majority, and who is a brilliant and rising statesman, belongs the honor of introducing the first bill to blot out from the Ohio statutes this monster of intolerance."

THE potent influence of groggeries on the politics of our times is generally admitted, but it will be a surprise to those who hav been wont to regard the Democratic party as the patron of free rum to learn that in this city the strongest Republican assembly district is the one most fully provided with liquor shops of various kinds, and that the strongest corresponding Democratic territory is the most sparsely dotted with these ulcers. The Republican candidates for assembly in the Eighth district must stand treat in over six hundred saloons, while the Democrat elected in the Fourth district has his pocket taxed in only two hundred and twelve.

THE following, from John Swinton's Paper of the 20th, shows that Mr. Swinton at last sees the point we hav several times raised for his edification and enlightenment: "'There is no power in this country that could uphold human slavery, if it were not upheld by the church.' That is what the Rev. Dr. Albert Barnes said twenty-five years ago about the power of the church in upholding the old system of African chattel slavery. The language of the Rev. Dr. Albert Barnes is just as applicable to the present state of things as it was to that which he then denounced. There is no power in this country that could uphold the abominable plutocracy, now in the ascendant, if it were not upheld by the church."

THE religious warfare continues in Lakeville, Conn., without material change. The obnoxious crucifix in front of the Catholic church is still standing, although the Protestants continue to quietly protest against its continuance in plain sight of the main street. The Catholics, on the other hand, resent any insinuations as to the propriety of keeping a figure of the bleeding Christ before the passing public, winter and summer, and continue to boycott the storekeepers who signed the petition asking that the crucifix be removed. During the cold weather some of the storekeepers hav sorely felt the loss of the Catholic trade, and one firm at least has determined to close up business and leave town. This fight shows Christianity in its practical workings.

THE League Man has been transformed into a more or less Socialistic paper, after the style of John Swinton's Paper, reduced in size, and for the last three weeks has been issued on Saturdays. C. O. Ward has been added to the number of editors, thus relieving Mr. Wakeman of much arduous labor. Mr. Ward expounds the Socialistic principles, Mr. Wakeman illustrates the Higher Integration, and devises ways of exterminating the Mormons and relieving the negro, and Mr. Leland attends to the League work, occasionally throwing a shaft at the enemy in his own airily inimitable way. If Man would pay Union prices for his printing he would be better dressed, and at the same time illustrate in the most practicable way his sympathy for the workingmen. At present he is an educated tramp. His garments are all unworthy the great brain he carries. But even a tramp is a man and brother, and we promis the rejuvenated Man our cordial co-operation.

IN a communication to the Coshocton Age, defending Spiritualism against the slanderous charges of a minister, Mr. W. S. Wood makes some comparison of the number of people who hav been mentally afflicted by the excessiv assimilation of Christianity or Spiritualism. He finds that a short time ago in five Ohio insane institutions there were forty-nine inmates made insane from excitement caused by Christianity, and only seven credited to Spiritualism, for the same period of time. The record for a longer period in thirteen of the largest institutions of the United States showed this result: 1994 from religious insanity, and 229 credited to Spiritualism, during the same time. In 42 reports showing 32,313 male patients, 315 were down as clergymen, which shows one insane minister to 150 others, while only 45 male and female, credited to Spiritualism, showed the proportion of insane Spiritualists to be only one to every 711 others. Taking the estimate of Spiritualists in the United States at a low figure, they would be represented proportionately in the insane asylums by over 3,000 inmates, whereas, at this time, there is not to exceed 150.

A LETTER just received from W. S. Bell shows the prospects of a large convention in Boston to be bright. With the speakers engaged it cannot fail to be a brilliant one, so far as oratory goes. James Parton's lecture will alone be worth a trip of a hundred miles. And it is barely possible that Ingersoll may be there before the close, as indicated by the subjoined letter from him to Mr. Bell:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 11, 1884.

W. S. BELL, ESQ., Dear Sir: I hav delayed answering your kind and flattering invitation to be with you on the 29th, hoping that I might say yes. I find that I must go to Denver, Colorado, on business, leaving here to-morrow. The probability is that I cannot return in time to celebrate with you the birthday of Thomas Paine. I hope that the celebration may be in every way worthy of the author-hero. Regretting that I cannot be present, and thanking you for your cordial invitation, I remain yours always, R. G. INGERSOLL.

But with or without the splendid presence of the colonel, the convention will be a commanding gathering, and every one whose duties will permit should attend.

THE pious of Montreal hav their woes. The first article of the rules of Zion church sets forth that no one can minister to them who does not maintain that the "sacred scriptures of the Old and New Testament are divinely inspired and of supreme authority; the true and proper deity, and the all-sufficient and vicarious atonement of our Lord and savior Jesus Christ; the personality and proper deity of the holy spirit, and the indispensable necessity of his influence to bring a sinner to true repentance, to regenerate the heart and to perfect our sanctification, justification through faith in Christ, and final perseverance of all true believers to a state of eternal blessedness through faith in Christ, and obedience to his commands, and the future and eternal punishment of the wicked." But the Rev. Alfred J. Bray, who has been elected at the two last annual meetings of the church, is now accused of having continuously preached and maintained—by sermons, speeches, newspaper articles, and paragraphs, and otherwise—doctrins subversiv of and contrary to the first article quoted above. That, more particularly, he has preached that the sacred scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are not divinely inspired and of supreme authority, within the meaning of the said article; that the atonement of Christ was not vicarious, within the meaning of the said article; and that the punishment of the wicked is not eternal, within the meaning of the said article. Consequently a part of Zion congregation aver that Mr. Bray has never legally been their minister, and that his acts as such are null and void. All of which is set forth in a particularly bitter law suit between the rival factions now encumbering the dockets of the Montreal courts.

WE commend the issue of Puck for January 12th to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER for its central cartoon. Although "a picture without words" it yet speaks more eloquently than the most elaborate argument against the Catholic church influence over our public schools. Puck has struck many hard blows at the prevailing superstitions of our country and times, but none harder or more needed than this. We congratulate our illustrated contemporary on its foresight and independence, and transcribe its reasons for the cartoon, which shows the editor to be entirely in sympathy with the artist:

"The Roman Catholic church never sleeps. It pursues the even tenor of the way it has marked out for itself, never allowing an opportunity to pass of strengthening its already commanding position. It does not bow its head willingly to laws that are calculated to lessen its influence; but it appears to do so, only to wait until it sees the chance of neutralizing that which may be adverse to it. In countries where Catholicism is not the prevailing religion, the Romish church handles its weapons delicately and with gloved hands. It will use its strength only when it is certain that its blow will be effectual. It will not try to excite hostility where it feels itself weak The study of the history of the church will show that this has invariably been its practice. It is humble only when it can gain its ends by remaining so.

It is these characteristic qualities, these soft, suave methods, that render it so dangerous an institution. There is one thing, however, in which it has shown, we may say, commendable consistency. If a religious system is to be preserved, there must be some consistency, and in its uncompromising opposition to our public schools the church has not been recreant to its principles. It recognizes no distinction between civil and religious government. That is to say, a true Roman Catholic owes allegiance to the pope, who is a foreign potentate. This is why a consistent Catholic cannot be a perfect American citizen, who owes allegiance to no man —to nothing save his country.

Sophistory may be used to overcome this argument, but the obvious fact remains nevertheless. No other denomination makes the same pretensions. No other denomination finds fault with the public schools. It remains for the Romish church to set itself up in defiance of the great body of the people who are not Roman Catholics. There is no prejudice on the part of this paper against any system of religion, provided it does not fly in the face of what is generally accepted by all mankind as morality. The mere religious exercises of Catholicism are harmless enough in themselvs; but as they are, as we hav shown, inseparable from questions of civil government, it behooves Americans to keep a watchful eye on the pretensions of the church, and above all not to allow our secular public schools to be tampered with by prelates or priests of any denomination.

CHAPTER IV.

DR. DOBSON.

On his return home from his unsuccessful missionary tour Cupples found Dr. Dobson in consultation with his wife. The baby had been suddenly taken with spasms, and Mrs. Cupples, being at her wits' end, had sent for the doctor. He came and discovered a pin sticking into the baby; and, being a good nurse, remained and helped to keep it quiet until it passed into a profound slumber. He greeted the disappointed Cupples with comfortable voice and look; and congratulated him on the addition to his family and hoped that blessings would fall upon his paternal head.

"Not paternal head for long," cried Cupples; "I mean to get rid of it this very day."

"Why, it's a darling," said the doctor.

"Then take it yourself."

"Oh dear me, no," said the doctor; "I have seven daughters already, and what man could have an eighth unless he was deaf and dumb and a Crœsus. With bonnets to the right of me, left of me, front of me, I'm completely submerged. The unhealthiness of this climate must increase or I'm bankrupt. If this was a boy, Cupples, I'd take it. I could get my money back. He'd do something. But what can a girl do except keep house; and only think, I've got seven girls, besides a wife bigger than myself to keep house for me. Eight women's spheres in my kitchen! There's plenty of music I can assure you. The neighbors do get ground up. There must be some slashing with eight planets and nary a son."

The doctor's bosom swelled with pride at the magnificence of this pun. He was great on puns. Almost every third sentence was an attempt at one, and the way that his words squirmed in order to claim relationship was a marvel. We can only reproduce one out of a thousand, and then the chaff will get the better of the wheat. The doctor would like to have the whole lot put in print; but if that were done, this veracious record would lie on dusty shelves unread, in company with theological masterpieces that, like puns, are quibbles, only they lack the good nature and wit. The difference be'ween theology and punning is that one is a work of words and the other a play of words, and play is preferable to work. The punster, no doubt, puts us frequently to the rack, but he doesn't burn us or hang us. It's hard enough to laugh at a pun; but to solemnly profess to believe one, to worship it, rear temples to it, and ordain a priesthood to it—it seems as if this were carrying the joke too far.

"Swap this off for a boy, Cupples," continued the doctor, "and I'll take it. But another Garden of Eden; another fall and fig-leaves, that is, a dozen new dresses, is more than I can stand. If the devil had only let women alone and taken us men, we should be pretty well off, for we only want a glass of wine and a cigar; and these are inexpensiv vices. But there's no end to a woman's wants after she's bitten the apple. I don't object to the deviltry. It's the expense that bothers me. There's no sense in a woman's sinning. It's all dollars," and, with this sally, Dr. Dobson wiped his fat face and haw-hawed with great good nature. He was one of those who took the ills of life complacently, and seven girls never diminished his gracious rotundity of flesh. There was a prospect of several marriages, and so the cloud had a silver lining.

"What shall I do?" wailed Cupples. "I dread the coming night. I must get rid of the little thing. I've tried the Binneys, but they won't touch it, blast 'em! Isn't there some one else?"

"I'm afraid not," said the doctor, "babies are too plenty. There isn't room for them; the table's full. It's too much trouble to look after them. The best thing you can do is to contrive some way to kill it off. I think it will be a great deal happier in another sphere where there isn't so much fashion; only one style of dress, I believe, the white robe; and so there's more time to look after the little cherubs."

"Of course its hard for poor people to have babies," said Cupples, "but I should think it would be a luxury for a rich man, as much as a picture, or marble statues, or fountains, or any of those things they spend so much money on. They can have servants to wash 'em and dress 'em and take care of 'em when they cry; and when they are clean and don't cry, what lovely things they are! Nothing in the world like it. Barnum's Museum can't compare to it for wonder and variety. Just see now how funny it looks; just look at those hands, those eyes; dear me, it's laughing; and the smile goes all over it. It's a very bubble of delight!"

"Abstractly speaking, you are correct," said the doctor; "babies are as pretty as pictures, statues, fountains, etc., but unfortunately they are not the style. They are out of fashion, and so had better be out of the world. There's enough of us old folks; and it's a mistake for babies to be born. Pity they can't have a little more discretion. All the time bouncing in upon us, and nobody wants 'em. If they would only arrive at years of discretion before birth, why, they wouldn't allow themselves to be born, that's sure. But babies are in such a hurry; they won't even wait for a suit of clothes."

Of late years the doctor was somewhat of a Malthusian, though no one ever greeted a new-born babe with more fervor than he did. But realizing that his profession was nine parts humbug, because nine parts of the sicknesses of people are humbug, and have to be cured by humbug, he couldn't help talking it occasionally, though at heart no one was more kind and faithful. If it were necessary to lie to a patient he could do it with the utmost sincerity, and even enthusiasm. At the same time he was ready to tell the truth if it were available, though he acknowledged that there wasn't so much fun in it.

"There's a good deal of comfort," he would say, confidingly, "in a lie well stuck to. I almost always believe my best lies myself. They sound so nice that I hate to deny 'em. I believe the truth because I have to. I believe a lie because I want to; and there's a mighty sight of comfort in having your own way."

Cupples was discouraged. He didn't really like to kill the baby, and he was afraid there was no place in the wide world for it. If he only had money, he'd gladly take it; and so many people had money and could do a good thing, and be made happy by it, and yet "they wouldn't, confound 'em!" growled Cupples.

"Isn't it so, doctor? Don't people make themselvs miserable by their selfishness? I wish I was rich, how happy I'd be. I'd make a home for every poor devil I could find."

"I don't know, Cupples," said the doctor, "you'd better not try it; I'm afraid you'd shut yourself up like a turtle. Riches don't seem to improve anybody. I'm not worth a cent, and don't mean to be. I spend my money as fast as I get it. I don't want to keep the horrible stuff. Why, if I had a bank account, my flesh would dwindle and I would be as dried up as a mummy. It's the death of a man to be a millionaire. It makes him a ghost. Gold, gold, gold! what a robber it is—and yet how we hug it! You'll have to take the baby where we are all going to, Cupples."

"And where's that?—to the graveyard?" groaned Cupples.

"No; to the poorhouse—worse still," said the doctor, with a tragical-comical look. "Go to Billy Stubbs: he'll tell you what to do."

The doctor turned away, for he was beginning to hav some compassion for the baby, and he felt in duty bound to get rid of it. It is a poor investment as the world goes to have any sympathy for those who can't take care of themselvs. Give it to those who don't need it, and then it won't be wasted. You'll be sure to get it back just in the nick of time, when you don't need it. In that way our sympathies don't cost anything, and what a help they are, what a beauty they giv to life. Be ye wise as serpents—towards others; and harmless as doves—towards yourself. That is what Christ meant, isn't it?

But the day was hurrying on. The baby had not secured a lodging. Cupples was greatly perturbed. Another night of torture was impossible. Billy Stubbs was now his only hope, and to him he hastened.

CHAPTER V.

BILLY STUBBS.

Billy Stubbs was devoted to three things—Shakspere, his pipe, and the bar. He was a brilliant lawyer, intensely interested in every case he took up, whether a murder case or a dog case. He knew Shakspere by heart, and often declared that the myriad-minded was a vastly better fountain of law than Blackstone. He greeted Cupples from the midst of a cloudland that almost stifled the latter, so that he could hardly speak.

"What's the matter, Cupples? You look like a ghost. Committed murder? Well, giv me a big fee and I'll make it out justifiable homicide; or insanity, if you prefer that way out of it. No? Has a mad dog bit you, then? Put the damages high. Dogs don't stand any chance nowadays. In fact, we'd almost as lief kill one as a man. What? Not even hydrophobia? What in the world is it that makes you look so much like the devil? You out-Herod Herod."

"It's a baby," gasped Cupples.

"Do you meditate a slaughter of the infants?"

"I've only one to dispose of," said Cupples, "but I'm afraid that'll be the death of me."

"Explain," said Stubbs; and Cupples gave a vivid account of his night's experience and his unsuccessful efforts to get rid of the baby.

"Then you don't want to keep it?" said Stubbs.

The look of horror that passed over Cupples's face at the suggestion convinced the lawyer that there was no such refuge for the wandering elf.

"Do you know anything about a baby?" asked Cupples.

"No," said Stubbs, "I only see them occasionally on the street, and they look mighty pretty. I should think it would be fun to hav 'em round."

"Try it," said Cupples. "Try it; let it roar in your ears all night long, let it kick and thrash in your arms, let it master you like a hurricane, and then see how you like it."

"Oh," said Stubbs, tragically, "then

> "You may as well go stand upon the beach
> And bid the main flood bate his usual hight;
> You may as well forbid the mountain pines
> To wag their high tops, and to make no noise
> When they are fretted with the gusts of heaven.

"I suppose the baby's a regular Shylock? Did it get a pound of your flesh?"

"I should think it did. Look at me."

"Ah, indeed," said Stubbs, "you don't look as if

> "Your bosom's lord sat lightly on its throne.
> Sharp misery hath worn thee to the bones."

"Tell me what to do," said Cupples, despairingly.

"Well, let's take a smoke and talk it up," said Stubbs. "I was in hopes it was a murder case. I haven't had one for a long time, and I'm rather anxious to sup on horrors. I hardly know what to do with a baby. They are troublesome things, and we can't shoot 'em. The fact is, nobody wants a baby till it's grown up. Now, if this one was sweet sixteen," said Stubbs, taking a long whiff and rolling it in glittering folds to the ceiling. "I'd take it off your hands in a minute; for if I couldn't do anything else I'd marry it. I'm rather anxious to marry, but, dear me! I can't spend time to find out which one I like best. You've a job on your hands, Cupples. I think I'll have to charge you about fifty dollars to get you out of the scrape."

"Dear me," said Cupples, "I haven't a dollar in the world."

"Well," said Stubbs, "I'll trust you. Remember, when you get rich out of this investment, you must give me ten per cent. A girl is worth five hundred dollars before she begins to dress; what she is worth after that no fellow can find out."

"All right," said Cupples, dubiously.

"I'm one of the overseers of the poor. I'll give you an order and you can take her to the poorhouse."

"I hate to do that," said Cupples; "it must be an awful place."

"Oh no," said Stubbs, "it's a perfect palace. Why, we appropriated thirty thousand dollars last year to fix it up, and it must be gorgeous. There are only three inmates, and we pay a thousand dollars a year each for their support. They live on the fat of the land. Why, the best thing a man can do nowadays, Cupples, is to be unable to do anything. Better be on the pauper list than own all the bank stock in E——. The moment you get to the poorhouse you are a millionaire. Fact, Cupples. I've got the figures for it, and figures never lie. No, never," said Stubbs, "unless it's a woman's."

"Is it so?" said Cupples. "Is it such a nice place? Have you seen it?"

"Oh, no," said Stubbs, "I haven't seen it. I'm paid a thousand dollars a year to look after it, but all I have to do is to draw my salary. But the money is spent—I know that. We appropriate it. It goes out of the treasury and never comes back; and there's enough to make that poorhouse a paradise. The baby will be perfectly happy, and grow up like a princess."

"Well, I'm glad of that," said Cupples. "I'm glad that so much pains is taken with the poor folks; they need it bad enough. Dear me! if a man's poor, what comfort can he take in life, unless he has enough to eat and wear, and a good home? We who are able to work can stand a little starvation now and then; but those who can't ought to be well taken care of. That's what I call religion. Give me the order and I'll go right over this afternoon. I'm much obliged to you, Mr. Stubbs."

Billy wrote the order with a smile that was childlike and bland, and gave it to Cupples with a ringing "God bless you." Cupples was all aglow to think that Government was so full of parental affection.

"Why, it beats the church all holler," said he. "The world isn't so bad, after all. Thirty thousand dollars for three paupers, and a thousand dollars a year apiece besides. Why, that is charity. No wonder it's the greatest of all the virtues. Faith and Hope can't hold a candle to it. It's too bad I've got to die when I get through workin'; I'd rather go to the poorhouse than to heaven. I'd live as well, and, what is better, I'd get rid of the psalm-singing, which I think must be an awful bore. Three meals a day is preferable. Thank God! the little baby's safe. There's a place for it. Of course it'll hav a servant to wait upon it. I've a good notion to apply for that situation myself. I believe I could earn more than at my trade. What a godsend the baby is, after all."

Cupples told the good news to his wife. He borrowed a horse, and made arrangements to go right after dinner to the poorhouse.

How Cook is Appreciated.

From the Middletown, N. Y., Daily Argus, of Jan. 10th.

The audience that attended Rev. Joseph Cook's lecture at the Methodist church last evening was a very large one—at least fifty per cent larger than would assemble should he ever visit this village again.

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

CAPACITY FOR PAIN AND PLEASURE.

I desire here to call your attention, my indulgent readers, to a noteworthy fact.

Man and the lower animals are capable, through their nervous structures (systems, so called), of enjoying but a comparativly very small degree of physical pleasure, even under the most favorable circumstances; and, as a rule, the keener the enjoyment, the briefer the possibility of its continuance.

How few pleasures there are which can compensate a man for even the relativly slight pain he often experiences in twenty-four hours from a raging tooth!

What pleasure on earth can compensate a man for the frightful agonies of sciatica in its most aggravated form?

How very few among us ever pass a year without being compelled to endure acute physical pain of some description! Are we not constantly subjected to the liability of frightful accidents on every hand?

Can you name any pleasure to counterbalance the agonies of the poor wretch scalded to death by hissing steam, or lapped by tongues of lurid flame, in the railroad wreck, or the burning factory?

Add to the frightful chapters of accident and disease the atrocious tortures inflicted by man upon his fellow, and upon the brutes, by fire and sword, by the thumb-screw and the rack, by the fagot, starvation, thirst, the whip, the goad, and, above all, by the ghastly, unspeakable horrors of the vivisecting-table, and you hav a sum total so monstrous, so vast, so utterly diabolical, that the mind of the intellectualist sinks in immeasurable horror before its contemplation. And this, the mild-eyed guides to heaven assure us, is the work of a tender and loving father, who marks even "the sparrow's fall!"

If this be God's work, tell us, O beneficent and mild-eyed guides, what would a devil do?

DOES FATALISM ENCOURAGE WRONG-DOING?

I hear some one ask, "What would take the place of conscience as a check upon immorality, were man to abandon it as an exploded myth?"

I answer, "Fear of the loss of one's self-respect, that reward which inevitably follows the performance of every noble act; the belief that to 'do as you would be done by' (provided you can so believe), conserves to your best advantage in the long run, and a code of just but severe laws, which, unlike the present miserable system of bribes and legal dodging, should mete even-handed justice alike to the penniless vagrant and the arrogant property-holder."

Personally I am of the opinion that conscience prevents little, if any, crime; it is after the committing of the offense, and not before, that "the still, small voice" is heard, if at all.

However, my business as an expounder of, and seeker after truth (a "Truth Seeker"), is not to moralize upon the good or evil attendant upon a belief in Fatalism, but to discover if it be true, and hence, if conscience be only a bug-a-boo springing from the misconceptions of man's uncultered intellect.

My mission in these pages is not that of the moralist, but rather that of the zealous searcher after light; nor do I myself believe error can ever be other than baleful in its effects upon man, taken as a whole.

IMMORTALITY.

To be immortal is to preserve forever, either partially or entirely, one's identity, including partial or entire recollection of the past.

Forever is a very long time. Were you to assure me that I am going to exist throughout any period comprised within the possibilities of the science of mathematics, the conception, however vast, would yet fail to completely overpower my intellect.

When, on the other hand, you tell me that I, who commenced my infantile, individual career less than a century since, am to liv on for myriads of eons of time, and that at length, having attained an age to which that of the universe itself, in its present form, were less than is the bulk of the minutest grain of sand as compared with the whole vast desert—to tell me that, even then, I will hav made absolutely no progress toward the termination of my career, must certainly appear to me a proposition containing much of the extravagant in its composition. Does it not seem far more probable that that which had a beginning as an individual will also hav an end as such? Is not the circle the true emblem of eternity? Must not, then, that which extends infinitly forward extend necessarily infinitly backward? Hence, is it possible that that should possess immortality whose birth was marked by time?

If not capable of immortality, man might, nevertheless, exist, as an individual, for any number of ages which it lies within the power of figures to express, any period not absolutely illimitable, and still be denied the prerogativ of immortality.

We frequently hear persons assert that they would not desire eternal life, even if constantly happy! This remark indicates, in those who make it, either defectiv reasoning power, or a cursory consideration of the subject in hand, since it is entirely evident that oblivion forms the neutral ground betwixt pain and pleasure. Hence, any conscious existence in which pleasure, on the whole, preponderates over pain, is to be desired (even though the amount of both be excessiv), for one most still be gainer in the end; the reverse, of course, being true of any existence in which pain predominates.

I am convinced that a highly-developed philosophical mind would, if offered its choice between oblivion and the certainty of a future existence (either temporary or eternal), unhesitatingly decide in favor of oblivion.

I myself would consider such an opportunity to choose as the greatest good-fortune that had ever befallen me, and select oblivion.

The reason is obvious, and its logic irrefutable. It is this. In this world (our sole criterion for judging of good and evil) we find evil vastly in the ascendent; he who rashly claims that, in this life, virtue triumphs over vice, is but a philosopher of the closet, who, in his child-like simplicity, pictures mankind to be as honest as himself.

Like old Diogenes, searching with his lamp, far and wide, for that rara avis, "an honest man," should the school-man go forth into this dark world to learn full soon of his egregious error! Theory is but poor stuff when opposed to fact. By what right (casting aside the flummery of scripture) do we judge another life will be better than the present? That we wish it so is natural; that hence it must be so is folly.

The chances are, therefore, that if there be a future life it is no better than this, and who, but a fool, would assume so great a risk when the odds stand thus heavily against him?

INSANITY.

To attempt to draw a line between sanity and insanity would be as futile an effort as to establish the precise line of demarkation between the colors of the rainbow, or between a sound, a noise, a tumult, and a pandemonium.

It is in the highest degree improbable that an absolutely perfect brain (and, hence, mind) ever existed upon this planet. Certain it is that all those with whom we hav ever come in contact are unbalanced (or "cranky," as the term goes) in more respects than one. You cannot recall having ever, during your life-time, met with anyone totally devoid of all weak points.

All men, then, are (to a greater or lesser extent) insane; i. e., deficient in the power of forming correct judgments upon all subjects. (What myriads, for example, are "cranked" upon the subject of religion!) We do not, however, commonly term these oddities, and peculiarities, insanity, when exhibited under this mild form of mania, but simply "eccentricities." When, however, they become so strongly marked as to endanger either the safety of the patient, or that of others (as well as when the dementia reaches that stage wherein the patient is nearly or quite unaware of the true nature and effects of his or her acts), then we prudently label them "insane," and, properly enough, incarcerate them in an institution provided for that purpose, where they can neither injure themselvs nor others.

In concluding my remarks upon this subject, I desire to enter my most earnest protest against the outrageous abuses which disgrace the government of so many of the asylums for the insane in America!

AFFINITY.

Chemistry informs us that certain substances, when placed in juxtaposition, possess what is termed affinity for one another; or, in other words, their particles exhibit a tendency to intermingle, or to coalesce. Still other substances (for example, oil and water) cannot be made to mingle, though they were shaken or mixed together for a thousand years. The chemistry of those sublimated particles composing what is called the mind in no wise differs from that of the grosser particles termed matter.

This fact requires no further demonstration than that elsewhere given under another caption.

Whenever two persons of opposit sex meet, this mingling, or non-mingling, must necessarily ensue.

So extraordinary is this affinity in certain exceptional instances that when their glances meet for the first time, a delirious thrill passes between them, and both feel unerringly that their earthly destinies are fixed, each within the other. This is known familiarly as "love at first sight."

In all the vast chain of cause and effect, this exquisit and beautiful chemistry of the mind presents, perhaps, the most attractiv and fascinating field for study and contemplation to the philosopher, the psychologist, and the physicist.

How crude, in comparison to this marvelously perfect and unerring effect of particle upon particle, sounds the senseless jargon of the Christian priest, who fills (or, more correctly speaking, disgraces) the pulpit of to-day, and who prattles of a God without form, and of spirit without substance. Verily, this is the dotage of religion.

BEAUTY.

Material beauty is an objectiv or outward expression of harmony. The more highly, and therefore more sensitivly, organized the mind, the more acutely will it enjoy material beauty, through the medium of the senses. The most beautiful (i. e., attractiv) object in the known universe to a normally conditioned man is a beautiful woman, and vice versa. Then follow beautiful animals, flowers, nature in her grandly various forms, ocean, and the starry vault. Music, poetry, sculpture, and painting are all likewise expressions of the one divine principle of harmony which is the synonym of happiness.

FAITH.

Faith is the arch-enemy of reason. It is the great sheet-anchor of religion. It is "the key-stone of the corner." It is the bridge connecting brainless ignorance with brutish crime. It is the arrant torturer who lit the fagot and stretched the rack. To hav faith (in the theological meaning of the term) is to implicitly believe in the truth of any dogma, without previously having tested it in the crucible of reason, and upon the word of another.

Priests inculcate faith, because they know full well that within it lies the jealously guarded secret of their mighty power. Base, crawling things will ever shun the light. Disfranchised thought is man's best, truest friend. Abjure blind faith. It is the bandage that would blind men's eyes forever to the light of holy truth.

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

Ex-Reverend or Re-Reverend.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It seems to be the general custom of both Liberals and orthodox to speak of those who hav removed, or hav been removed, from the Christian pulpit for advancement in knowledge beyond the fossil creed, as ex-reverend. Against this irreverence, on the part of Liberals at least, I earnestly protest. No one can be an ex-reverend unless at first a real reverend, and if any one having been in the pulpit was ever truly reverend, or worthy of respect, then instead of becoming less reverend, or unreverend, by reason of better knowledge and better motivs, or better teachings or actions, such a one becomes doubly reverend in the esteem of all whose respect is worth having.

Without being a stickler for titles, or a craver of vain appellations, I nevertheless urge the right application of epithets when used, and especially insist that cognomens and nick names be not accepted by any, whether the so-called Infidel, or ex-reverend, which were some time derogatorily invented by their enemies, who themselvs hold a better claim to the terms.

Let it be suggested that at regular organized assemblies, where whilom reverends hav part, they be reordained by the voice of the people to the work of ministering to men the religion of reason.

A RE-REVEREND.

The Parson and the Poor.

From an English Paper.

The Sheerness Guardian givs an account of an application for out-relief made to the Sheppey Board of Guardians by an agricultural laborer, aged sixty-two. The poor old fellow said he was unable to do much work, and his wife earned a trifle every week. The applicant having retired, the Rev. R. H. Dickson suggested that an order for the house be offered; he considered the board might save £300 or £400 a year if all the out-relief was stopped. In reply to a member, Mr. Hooker said the man had some furniture in his house, and his wife only earned sufficient to pay the rent—2s. 6d. per week. The Rev. Mr. Dickson said that people were not destitute as long as they had furniture in the house. When he resided in Lancashire, no relief was allowed to anyone as long as there was a chair in the house. Mr. Prosser: "Then you would not giv a man a loaf as long as he had a chair to sit on?" The Rev. Mr. Dickson: "No; that is what the poor rates are for. This is not a benevolent society." Mr. Prosser: "If you do that in Lancashire, do you think we ought to do it in Kent?" The Rev. Mr. Dickson: "Yes, I do." Mr. Prosser: "Well, then, I don't. Here are two old people, for instance; would you break up their little home and make them come into the workhouse rather than grant them a little out-relief? The wife earns the rent, and if we giv some relief it will help to buy the food." After further discussion the applicant was granted 2s. 6d. per week.

The Rev. R. H. Dickson, we see from the "Clergy List," is minister of Eastchurch, his income being put down at £1,724. And this is the "guardian" who sought to deny the broken-down agricultural laborer upward of three-score years of age, the relief of half a crown a week.

Skepticism in Harvard College.

The Rev. Dr. Sunderland, late chaplain to the United States senate, said in a recent sermon, as reported in the Republican, that "out of 1,400 graduates of Harvard College in the last ten years the records show only two skeptics." If so, those two fellows both liv in Washington, for I know one of them, and he informs me about the other. Furthermore, he assured me several years ago that more than half of his graduating class of 1875 were skeptics, and only about half a dozen of the other sort intended to become preachers.

Paine's Birthday

Will be observed by the Freethinkers of New York city on Tuesday evening, the 29th inst., at German Masonic Temple, 220 E. 15th street, under the auspices of the Bennett Liberal League. There will be speaking by S. P. Andrews, Mr. Adams, S. P. Putnam, and T. B. Wakeman if he returns from Boston in season to attend. Music will be furnished by Miss Leona Leonard and others. It is also proposed to found a Paine Historical Society, and the initiatory steps will be taken on this evening.

The expenses of this meeting are defrayed by contribution. Heretofore it has happened that a few hav borne almost the whole burden. Those who feel like helping may remit such sums as they can spare to the treasurer of the Bennett League, G. E. Macdonald, in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

It should need no urging to bring out a full house on occasions of this kind, and it is hoped that every friend of Paine who can will attend. The Bennett League proposes to celebrate Washington's birthday with a sociable, and we should all get acquainted so as to enjoy that event. The evening of the 29th will be a fitting time to do it.

Our Annual.

The size of this book, and the general pressure of holiday work on printers and binders, has delayed its completion somewhat beyond our expectations, and very much beyond our desires; but it is now finished and ere this reaches THE TRUTH SEEKER readers will hav been sent to the several hundred who hav already ordered a copy.

We will not boast of what we hav done further than to say that we are willing to compare it with any Almanac, lay or religious, that has came from the press this winter. The mechanical work is superb, the contributed articles are of remarkable ability, the selections judicious, and the engravings, taken from Mr. Bennett's four volumes of travels, artistic and instructiv. The story of Big Jack Small has that Western flavor that made the Overland Monthly and the Californian such readable periodicals.

We presented a copy to Mr. Putnam the other evening, and in the morning he gave this as his opinion. It must be borne in mind that Mr. Putnam is a poet as well as philosopher:

"This is a charming book. It is a good omen—a sign of the times—a record of the past and a promis of the future. It's a bird's-eye view of the world, of great events, and a glimpse through the beauty of art into the golden age of humanity. It is a book for Liberals to revel in—a kind of a new Bible—the horoscope of civilization, a pen-picture of progress. It is full of information, thought, impulse, and the things that delight the eye. It's engravings are superb; its articles, selected and otherwise, valuable and entertaining; its facts and figures quite enchanting, while they giv the plain, unvarnished truth. It is a book that one likes to look at, handle, con over, and dream over, if at any time, amid the discouragements of life, he wants an outlook into the universal advance. It is a household necessity for every Liberal. It's a good thing to pass around among old fogies in order that they may see how fresh and bright this planet is when dressed in the hues of scientific knowledge. It would make a brilliant missionary pamphlet. It is freighted with good tidings. I hav no doubt it will convert many a Christian to the new faith. In fact, in the publication of this Annual, Liberalism now 'takes the cake.' It's no longer simple bread and butter, but 'a thing of beauty and a joy forever.' I do not see how any Liberal can resist the privilege of having this book upon his table. It is an artistic, poetic, and intellectual treat. It appeals to the sense and the imagination. In it lies the gold coin and the loose silver change of truth. Even the baby will enjoy its handsome cover, and the oldest head will find plenty of enlightenment within. Several thousand copies should be scattered all over the country; it's a magnificent campagin document; a magazine of light artillery that will do most effectual execution. I shall be much mistaken if every subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER does not send at once for this beautiful Annual. In every respect it is one of the neatest, brightest, and most quickening books issued from the Liberal press; and, to conclude, I must say that the story of 'Big Jack Small' is one of the best I ever read. It's full of nature, truth, humanity, and wit; and shows that under certain circumstances a minister can swear much more effectually than he can pray."

After that we need say nothing more. Every one who sees this Annual feels an irresistible desire to purchase it. Even if not read, it is good for the eyes just to look at it. We do not see how anyone can get through the year, and experience the fulness of its joys, unless they hav "The Truth Seeker Annual" where they can consult it at least once a day. If purchasers are not satisfied that they hav 25 cents' worth, we will take it back and giv them a quitclaim deed to our golden mansion on St. Paul avenue.

The Immortality of the Positivists.

One of our city dailies reports a remarkable meeting of London Positivists on the last day of 1883. The followers of Comte form a strong society in that city, and on this occasion Mr. Frederic Harrison, the president of the English Positivist Committee, addressed a notable gathering.

In the nomenclature of the Positivists, the first day of the year is "The Festival of Humanity," and the last day of the year is "The Day of All the Dead." The services on these occasions are to testify appreciation of the continuing influence of the great and good men and women who hav passed away. Positivists believe in no other immortality. For them, the dead liv only in the good works they hav done. "A kindly word, a clear thought, or a brave result," said Mr. Harrison at the meeting, "does not die with the body which was associated with it." It livs on for the benefit of all the world besides. "It must act on the brain, the heart, the will of others, and so must pass into the immense consensus of human life." And so it is said that Shakspere, Raphael, Dante, St. Paul, and Homer enable us to think better, to liv better, and to enjoy better, hour by hour. The spirit of man, according to the Positivists, goes out with death, like the flame of a torch, never to be kindled again here or elsewhere. The deeds done in the body, and the spoken and written words, remain to encourage, to enlighten, to strengthen those who come after, constituting the collectiv weight of the past, surrounding posterity "like an atmosphere, training them like a parent, and administering to every form of activity. There are in our calendar of great men," continued Mr. Harrison, "558 names, of all of whom the same thing is true in a certain degree. The continuance of their works and lives in us is true of 5,000, of 50,000. It is true of every just and worthy life that has ever been passed on this earth. It is true, not of every life alone, but of every hour and every act of every life. The kindly word, the clear thought, the brave resolve, does not end and die with itself, does not die with the body which it animated, with the life of which it was the expression. For good or for evil, the inevitable chain is set in motion. By every word we hav spoken, by every act we hav done, we hav helped to accomplish some decision, to clear a problem, to form a character, to strengthen or to weaken some brother or sister. I know not what recording angel may hav written them in the Book of Life, or the Book of Death; but I know that the least of our words and our thoughts has its own inevitable sequence, must act on brain and heart and will of others, and so must pass into the immense consensus of human life. It may be good and great, it may be slight or infinitesimal, but it is always there; and civilization itself is made up of these infinit drops. As every flake of snow that falls on the crest of Mont Blanc passes on from glacier to rill, and thence to river, till it falls a drop into the sea, so does every life and every act of every life contribute to the sum of humanity."

But the Positivists do not believe that the evil which men do livs after them, to anything like the same extent as the good. "We are apt," said Mr. Harrison at this meeting, "to associate the memory of the past with the great men alone. But all hav a common life with us, and are with us, and around us, and in us; all but the worthless and the evil, whose worthlessness and evil die away in the tide of progress and of good."

Mr. Harrison's address at this meeting took the place of a sermon, and a fine body of musicians closed the proceedings by the performance as a cantata of George Eliot's grand poem, "Oh, may I join the choir invisible." The speaker said the author was his friend, and the friend of many in the audience. She was in profound sympathy with their movement. "The poem expressed the inmost belief of her great brain. He heard those words uttered over her coffin when her body was laid to rest in the grave, and they seemed as if they issued direct from her cold lips and silent heart." But music must be added to poetry, because it needed the indefinitness of the art to clothe an almost infinit idea, and this idea Mr. Harrison urged his hearers to bring home to their minds on the Day of All the Dead, the last day of the year, by thought, by poetry, by voice and instrument.

Thus runs the account of this meeting of the disciples of a man greater than Jesus Christ, who numbered more followers in his life time than Jesus could count before the crucifixion, and who was as much his intellectual superior as Frederic Harrison is of an English curate. Positivism has a following in this country which, if not large in numbers, is mighty in brain. The society of the Religion of Humanity was composed of Positivists. Positivism is constructiv in its philosophy and in rebuilding the religious structure of society after the disintegration of Christianity may play an important part. In this country its tenets are less rigid than where its founder's influence is more felt, and although personal immortality is denied, yet the infallibility of the system is not strictly maintained. Positivism, which lets the immortality dogma rest till something is definitivly settled pro or con, may easily become an important factor in answering the Christian conundrum of "what will you giv in its place?" Mr. Wakeman's Higher Integration, in which the continuity and solidarity of the human race is the chief insistance, is Comte's philosophy modified by him to suit American principles. Pure Comtism does not find the soil of this country congenial to its growth. But its constructiv phase is worthy of study by Liberals, as out of it will ultimately come great good to Liberalism. Mr. C. P. Somerby is one of the first, and perhaps the clearest headed, of the American Positivists, and he may furnish us an exposition of the constructiv side of the philosophy at no distant date.

The Union of Protestants and Catholics.

If the following from the New York Sun of last Sunday had been written for the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER it could not be more pertinent and worthy the attention of Liberals. Mr. Dana plainly sees the direction of the theological currents, knows the shape the coming struggle will take, and is awake to the danger:

"In the February number of the Century magazine, just published, there is a suggestiv article in the editorial department discussing the possibilities and probabilities 'of a reunion in the future between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant bodies.'

"The discussion of that subject in such a place is peculiarly significant, because the Century, though a secular periodical, has always been conducted with special reference to meeting the tastes and steering clear of the prejudices of the average Protestant public. Its original editor, Dr. Holland, was a strict Calvinist, and its chief owner and manager, Mr. Roswell Smith, is a prominent and pronounced Presbyterian.

"The Century takes for its text the celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of Luther's birth, which, it says, brought to view the fact that 'the religious reformation of the last four centuries has not been confined to the churches of the reformers. A constant reformation in disciplin, if not in doctrin,' it thinks, 'has been going on in the church,' assailed by Luther.

"So premising, this Protestant exponent shows that bonds of sympathy are now joining Catholics and Protestants to a degree which, twenty-five years ago, could not hav been anticipated. It sees especially the growth of a feeling that these two bodies of Christians need to be united to resist the onset of modern Infidelity.

"As the conflict with Materialism and Agnosticism has been waxing hotter and hotter,' to use the words of the Century, 'it must hav become evident to intelligent Protestants that they hav in the Roman Catholic theologians a strong body of allies, with whom they ought to maintain friendly relations. It is not Protestantism, nor the papacy, nor Calvinism, nor Trinitarianism, nor any other secondary Christian dogma, that is now on trial,' it says further, but 'whether there is any such thing as religion—whether there is a conscious God, and a life beyond the grave, and a free will, and a moral law.'

"The Century also renders just tribute to the exalted ethical standards of the Roman church, and to its courage and consistency in maintaining them against all efforts at compromise. It acknowledges, for instance, that 'the Roman Catholic doctrin and practice respecting divorce are much closer to the law of the New Testament than those of the Protestant churches hav been.' It speaks also of the 'earnest effort at the present time to bring the practice of the Protestant churches a little nearer to the Roman Catholic standard.'

"All this is in line with what we hav repeatedly said. It becomes more and more evident every day that the civilized world is dividing into two classes, the believers and the unbelievers, the Christians and the Agnostics. The separation between them is not like that between Catholics and Protestants, which is caused by difference of dogma and ecclesiastical practice, while both agree on fundamental points of theology. It is total, for modern unbelief does not attack portions of the faith only, but rejects the whole, abandoning faith altogether. In its view Christianity has no more supernatural basis than the mythologies it succeeded.

"The ultimate union of all the forces of faith and theology to meet such an enemy, steadily increasing in numbers and audacity, seems therefore to be inevitable. Protestantism needs alliance with Roman Catholicism to enable it to stand up against the current of modern skeptical thought. It requires the aid of the more steadfast and uncompromising body the more because many of its leading exponents, and some of its chiefs, who hav hitherto been most trusted, are opening the gates of the fortress of faith to the hosts of Infidelity. Even if they are not doing that, they are parleying with them, when there can only be war to the knife between the two.

"There is no possible compromise between theology and modern Infidelity. The church must understand that at the beginning. One or the other must triumph, and its victory will mean the utter destruction of the conquered. While this great contest is going on, intestin divisions must weaken the army of faith, and we are not surprised that intelligent Protestants desire to heal them."

The Episcopal Dilemma.

The politicians allege that the Democratic party can always be relied on to commit some blunder that shall giv victory to its opponent. The Protestant church authorities appear to be endowed with the same faculty of putting out the wrong foot first. Had Assistant Bishop Potter held his peace and let Heber Newton quietly pursue his way, his church would be in a much stronger position to withstand the assaults of heresy. When accused of holding doctrins incompatible with an exercise of common sense and in conflict with nineteenth century knowledge; of making a fetich of a book which the best scholarship has definitly decided to be largely legend and myth, Episcopalians could hav pointed to Mr. Newton, probably the ablest among their clergy, as an example of Episcopal progress, and might, with some show of reason, hav maintained that their church was the one best fitted for our times. But the prompt application of the muzzle, and the confession of the bishop that the heretical sermons were damaging to Christianity, hav destroyed the opportunity and placed the church in the unequivocal posture of hostility to any change of meaning being made in the Bible. There can be but two reasons for this course. Either the Episcopal authorities reject the scholarship of such eminent Christians as Davidson, Smith, and others, or, accepting their conclusions, are unwilling that the laity should know upon what a slender thread hang "everlasting" things. The first impeaches their fitness to be biblical teachers; the second, their honesty.

It cannot be denied that the drift of modern thought is away from the church and in the direction of truth, consistency, and close investigation. Geology, astronomy, and the other physical sciences hav taken from both the Old and the New Testaments all chance of their supernaturalism being accepted by the generations of man to come, but especially has the character of the Pentateuch been destroyed. Recognizing this, Mr. Newton, with courage almost sublime, has undertaken to rehabilitate the Mosaic account in the estimation of those who would fain cling to the ancient standard, by separating the inspired from the uninspired—the wheat from the chaff. It is needless to say he has found but little of the wheat. The pile of chaff has grown wondrously large as he has proceeded, and, had he been allowed by his bishop to winnow Exodus and the remaining books, its colossal proportions would hav staggered the whole Christian world.

As has been generally remarked by the press, Mr. Newton's sermons contained nothing new. He but clothed in rhetorical silk and satin the skeleton hanging in every educated minister's closet. His bishop has forced him to again lock it up, but through the quickly closed door the congregations hav caught glimpses, and will not be satisfied with anything less than a full examination of the contents of the closet. The shadow of doubt has been thrown across the path of thousands who hav hitherto reposed in quiet ignorance. The curiosity of the indifferentists has also been stirred, and many of them will attend the next theological clinic. This part of the world, at least, is filled with educated, thinking people who will not rest satisfied or convinced with doctrins against which their reason and common sense rebel, and the number of outspoken Freethinkers is every day increasing. No doubt it was these facts that led the bishop to shut the closet door so suddenly.

This course is a perfectly consistent one for the church to adopt. From the beginning she has had recourse to repressiv measures whenever her interests hav been endangered. Formerly the seal that silenced heretical lips was death. It is not so now, and we would not go so far as to intimate that even the bitterest of Mr. Newton's brethren would like to see him burnt. His graceful submission has obviated the necessity of so mild a punishment as an ecclesiastical trial, with its unfrocking possibilities and disagreeable publicity. The Episcopal church, and indeed the whole of Christendom, owes much to Mr. Newton's suave forbearance and gentle courtesy toward his task master, the assistant bishop.

But although the conduct of every one in this interesting proceeding has been consistent, has it been safe? The church must sometime deal decisivly with this heresy. Every one concedes that it is weakening faith in revelation and veneration for the scriptures among the church people, and unless the church is content to see her supporters gradually dwindling away she must do something to prevent it more effectiv than the mere closing of one man's mouth. Stopping is not recanting, and Mr. Newton threatens to present his views in print. There seems to be but one way—go back to the methods of the Catholic church. Compile an index expugatorius, dig some dungeons, and drive again the stakes. The case is urgent, the call imperativ. Something will hav to be done, or the Episcopal articles relating especially to the authority and inspiration of the Bible will hav to be revised. And the authority and revenues of the church would suffer in consequence. So would the ministers.

Mr. Chainey's Lectures.

The lecture by Mr. George Chainey in this city last Sunday was acknowledged by the comparativly few who heard it to be one of the best Liberal discourses ever delivered. It was the universal verdict, also, that Mr. Chainey had never spoken better. The speaker is able, earnest, and fully competent to entertain an audience of intellectual and thinking people. He is not one of the sort who repudiate their own brothers in the family of humanity, but accords generous credit to the labors of all in that portion of the field of Liberalism in which they hav chosen to work. He is a radical and an iconoclast, because he believes the removal of the false to be equally as important as the building up of the true, and he has no word of censure for those who go even farther than he. They hav their work to do, and so far as he can see that they are in the right they hav his hearty cooperation. The Liberals, and even Christians, of this city who do not attend the course of lectures which hav been begun cannot but miss a treat such as they are not often afforded an opportunity to enjoy. Those who had not heard Colonel Ingersoll for some time left the hall last Sunday night with the belief that George Chainey was the most eloquent speaker on the American platform.

These lectures certainly deserve a generous support. We hav here a speaker of recognized ability, and in every way worthy to bear the standard of our common cause. Liberals here will not hav done their full duty unless on the occasion of Mr. Chainey's next visit to New York the hall is filled and he is sent back to his home happy in the possession of the moral and material reward of honest endeavor.

Franklin, Junius, and Paine.

From the Investigator.

MR. EDITOR: My venerable friend, Elizur Wright, will pardon me, I am sure, for asking you to publish the following extract from a private letter just received from him:

"What struck me the moment I first read 'Junius Unmasked' was the fact that while Franklin and Junius (whoever he was) were, from the first letter of the latter up to 1784, rowing in the same boat, neither ever mentioned the other. And the more I think of it, the more this fact strengthens your position that Junius was Paine; and I think that Franklin knew it. Both men could keep secrets."

I will only add, that no mention of Junius has ever been found in Franklin's writings, nor in Paine's, except in some anonymous essays, namely, in "Casca's" letters to the English "Crisis," 1775-6, and in "Prospects on the Rubicon," 1787, which was detected to be his in 1793, after the publication of the "Rights of Man," by the similarity of style.

Yours, W. H. BURR.

A New Party Not Desirable.

When the Liberal League Congress spread out a platform for a political party, until it contained work enough for a thousand years, more or less, it seemed to favor the formation of such party. The organization was wisely postponed, however, and the propriety of forming such an organization left an open question, which is now a legitimate subject for discussion. In the new platform the demands of Liberalism hav been largely increased, or multiplied; but, whether few or many, the work to be done is the same, to wit: the change of public sentiment; and the main question now is, Will a political organization assist or hinder the work of converting the people to Liberal views? It does seem to me that it will only hinder. There are but few to engage in it, and there is such a lack of backbone and so much indifference among Liberals, that not one in ten can be depended on to do anything. And the few cannot afford to divide into two parties—one in favor of, and the other opposed to, political action—and do battle against each other, as such parties always do. So the party would be small indeed; and what is more contemptible and useless, as a means of converting the people from superstition and error to the truths of Liberalism, than a small political party to be defeated at every election? While a few who are in the right can wield a mighty moral influence against error and wrong, yet when organized into a political party they hav no political power or influence whatever, and their moral influence is very much diminished, or entirely destroyed.

Thus it was with the antislavery cause. About the year 1840 a small political party was formed, called "The Liberty Party," which divided the antislavery forces into two parties, and the contest between them was lively, sometimes fierce, for a few years, when the political party died for want of support. Then, in 1848, the "Free Soil Party" was formed, which lingered in a starving condition for a few years, and then died a very natural death. In the mean time the people were being slowly converted to antislavery views by moral suasion; and in 1856 the Republican party was formed, and was defeated year after year for several years. Finally, by eliminating from the platform every antislavery sentiment, the non-extension of slavery alone excepted, and appealing to the people to save the territories for themselvs, instead of allowing them, or any of them, to be occupied by slavery, the party was successful in 1860—not that the people of the North had been converted to antislavery, but they wanted the territories for themselvs and their posterity. Even after the rebellion was inaugurated, there was made a great effort to save both the Union and slavery, and it was not until it was found that both could not be saved that slavery was abolished—not on account of antislavery sentiments, but through spite at the South for making it necessary to interfere with the divine institution, which slavery was held to be by the church and clergy both North and South.

Yes, political-partyism was a hindrance to the antislavery cause, and resulted in civil war.

The temperance reform was a grand success for fifteen or twenty years, while moral suasion was the means employed, but for the last thirty years or more—ever since the effort to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicants by political action began—it has been a failure. To load a reformatory movement with a little political party, to be defeated every year on the day of election, is not adapting means to ends. It only excites prejudice against the movement, whatever it may be, and thus hinders progress.

Education and enlightenment, by moral suasion—the only means of correcting or changing public sentiment—can be carried forward much more easily and much more efficiently without the unnatural appendage of a little, dying political party. A political party movement is always premature until there is a large minority ready to vote for it—and when will there be a large majority ready to vote for the League platform? Generations will hav come and gone before even a "respectable minority" will be ready to do so. We are told, to be sure, that the old parties are corrupt, but what of it? One or other of the great political parties must manage the affairs of government, and do the stealing for a long time to come—that is, until the people hav been reformed, and this must be done by adapting means to ends, by teaching the grand truths of Liberalism, individual and collectiv responsibility, etc., instead of substitution and atonement, and no merit in good works. And we can never hav a party better than the people, or a good party without good people to make it of. And it would seem to be the business of the League to work reform among the people, and as this can be done only by enlightenment and moral influence, it would be a very unwise step indeed for the League, or Liberals, to take on the burden of a petty, insignificant political party.

We hav now no God to create something out of nothing, stop the sun in his course, or advance reform by extraordinary means, and Liberals ought to know this and work in harmony with nature, reason, and common sense. The day of miracles is past—or, rather, never began. WM. WATSON.

Has Man an Immortal Soul,

AN ENTITY, SEPARATE AND DISTINCT OF ITSELF, WITHOUT HIMSELF?

If this were conceded, believed true by all, and indisputably certain, mankind would soon abandon any creed that did not find acceptance with the reasonable portion. In fact, no creed would be necessary or tolerated, if pretended miracles and revelations did not interfere, which did not reasonably apply to all. And all knowledge obtained, or obtainable, would hav to be thus applied, or reason would oppose. Then true democracy would result, both in the moral and social life of mankind.

The Christian, we think, egotistically claims that his Bible is of divine authority, that it teaches immortality for man alone, that no immortality would hav been taught or known had it not been brought to light through his gospel by Christ; that his creed and belief, squared by this authority according to his arbitrary notions, applies to all, and is the only one for all, reasonable or not, and that the question is settled, arbitrarily, in the affirmativ.

Other bibles are believed, and creeds to match, with other rites and ceremonies; the same egotism prevails that they only are right, and miracles and pretended revelations are recorded in their support.

A person without any knowledge of either, if such you once imagin, but having capacity to learn and judge, without prejudice or partiality, and who should then be taught the world's history, its creeds and religions, would be quite likely, it seems to us, to reject the Christian Bible and creed as least worthy of belief.

No other question is so significant; all other questions and interests of man hav been regarded as insignificant, in comparison, by the thinking world. It is the only all-absorbing question for intellectual humanity, and has been in all ages; and it has been, perhaps, most absorbing, even sometimes terrible, to the ignorant. It is just as unsettled, uncertain, and absorbing to-day, with Bible and creed believers, and ignorant humanity, as in any period of the world's history. Fortunately for the happiness of the human race, knowledge is dissipating superstition, and any miracle or pretended revelation from infinit to finite is being regarded as impossible.

For the purpose of stating reasons adverse to the Christian claim, we take the negativ of our question. We will affirm our position, and then seek the analogies and examples. Let us precede our affirmation of the negativ by a single assumption. No intelligent person ever lived, or ever will liv, who believes an effect can be produced without a cause; there are no unbelievers in cause; so Infidel, Atheist, Spiritualist, Materialist, and Agnostic are mere terms of description, no more a reproach, so far as intelligence and morals are concerned, than the term Catholic, Protestant, and the numerous division of sects. In fact, the first-named hav little to fear from an unprejudiced comparison in intelligence or morals, either in history or at the present hour.

Man as an individual and race is wholly an elementary being, the same as other animals, possessing no material outside of the known or recognized elements of matter, and showing no exclusiv advantage in his general organization or animal structure, or in the workings of his combined powers, except in amount of brain, and in the use of spoken and written language and its derivativs; and these, we aver, do not prove an entity outside of himself. They are no more remarkable in themselvs than the singular powers possessed by other animals, many of which he does not possess; and some of the powers in other animals exceed his to a wonderful degree, and prove as much for their immortality as do his for man's.

Fire as an element seems to be the only activ principle, the principle of life. As without it there would only be death, so, too, if that be true, it is the only principle of action, motion, or force, and no exhibition of thought could be made without it, for none would exist. There could at least be no animal existence without heat. No known combination or structure seems to be sensible to feeling or pain without a degree of heat.

The evident nature of the angle-worm to retreat when suddenly exposed to the light, or turn to avoid touch, is certainly as low an example of reason as readily occurs. And let us be patient with the word reason. If we look simply at the force of fire in melting the silver, gold, and iron of the mines, and even the granit rock, so when it upheaves mountains, or overthrows or burns cities from its igneous craters, and when we see what power it makes, what speed obtained through steam, how rapidly and powerfully it moves in electricity, we hav some exalted notions in its favor as an element.

If we change the view, with what horror do we witness it, in our burning buildings where friends are imprisoned, or pierced by its flames, and when our scalded flesh cleaves from its animal fastenings.

Stop here! or extend the description to all known applications of fire, its uses and abuses—what do we really know about it so far, or what is its combination or principle? Take away combustible matter and where is your fire? Where is there any demonstration of its force or power? Do we begin to realize what the sun is, burning without consuming, heating and giving life to the universe, without wasting away?

We all admit that it is the only known source of fire and heat (except that bottomless pit, which is not yet geographically located). Do you now wonder why such throngs of earth's finite creatures hav worshiped it as their god? Does it not shame the worship of a mere myth or ghost, a flitting, inconceivable nothing?

That the sun was made simply for the use of this little earth by day, the moon and stars simply to beautify the night for earth, mere surroundings, lamps, and decorations, is so absurd in the Christians' Bible account of creation that a man loses some intellectual force and power for nothing when he contradicts it. Contemplate with vast humility what this whole system we call ours would be without the sun, and see what a puny interest earth holds in comparison, and proportionate to its existence, no matter how vital to earth alone.

Matter might as well be annihilated without the sun. Life certainly would be, and what body and immortality would be left? Imagin a Christian future. If an entity exists there, once connected with a body here, it must hav all the senses it had here, or it could not feel punishment or happiness, would not know it ever existed here; could not see anything, hear, smell, taste, or feel anything, without organs or some combination of parts; would hav no fire or life, and would, if without all combination existing here, be simply inconceivable. If there is a real desire, if there is a real, sincere belief in reunion with the lost dead, it is to see them, know it is they, know they hav an organization to feel, that they do feel, know, and realize the same in us, that both realize and feel each other's presence; and they must so know and feel to appreciate the joint happiness—in fact, must know we exist again.

If that is true, will the old dead always be old and infirm, will the young babe always be young, and never know its mother, never learn to appreciate or know happiness from pain? Where is there any natural proof of these or any other pretended facts or speculations growing out of the thousand unanswerable queries therewith connected?

How can we conceive anything about the state of the dead living again hereafter, without assuming we shall again see their forms, hear their voices, be where they are now, and feel they are there, and know and feel where we are? We must locate and be somewhere to do that, and can conceive nothing if it does not hav tangible qualities, hav substance and form, and necessarily include material elements influencing there as here, and the body and life would hav to be reunited to do that. There is no life without fire, or heat, hence the sun must furnish the reunion.

Is there any reasonable proof that ought to convince us, without doubt, of such a future, or any other imaginable future, without something to aid or impress our natural senses, some knowledge—if any exists, from the dead?—and we ought to be able to find any existing knowledge of that kind, and some tangible, material proof.

No sensible person can hav, or claim reasonably to hav, such proof of his own knowledge—that is, such knowledge as applies to, or is derived from, any undisputed fact. The claim is founded on miracles, revelations, and assumptions. As vitally important to sustain the affirmativ is what is called the new dispensation. Paul is here regarded by the Christian world as infallible authority. He disbelieved in the resurrection until his remarkable conversion.

Let us examin his new position, and hear his more remarkable philosophy and explanations. Corinthians i, 35–53, show enough, perhaps, to demonstrate its absurdity:

"But some man will say, How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come? Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die. And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain: but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body. [Did he intend to say God gave his own body to every seed, or that the seed was given a body, for its soul or immortal germ?] All flesh is not the same flesh; but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial, but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars, for one star differeth from another star in glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power. It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. And so it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul [the best linguists say soul meant creature]; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which was spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterwards that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we hav borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I show you a mystery: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality."

What is this entire statement but assumption, without a particle of proof? He raises new questions without answering one. How does he answer the question, With what bodies do they come? He simply spreads incorruption on corruption, and immortality on mortality, like a magician, presto, change, and interprets nothing, answers nothing, to our understanding. What a conglomeration it is, raising up the old dead body and clothing it, for "this mortal must put on immortality," after declaring "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," and "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die," and "thou sowest not that body that shall be." Again, "As we hav borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Who, or what shall? Why, the natural body, according to his own premises and explanations, assuming and contradictory as they are.

He declares there are two bodies—one natural, one spiritual; one Adam a living soul; another Adam the Lord from heaven, a quickening spirit. Was it or not the first Adam's body he says was changed by putting on incorruption, or the last Adam's that was made a quickening spirit, and, being already a spirit, needed no change, and as the Lord from heaven, ought not to? and how could he expect anyone to believe that spreading incorruption and immortality on a dead mortal, natural body (which was the very question he set himself up to answer) would make it a spiritual body? It inherited nothing—corruption did not inherit incorruption; flesh and blood did not, and how did he get incorruption on the old dead body, or immortality, according to his own showing, or giv them or us any idea of a spiritual body, which means matter? The mind cannot conceive a body without sensing that meaning, and a spiritual body is a contradiction in terms. There is no word or idea in which Paul hints at any immortality in the natural man, or until after death.

"Thou fool," etc. It would undoubtedly hav been coarse manners for them to hav reiterated those two leading words to Paul, which seemed to fit him quite as well as them. He ought to hav felt foolish when his ranting incoherency had died out on the air, and echo only answered what his hearers' good manners did not. He had proved nothing, convinced nobody in the Jewish world, but enveloped himself in such a fog he could not see out, and his followers never hav since.

His interpretations, and parallels between bodies and the natural and spiritual world, satisfied John Wesley, not only that man could become immortal at death, or the resurrection, but that beasts would also.

That Paul so believed is seen by the parallels he is running, and which are superfluous, senseless, and inapplicable if he did not. He defines different kinds of bodies, flesh, and glories. Man in flesh as the central figure among animals, as the sun is in celestial bodies. Beasts next, but less brilliant, less central, but still a milder light, as the moon. Fish in shoals and birds in flocks, generally smaller bodies less central (intellectually), but in numbers like the stars, in a double sense, and an occasional one very bright, much more intellectual than others, and seemingly more glorious by such intellect, as some stars, appearing to our sight as small bodies, almost rival the sun in sparkling brightness. We see in all this a rather ingenious analogy and finely put example, visionary as it is. "So also is the resurrection of the dead." It is sown in corruption (not the sun, moon, and stars), but the flesh of man and beasts—"it is raised in incorruption." All flesh corrupts at death, and the term it applies to both. Paul being a Jew from infancy to conversion, knew well the belief and historical declarations of the Jews, that "man hath no pre-eminence above a beast." Again: "As the one dieth so dieth the other," etc. He is now illustrating that statement to Jews who believe it, which the non-resurrectionists believed when he was one of them, and might gain their attention and friendship back if he embraced all animals in the new dispensation. If he really believed in man's being changed to exist in the future, why is it not reasonable that he believed beasts might be?

As a true and trusty interpreter, if he did not so believe, he ought to hav contradicted what he knew was believed, "that man hath no pre-eminence over the beast." If he did believe in a change of their flesh, what had the Lord from heaven to do about the beast, as it is not claimed he died for the beast, or brought life and immortality to light through the gospel for them?

Paul was in a new field; there had been no general belief in a resurrection, no plan of endless happiness on one side, or endless misery on the other, mapped out or believed in; no gospel plan; no plan of salvation; and better than all the rest, no plan of general damnation; and we concede he did remarkably well considering his chances.

He was sadly mistaken about life and immortality being brought to light through the gospel by Christ. In every age among the heathen—not among the Jews, as Paul borrowed from the heathen—some hav fancied a future existence, and our American Indians, when America was first discovered, had a tradition they thought was old as the sun, and believed that they and their faithful dog could occupy happier hunting-grounds after death. I hope my Christian friends will not claim that this tradition of the noble red man came from their ancestors, who had heard Paul preach when he was out West. The Elysian fields are older than the gospel, life and immortality hav never been brought to light yet, and the fancies and gods of pagans furnished the new one for Christians. There was a full supply on hand always, according to and from the earliest Jewish history. If there was no immortality known until Christ's time, it had, of course, been hidden or it could not hav been brought to light, and no immortality having been known for the future, so none was promised or expected. But what of the dead between Adam and Christ? How can they gain the advantage never given them, and for which they died unprepared?

Paul well knew the doctrin of sin-offering; the belief in the sufficiency of the sacrifice of goats and bulls; in the blood of beasts, and how sacred it was to the Jews. His new doctrin, and his way of advocating it, were taunting to the Jews. They were told their sin-offerings were useless and vain. It contradicted what had become so engrafted into their minds by centuries of observance, that it is no wonder they felt insulted and abused instead of being converted. Such an innovation seemed basely rude, and they knew the doctrins taught, as put forth by Paul, were false, and the matter was made worse by the spirit and aggression with which it was declaimed. The same spirit toward the Jews, from whom they borrow all the pretense they hav of being connected with Christ, or coming to him through any foundation, is arrogantly assumed and sung by modern Christian poets—save the mark!—in this case:

"Not all the blood of beasts, on Jewish altars slain,
Could giv the guilty conscience peace, or wash away it stain.',

To get a new and direct insult to Jewish and perhaps Catholic priests, a new rhyme-slinger, stealing the idea of the lines cited, and some of the words, has this:

"Nor bleeding bird, nor bleeding beast,
Nor hyssop branch, nor sprinkling priest,
Nor running brook, nor flood, nor sea,
Can wash the dismal stain away."

How Paul ignored the practice, and excuses this lapsus ominusis of the dead from Adam to Christ, when he declares, "And the times of this ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent" (Acts. xvii, 30). God winked spiritually, not materially, of course. Did Paul believe sin-offering was a worthless plan while he was an unconverted Jew? And did not the Jews hav reason to despise and hate him for his changeable, whiffling course, and for his arrogance and taunts in telling them they were ignorant, and that if they would own up and follow him God would wink at their past ignorance?

The fact seems to be that Paul was naturally tyrannical, self-conceited, and assuming. As a ruler among the Jews receiving adulation and homage, he probably became so in a more offensiv sense even than was natural for him. He was also visionary; he quarreled with his companions even, and dictated to his old associates.

Whatever he touched he made aggressiv. Hear him: "For as I passed by and beheld your devotions [another worship of an other God], I found an altar with this inscription, To the Unknown God. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you" (Acts. xvii, 23). What knowledge had he of any God, superior as a God, or knowledge superior to theirs?

Any one taking the trouble to read what he says after this arrogant assumption will see he had none.

Their inscription "To the Unknown God," just fitted his description as declared to them. They, perhaps, knew more about their unknown god than he did about his, any way. And how did they take his arrogance? "And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked, and others said, We will hear thee again of this matter." Did they think Paul was trying to prove his God a material being, Hence, not unknown. It looks that way, but there is one thing certain in the account itself, he did not convince anybody what he did mean, except a man and woman who followed him off, and perhaps he failed to satisfy them (Acts. xvii, 32–34). We repeat, Paul was as visionary as Swedenborg, and we are highly conscious of rectitude in disbelieving his system.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1, as part payment for your valuable paper for next year. I hope to be a subscriber as long as I liv. During the term of my trial subscription, I hav given your paper to many of my Jewish and Christian friends, of whom two will soon become subscribers to your paper.

Three months ago we organized a Liberal League of Oregon, and hav meetings and lectures every Sunday at 2 and 7 o'clock P.M. Discussions on the Bible hav been carried on by Prof. Channey and Dr. (of divinity) West. If the latter, for business' sake, is not yet convinced of the allegorical meanings of the holy Bible, he is the only one in the audience. The meetings are attended by one of the archbishops. He has expressed his views on Christianity, as I hav understood him, that in religious affairs we must not care for scientific evidences as long as it does us good, that we need a little Jesus to lean on, and a future life to look after. As an example, he brings his hope to see again his son, who died several years ago. In vain, bishop. Who once died will never be seen again, no matter how beautiful the hopes are.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to ask you a question for you to answer through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Do the Mormons claim to hav a Bible written wholly by Joe Smith, or do they found their religion on the the Old Testament?

We hav a debating school among the farmers. There are only two Infidels, and fifty Christians, and the question of polygamy is coming up. Your paper has done good work in the last four years in our neighborhood. It has cost me $11.50 and it has done $500 worth of good. When I read them I pass them along to my neighbor. The paper has make a wonderful change around here in people's religious opinions. If everyone would distribute THE TRUTH SEEKER among his neighbors it would do more toward spreading the light. H. B. BECKER.

[The claim made for the Mormon Bible is that it was found by Joe Smith already engraved on gold plates. Where those plates are now is not known. It is pretended, we believe, that they are in the Tabernacle at Salt Lake city. Much of that Bible is a repetition of the Old Testament. The Mormon god is the Jehovah of the Jews. Their polygamy also receives its sanction from the examples of Old Testament saints.—ED. T. S.]

MR. EDITOR: I had a letter written to you (in my mind) asking you to leave out the "Odds and Ends," and fill it with stories for little children. But I found some people would listen to the reading of the "Odds and Ends," and thereby get a little radicalism, who would go to sleep over the sound reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Then again I thought how annoying it must be for an editor to hav so much proffered advice. I once came so near being an editor myself as to set type, sweep the office, and roll the printer's ink. I worked for that brave little paper called the Vanguard, edited by Alfred Cridge, some twenty years ago. I wonder where Mr. Cridge is now. His wife was a sister of the late lamented Prof. William Denton. But thanks to you, with no advice from me, we hav a "Children's Corner." It is something to be thankful for and to be proud of. I feel like thanking J. L. York, Edwin H. Bartlett, and many others for what they hav written in favor of a "Children's Corner." We hav a little girl seven years old who is now glad to see THE TRUTH SEEKER come, and asks me to read the stories to her, and often wishes them read the second time. I again return thanks for that corner of our paper for my little girl's sake. A book called "A Kiss for a Blow," by Henry C. Wright, made a lasting and good impression on my mind when a little child. I wonder if there is a copy in existence now. I would like to see it again. My husband, Homer A. Billings, is enjoying the climate of southwest Missouri at this time. He has visited the colony of brave men and women at Liberal, and is very much pleased with the country and people. HELEN M. S. BILLINGS.

[The elder Cridge is, we believe, deceased. Alfred Denton Cridge, his son, is in California, whither he went a year ago last July, at the request of Mr Bennett, to help operate the stereopticon with which Mr. Bennett was to illustrate his lectures. On Mr. Bennett's deciding not to lecture as he came across the continent, Mr. Cridge elected to remain in California, and went to work upon a ranch. We hav H. C. Wright's "Kiss for a Blow" for sale, price 60 cents in plain cloth.—ED. T. S.]

HEIDENHEIMER, TEXAS, Dec. 20, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav long been a silent spectator to the struggle that has been going on between Materialists and Spiritualists, but a letter from Mr. E. H. Heywood in your issue of December 15th strikes me as something of a challenge or war cry to still continue the battle. I feel my incompetence to offer any new ideas, but by your permission I would like to make a few remarks on what Mr. Heywood has said. In the first place, the question is asked, "How does a two-and-a-half-year-old know what Psyche-Ceres means?" and after quoting what the little girl said, Mr. Heywood asks philosophers to "crack this quick nut." etc. Did it never occur to our friend that his little girl has probably heard her father use the expression a hundred times? And considering a child's aptitude for imitating older persons, may this not account for the wonder Mr. Heywood has discovered? If mind can possibly look "before and after," or if "memory extends back over the period of gestation." does it not seem a little strange that, out of the millions of children, fully as intelligent, probably, as Mr. Heywood's little girl, she should be the only one to say anything about it? And further, if "Paul the Christite" is to be cited as authority to prove the existence of a "spiritual body surviving the great irrational scare called death," why not also accept his teachings about the boss scare called hell? Mr. Heywood uses some strong language about Materialists in general, and Mr. Winter in particular, but can absurdities go further than for a man to attempt to offset the teachings of "the latest device of learned idiots called science" by quoting the sayings of a child?

Mr. Heywood never quoted a better thing than

"On earth there's nothing great but man,
In man there's nothing great but mind."

But must a man necessarily be a Spiritualist before his mind is capable of conceiving great or good thoughts? I hav been a careful reader of Mr. Winter's writings, and I can conscientiously acquit him of "proclaiming what he does not know."

I hav heard a great many attempts made to defend this back-action mind business, but this of Mr. Heywood's is certainly the most flimsy of any I hav yet heard. CHAS. L. GIBSON.

EAST RODMAN, N. Y., Dec. 25. 283.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2—$2.50 for another year's subscription, and the balance use as directed.

I send a list of names, containing only two or three so bigoted that they would like to be made popes of, that they might rule other people's thoughts and actions, and could upon a pinch become a Comstock or Guiteau. You may hear from them as they make their voices heard through the press sometimes, generally under an alias. I think Liberals hav no cause to complain of progress the last year. Conventions hav been held in most parts of the country, which hav been well attended. We lack places of meeting, and if Freethinkers would build halls in towns where superstition now controls such buildings, they (the narrow-minded) would soon realize their short-sightedness in diminished revenue and value of property. Liberals are a reading class, which rather incapacitates them for organizing in societies, etc., as they acquire a habit of thinking for themselvs, and become contented in their mode of acquiring knowledge. Fashion and popularity (the prime motors of church gatherings) hav but little weight with the mass of Liberals.

I enjoy the reading of both sides of a discussion, and believe THE TRUTH SEEKER to be the only journal that allows so fair a liberty on such a variety of subjects. A good share of the press of the country will not allow anything to appear in their columns except it is in accord with their particular views. The time will come that they will be obliged to let both sides hav a hearing, or go to the wall.

The discussion upon prohibition I hope will go on in a friendly spirit until the question can be disposed of in a satisfactory manner. The reading of both sides will wear off the sharp corners of prejudice, and intelligence take the place of bigoted intolerance. Reformers are apt to go too fast, and frequently bring on a destruction and calamity greater than the evil complained of. I believe the war in which slavery was abolished was a greater evil than slavery. Slavery was a dying institution the world over, and if it had not been for a few hot-headed fanatics upon either side, the question would hav by this time hav worked itself clear, and the scar of war would not hav defaced the fair escutcheon of this country.

If discussion goes on between orthodoxy and Liberalism in a reasonable manner, a war will be avoided. Men upon one side fighting for their rights, and bigoted intolerance for supremacy upon the other, would be such a war as history has seldom recorded. A few hot-heads upon either side could bring it on and engulf the more sober and thoughtful in spite of their protests. Giv us free discussion, then intelligence will be at the helm guiding us in the path of truth, shunning the rocks of ignorance. If the different policies of government or plans of administration were discussed honestly in every political paper, intelligence would again guide the bark of state instead of prejudice, as at present, the spoils being the real design of both parties, which instead of giving facts to the people, use every artifice to mislead them through their ignorance.

I agree with Mr. Winter, that as far as knowledge at present permits, we die and our bodies resolve themselvs again to ths elements, and are taken up as food for other things, etc., times without number, and the mind may be indebted in part to the refinement of materials passing through and through those changes, forming a brain of finer material, etc. Mind is an action or product of the brain. Brain ceases to act, consequently the mind ceases to exist.

Yours truly, M. E. Rose.

Westfield, N. Y.

Mr. Editor: Please allow me a few words on the situation. When the leaders of thought hav outgrown the superstition inherited from a bigoted ancestry, and are ready to admit that the sexes, like the source from whence derived, are interchanging; that interchange of sex is the organic law on which existence is founded, that the same law of combination that makes higher numbers of lower ones makes higher grades of being by combination of lower ones, and that the higher could not exist independent of the lower in either case, truth seekers will hav no trouble in finding the goal they are searching for. It is simply action balanced by reaction of the same element.

As long as women admit that they are a secondary creation of a supreme invisible myth, that the sexes are distinct entities, the one sovereign, the other subject, they should not complain that they are treated as secondary by males. The belief that the sexes are distinct from each other, that mind exists independent of matter, or that either does or can exist independent of the other, is the last expiring relic of the same superstition that made our little world the center of the universe, and as false as the effect of the belief has ever been destructiv. For proof see the past history and present condition of the so-called human family. In the foregoing I think may be found the reason why women are not announced as speakers in Freethought conventions.

Yours truly, J. Tinney.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed you will find a postal order for $5, half of which please credit to my subscription; the other $2.50 to a new subscriber.

Our League is having a sort of boom at present. We hav rented new rooms and fitted them up nicely, and hav started a Sunday-school, which so far has been a success. On Christmas day the ladies of the League gave a big dinner and a sleigh-ride to the pupils. In the evening a sociable was held, with a goodly attendance. John E. Remsburg gave two of his grand lectures here on the 4th and 5th inst. which created quite a stir among the dry bones of orthodoxy, and caused an old fossil of the Baptist church to attempt to answer him. But of all the silly, sophistical bosh I ever listened to, it was the worst. Everybody, even to his own brethren, was disgusted, and acknowledged that he hurt their cause more than he helped it.

Otto Wettstein has given our Mrs. Heddon some very hard Materialistic nuts to crack, but she keeps on trying to crack them just the same. She thinks she can never giv up the ideas of a "summer-land" and "spirit entity." Mrs. Heddon is a grand good woman, with an educated and cultivated mind, and we love her, for she is one of the mainstays of our League. But to our "Materialistic minds" the arguments she and other Spiritualists use hav but little convincing force when compared to the logical reasoning of such writers as Elmina or Otto.

Success to The Truth Seeker and its cause.

Yours truly, Dr. T. G. Rix.

Sunderland, Ont., Jan. 1, 1884.

Mr. Editor: An old Scotch gentleman called upon us the other day, just to leave us the compliments of the season—a merry Christmas and a happy New Year. After a time one of the family put into our old friend's hand our album of photographs, in the pages of which I had thoughtlessly (or, as my wife says, thoughtfully) placed the Truth Seeker picture of the Jewish Jehovah. As soon as the picture of His Majesty caught the old man's eye he exclaimed, "Ha, ha! Wha hae we here? Surely this mun be the de'il!." "It's not that," says I; "look again." He examined the picture carefully, and read the scripture passages at the bottom and with a look of astonishment exclaimed, "Gude be here! It's the ither ane—he's na' better than he's bonny—the less we hae t' da wi' him the better." As our friend left us, he took me by the hand, earnestly looked in my face, and said, "Aye, aye, yon's the ither ane; an' if he's na better gan he looks it maun be a fearful thing ta fa' inta his clootches. Far better for us a' ta lie still. It's the ither ane—I canna gan say it; there's bath chapter an' verse for't. Gude day, an' gan ye be a' as weel as I wis,' ye'll na be that ill."

Mr. Editor: Inclosed please find $2.50 for my subscription for 1884. I am pleased with the efficient and impartial course of The Truth Seeker, and while I wish you a happy new year, I also hope that your health and life may be spared for many years to bear the standard that was so nobly unfurled by D. M. Bennett, and which, after he has fallen, you so ably continue to hold aloft. May the bright star of The Truth Seeker never grow dim, is the wish of Stockton, Mo., Dec. 25, 1883.

Mr. Editor: Find inclosed $2.50 for The Truth Seeker for 1884. It is all the Bible I want in my house. It givs light to all inquiring minds, dethrones superstition, and makes man and woman grander and better. Christianity is giving way here fast. The mendicant has found out to his sorrow that the old fable is fast passing away. Hell has lost its terror, and heaven is bribe and fable. Oh, what a grand change has come over the people during the last two years! I can now speak my sentiments and be respected. Let those grand geniuses—Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Mr. S. P. Putnam, Mr. T. Winter, Mr. John Peck, and Elmina—go on with the good work. Truth is mighty and will prevail.

I am, dear sir, your friend, Riley Sherrill.

Spring Forge, Jan. 2, 1884.

Mr. Editor: I hav received everything correctly, and return my best thanks. "False Claims" is excellent; the "Agnostic Annual" also. Rejoice with me. I hav saved one soul, a young man, once a church and Sunday-school member. Oblige me with a sample copy for him.

Yesterday one could hav heard the thousandfold glories and hallelujahs of the priests and their congregations, thanking God for what he had done for them and for mankind; rejoicing and paying homage to those Jesuitic principles that the great cause of faith must be served with all means; that there are many churches to be built this year; that the poor heathen countries must be supplied with Bibles and missionaries preaching the eternal truth; that there is needed money, more money, infinitly more money; though thousands starve and perish in misery already, these parasites on the body of mankind still continue robbing and deceiving the ignorant for the church's sake, who, as Goethe says, has a good stomach, has already devoured whole countries, and has not yet been overfed. "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," said one priest yesterday. Indeed it looks like it all around us. Go and number the suicides and crimes; number the inmates of the prisons and insane asylums; number the outcasts and prostitutes of our large cities; behold our civilization; behold that struggle for existence, that battle for life little short of wholesale murder, and then, Christians, compare it with even the infantile conception of heaven, as your "revelations" contain it. Hav we approached in the least that state of happiness and peace as the millennium shall bring it? If not, whence your indifference, your stagnation? whence your resistance to progress? There is much, very much, to be done yet. There is no time for praying and going to church.

Yours, F. W. Opp.

Columbus, Kan., Dec. 12, 1883.

Mr. Editor: Please allow me a few lines to departed worth. I hav waited to know the when, where, and how of his death. I first saw him in western Ohio, as one of the editors of a radical monthly and a lecturer. He was at one of my lectures on the human brain, and I saw his greatness and goodness on his magnificent head, his fine and impressible organism.

I saw his young, gifted, and promising wife then, twenty-eight years ago. He appreciated my labors and encouraged me. He was full of hope, enthusiasm, energy—fraternal and genial.

He was one of the most spiritual and imaginativ (very essential in the true sense to a scientist) naturalists I ever knew.

I see him inspired by great intellectual, esthetic, and moral forces, as a poor boy in London, as a teacher, as an orthodox preacher; then as a Liberal naturalist and Spiritualist; and at last, and above all, a Scientific Humanitarian. I hav for the past thirty years traveled with him (mentally) to read the letters, lines, pages, and books of Mother Earth's history, through the wilds and jungles of Texas, the plains, ravines, gorges, canons, mountain sides and summits, from the Mississippi to the Pacific; and the thousands that hav been instructed and liberalized and inspired by his fluent and eloquent tongue.

At last I, only the other evening, sang by request his "The Devil is Dead," which, if not yet true, he has with his truth-laden tongue badly wounded him.

Again and finally must I see him where white man never (?) before trod, in wild and savage New Guinea, lying there dying, his nerve-force exhausted, and at last that grand organism succumb and stop its work. The scene is over. It overwhelms me with grief, and copious tears flow—flow for the dear stricken wife, to whom he was so much, and for all his bereaved friends and the world is so much his debtor. His "Our Planet" immortalizes his name, and had he lived its superior would hav appeared.

Ardent votary of science, truth seeker, lover of humanity, noble, exalted manhood, Brother William Denton, farewell. J. H. Cook.

Charlottetown, R. I., Jan. 2, 1884.

Mr. Editor: Please find inclosed $2.00; $1.75 for W. Reade's "Martyrdom of Man," and 25 cts. for the "Agnostic Annual." Hav read your card and order filled with thanks.

Over thirty years ago, by the merest accident in nature, I obtained the reading of the Rev. E. E. Guild's work, "The Universalist Book of Reference," which had the effect of converting me from an ignorant and bigoted Methodist into a Universalist. I consider him a very lucid and cogent writer and reasoner. His "Pro and Con" is also forcibly convincing. He certainly wields heavy and effectual weapons for the destruction of religious superstition.

Although I hav never enjoyed the benefit of even a common school education, as this incoherent letter will convince you, still, since becoming a scriptural Universalist, I hav used my illiterate and humble influence to sustain and advance that theory. But why should not an earnest truth seeker avail himself of the increased facilities which, by the recent developments of science and learned historical research, are now afforded him.

My position now is that our Universalist and Unitarian half-brethren should be accorded great credit for the important part they hav performed in breaking the crust of religious prejudice and superstition, and now stand in somewhat the position of the advance, clearing the way for the progress of the grand army of freedom. But I hav now arrived at the deliberate conclusion that, being much in advance of the orthodox masses in intelligence and much better posted in the late developments of science and ancient religious history, at present the majority, at least, occupy much the same position in respect to their real conviction as the Rev. E. E. Guild; for as I view the subject it appears next to impossible for a sane person to proceed a certain distance in the path of investigation without plainly perceiving that the entire system of supernatural religion is nothing but fable, tradition, and myth. I conclude that the signs of the times are indications of a thorough sifting and scrutinizing of the different religious systems, and I perceive the best authorities hav come to the deliberate decision that if their system is to stand the test and become a permanent factor in the religion of the future they must retain and maintain with persistent zeal the doctrin of the supernatural origin of Christianity. But, reasoning from my premis, I conclude they must soon be compelled to abandon and retire from this old fort. What then? Can they possibly discard and abandon their former precedents and recede and fall back into the open arms of the holy mother church? It is now generally admitted that orthodox Protestantism in its present confused and divided position is utterly incompetent to hold its ground against the encroachments of the papacy; their only alternativ, then, must be to join the more advanced Liberals, and I cheerfully anticipate their adoption of the latter course, as they hav not far to travel in that direction. They will be likely to appoint Col. Bob Ingersoll generalissimo, with Beecher and Bradlaugh as lieutenants, and when all the Universalists and Unitarians, with all their sympathizers, hav unfurled their banners and are marching in the ranks of the grand army of the true sons of liberty and freedom, the final victory cannot be doubtful. Let us console ourselvs with this pleasing hope, should we ultimately die in despair. Since my conversion from the belief and fear of the orthodox hell, from which in my youth I hav suffered intensely, I hav used all my humbe influence and ability for the advancement of Liberal views as upheld by Universalists; in this position The Truth Seeker found me.

I am fully impressed with the conviction that our exertions cannot be employed in any other cause so important to the benefit and happiness of humanity as the destruction of that hydra-headed monster, priestcraft, kingcraft, and religious superstition; and although having attained the ripe age of seventy-two years, and contemplating on the radical changes and improvements which hav happened within these years, I am encouraged to persevere until the end in this—to me—labor of love.

As regards the present status of Liberalism here, we may be supposed to be about in the same position as New England was forty years ago. No doubt there is much latent Infidelity in Charlottetown, and a lecturer on that subject would be likely to hav a large audience. But the clerical foxes are very jealous about pursuing the geese for themselvs, and until their power and influence are circumscribed our progress must be slow. In conclusion, I hav presumed that the perusal of a discussion between a learned Dr. Murray and my humble self on the pro and con of scriptural Universalism might, with this incoherent epistle, afford you some leisure hours' amusement and will direct the pamphlet to you; and with the compliments of the season, and ardent wishes for your success in your laudable labors, I remain Yours respectfully, Jas. B. Gay.

The Crow and the Fox.

A master crow, perched on a tree one day,
Was holding in his beak a cheese;
A master fox, by the odor drawn that way,
Spake unto him in words like these:
"Oh, good morning, my Lord Crow!
How well you look; how handsome you do grow!
'Pon my honor, if your note
Bears a resemblance to your coat,
You are the Phœnix of the dwellers in these woods."

At these words does the crow exceedingly rejoice;
And, to display his beauteous voice,
He opens a wide beak, lets fall his stolen goods.
The fox seized on't, and said: "My good monsieur,
Learn that every flatterer
Livs at the expense of him who hears him out;
This lesson is well worth a cheese, no doubt."

The crow, ashamed and much in pain,
Swore—but a little late—they'd not catch him so again. —La Fontaine.

An Angel Unawares.

The snow was coming down in great flakes, soft, fleecy, feathery. Pure and white it lay on the ground, and gradually made little heaps, and drifted into wide waves, until it covered field and meadow, like a great mass of white blankets. It crept all over the tops of fences and houses, and wreathed the bare branches of trees, until they seemed transformed from grim skeletons to graceful fairies.

Star-shaped, octagon, triangular, bead-like, crown-formed, in myriads of styles, fell the flocculent crystals.

"How beautiful it is!" exclaimed little Nelly Moore. "What is it, papa?" and the little girl turned from the window where she had been watching the falling flakes, to the chair where sat her papa reading his favorit newspaper.

"The snow, dear? Why, nothing but vapor. A peculiar state of the atmosphere produces the falling snow. It is indeed beautiful, my child. It is like the character."

"What is character, papa?"

"O you little inquisitiv! Character is quality—it is that which makes the man, woman, child. This pure snow is a fair emblem of character unsoiled—a pure character. By and by the wind will blow, the mud will spatter upon it, and it will become so dark and disagreeable that you will see no beauty in it, and this may then be likened to character stained by wrong-doing, crime, evil thoughts, and wicked deeds. But there goes the dinner bell. Come, I am hungry."

As the two passed into the dining room, they heard a timid rap upon the outer door, and immediately after the loud voice of Bridget, "Ye're the fourth one that's been here this day for summat to ate! An' d'ye think Mr. Moore is hirin' me for foor dollars a wake to cook for the likes o' sich vagabonds as yese? Faith, I blave ye're jist fixed up so on parpose to draw upon me sympathies!"

"No, I ain't, nuther!"

"Bese ye Cat'lic?"

"No; I'm 'Merikan!"

"Where's yer other shoe?"

"I hain't got no other shoe."

"An' yer stockins?"

"Hain't got no stockin's whatsomever."

"Is it the truth ye're spakin'?"

"It's as true as I liv and breathe, and hope to die. I hav not had anything to eat since yesterday morning. Oh, I am so hungry!"

"O Bridget, can't he hav some dinner? He must be nearly starving," and little Nelly's eyes were suffused with tears.

"I'll not be cooking for these yere wagabones no more. I'll lave first—so now!" and Bridget flounced into the pantry and shut the door.

"O papa, here is the most forlorn-looking object you ever saw, and almost starved. Can't he come and hav dinner with us?"

"Isn't he rather tattered and dirty?" inquired Mr. Moore, as he surveyed the pitiful-looking boy.

"But he is clean inside, papa. Can he not come to dinner?"

Mr. Moore, very indulgent to his only daughter since her mother's death, consented that she should hav her way, and the little ragged urchin was soon seated at the table with himself and Nelly. Inquiry elicited that the boy's name was Harry West, that he had no home, that he was an orphan since two years, without money or friends.

"Where do you sleep nights?" inquired Nelly.

"In coal-yards, under piles of lumber, cuddled up beside door-steps—anywhere."

"O papa! And we so comfortable! What makes some hav so much, and others so little?"

"That has puzzled many an older head than yours, child."

Harry ate ravenonsly until his sunken eyes glowed, and the hollow cheeks grew rosy. At length he drew away from the table, aud taking his tattered hat, he bowed awkwardly, and said: "I thank you awfully for my dinner. I was starved, I think, nearly."

"Where are you going now?"

"I don't know."

"Would you be willing to work if I could find you employment?" inquired Nelly's papa kindly.

"Will you try me? Golly, I'll work all day for such a dinner as that, sir."

"Well, my boy, I think I'll try you a week or so."

And he did try the boy a week, and a month, and found that he had in him the true metal, and was eager and willing to do all that was in his power.

"Who knows, papa, that Harry is not an angel that we entertain unawares," said Nelly, one day.

"Possibly. I don't know that he has not as good a right to be an angel as anybody else, if he is serviceable to the human race," replied her papa.

Time passed on, and Harry, still in Mr. Moore's employ, grew toward manhood. A few years at school, and association with Nelly and her friends, corrected his bad grammar and smoothed the rough edges of his life. He was useful to his employer, honest in his dealings, kept good hours, observed the laws of health, and contracted no bad habits.

One night he was restless and could not sleep. He lay thinking of all the past until long after midnight. Suddenly he fancied he heard a slight noise in a room below. Rising, he cautiously descended the stairs, and in a moment found his surmisings were correct—there were burglars in the house.

Seizing his revolver, he instantly sought the chamber of his benefactor. Stationing himself at the door he waited developments.

Soon a dark lantern flashed upon the scene, and he was confronted by two bold and dangerous-looking men.

"Advance another step and you are dead men!" And as Harry spoke Mr. Moore, now thoroughly awakened, turned on the gas.

The burglars saw the pistol and the determined face of the young man, and cowered.

Cornered as they were they could make no resistance, and with the aid of Mr. Moore they were secured and soon in the hands of officers of the law. They had packed much of the silver and some jewelry, and were about to enter the room of Mr. Moore when discovered.

Nelly, fast asleep, heard nothing of the commotion, but when told of it the next morning she turned pale with apprehension.

"There is no danger now," said her father, kissing her affectionately. "Harry has saved our property, and perhaps our lives."

"Did I not tell you, papa, that we might be entertaining an angel unawares when we took Harry in?"

"You did; and I wish I could reward him for his good service to us, dear."

"You can, sir," exclaimed Harry, "if you will, though the act requires no recompense."

He took Nelly's hand in his, and they both blushed and smiled.

"Oh, you want my Nelly! And what shall I do without my angel?"

"There will be two angels for you, papa," whispered Nelly, archly.

"Well, hav your own way, for your way is right, and is my way also."

ENIGMA.

I hav but one eye and that without sight,
Yet it helps me whatever I do;
I'm sharp without wits, without senses I'm bright,
The fortune of some, and of some the delight,
And I doubt not I'm useful to you.

I am welcome to all from cottage to throne;
There's scarce a condition where I am unknown;
I strive to do good, and I scarce can do harm;
Even music without me must giv up a charm.
I'm the joy of the weary, the hope of the sick,
And vain would I visit where sorrows are thick.
I'm a friend to the peaceful, a foe to all strife,
My presence is needful to keep you in life.
By chance you may find me as far off you roam,
But I ever am purest, and sweetest at home,
When life is all over and troubles are past,
May I be your portion forever at last.

Edward Bliss Foote.

From the Biographer.

This distinguished medical man, whose principal works are known throughout the civilized world, and who commands a more extensiv practice by the aid of the mails than any other physician in the United States, belongs to that stock the American branch of which was originated by Nathaniel Foote, who took the freeman oath in the colony of Massachusetts Bay in the year 1633. The Footes hav added numerously to the list of eminent professional men, statesmen, military and naval officers, and social reformers of both sexes, whose services to the commonwealth hav contributed very largely to American progress. That representativ of the family best known to-day. Edward Bliss Foote, a portrait of whom accompanies this sketch, is the son of the late Herschel Foote, a pioneer settler of the Connecticut Western Reserve in Ohio, on which he was born in 1829. His health was exceedingly delicate during his infancy and boyhood, which interfered with his attendance at school; but as he was a lad eager for information and quick of perception, he had acquired a large amount of miscellaneous information before entering, at sixteen years of age, that dirty paradise of ambititious boys like him, the printing office. He was at home there directly, and his health improved during the two years of his first occupation, wherein he became not less apt in the easy expression of his thoughts than at setting type. This facility of composition led to his removal, in his nineteenth year, from Ohio to Connecticut, where he assumed the editorial control of a weekly newspaper which soon became the largest published in the state. Three years afterwards he removed to New York for the purpose of enlarging the influence of his pen; and while pursuing his duties as associate editor on a prominent weekly journal, became acquainted with a medical botanist with whom he formed an acquaintance which resulted in his being able to combine literary work with the study and practice of medicin, and eventually to become a physician, the leading ambition of his life. As assistant to an "irregular" practitioner, he found abundant opportunity of employing his pen controversially, and acquired singular dexterity in this way. Having given up his editorial position in New York and purchased an interest in the Morning Journal, the first morning newswaper published in Brooklyn, he devoted much of his time and energy to writing for that journal. Two years of application to medical study and daily newspaper toil as well were as much as his constitution could bear, and the time had come when one or the other of these occupations must be given up. The decision was soon made, and Mr. Foote became co-partner with his friend of the botanic school of medicin. His practice was remarkably successful for two reasons—because founded on an accurate acquaintance with physiology, hygiene, and medicin, and because of his extraordinary natural adaptation to his work. He remained in partnership until 1857, and, having cured a professor of the Penn Medical University of Philadelphia of pulmonary disease, was induced by him to become a student of that institution. He was graduated an M. D. in the year 1860.

The young physician began his career as an author of books in 1853, when twenty-nine years of age. His first work was "Medical Common Sense," a radical and daring production, which was hailed by advanced thinkers and philanthropists throughout the country as a decided advance in the direction of emancipating the people from the domination of narrow-minded men, who regard a simple treatment of anatomy, physiology, hygiene, and the art of healing as an invasion of their close rights. This intolerable pretension Dr. Foote knocked in the head, and dealt not less vigorously with that mischievous, miscalled delicacy which forbids the discussion of reproduction and other natural functions. N. P. Willis wrote of the new book in these words: "Wisdom cut and dried;" and testimonials equally flattering, written by competent judges, were numerous. A quarter of a million copies were sold within ten years, a remarkable fact, especially as the book was of considerable size, containing three hundred pages. In 1869 Dr. Foote began the revision of his work, and by the winter of 1869–70 had produced the manuscript of "Plain Home Talk, embracing 'Medical Common Sense.'" Of this work of nine hundred and twelve pages more than a hundred and fifty thousand copies hav been sold in the English-speaking countries, and more than fifty thousand copies of the German edition in Germany and the United States. "Science in Story," published in 1875, was a new departure, combining a plot full of incident and fun, very attractiv to young people, with anatomy, physiology, and hygiene, plain-spoken in style, and treating of elimination and reproduction in a manner which forbids the abuse of wholesome knowledge by boys and girls, for whose instruction the book was written. It consists of five volumes, containing two hundred and fifty pages each. Dr. Foote's miscellaneous pamphlets are twenty in number. He publishes the Health Monthly, a paper devoted to heredity, health, and hygiene. The doctor is known in New York as a public-spirited citizen, interesting himself in praiseworthy movewents to promote the public good.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of grea usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances nder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intainsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

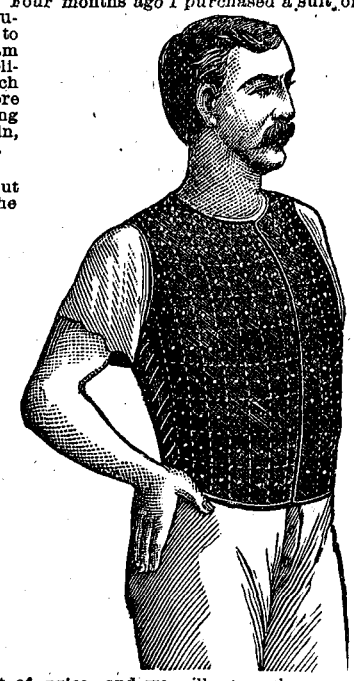
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Children's garments upon application.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselves. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Gems of Thought.

IT is a stupid man that refuses to believe the evidence of his senses; it is an unreasonable man who in forming his belief will throw good evidence aside; and that man is equally stupid and unreasonable who will found a fixed belief on no evidence at all.—D. M. Bennett.

TOO many people approve no books but such as are representativs of some opinion or passion of their own. They read not to hav human nature reflected on them, and so be taught to know and to love everything, but to be reflected themselvs as in a pocket mirror, and so interchange admiring looks with their own narrow cast of countenance. The universalist alone puts up with difference of opinion, by reason of his own very difference, because his difference is a right claimed by him in the spirit of universal allowance, and not a privilege arrogated by conceit. He loves poetry and prose, fiction and matter of fact, seriousness and mirth, because he is a thorough human being and contains portions of all the faculties to which they appeal. A man who can be nothing but serious, or nothing but merry, is but half a man.—Leigh Hunt.

IN all times men hav praised honesty, moral purity, beneficence. In all times men hav protested against murder, adultery, perjury, and all kinds of vice. No one will dare maintain that it is better to do injustice than to bear it.—Aristotle.

FOR divines, in this day, when the profession of Christianity is attended with no peril, when the practice even demands no sacrifice, save that preference of duty to enjoyment which is the first law of cultivated humanity, to repeat the language, profess the feelings, inculcate the notions of men who lived in daily dread of such awful martyrdom, and under the excitement of such a mighty misconception; to cry down this world, with its profound beauty, its thrilling interests, its glorious works, its noble and holy affections; to exhort their hearers, Sunday after Sunday, to detach their hearts from the earthly life as inane, fleeting, and unworthy, and fix it upon heaven as the only sphere deserving the love of the loving or the meditation of the wise—appears so us, we confess, frightful insincerity, the enactment of a wicked and gigantic lie.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

WE may tread in the same path with the benefactors of the world, though with a slower and less confident step. Every positiv addition to the stock of actual information, however small, is so much gained to human nature. Besides, if we cannot ourselvs contribute directly to improvement or discovery in art or science, we hav a scarcely less pleasing task to perform in their reception, their preservation, and, above all, in their dissemination.—Verplanck's Liberal Studies.

IF the character be formed and the mind made up on the few cardinal points of human opinion, agreement of conviction and feeling on them has been found, in all times, to be an essential requisit to anything worthy the name of friendship, in a really earnest mind.—J. S. Mill.

MACHIAVAL, an Italian author and statesman of the sixteenth century, asserted that the doctrins of the Christian religion, meaning the Catholic (for he knew no other), which recommended only passiv courage and suffering, had subdued the courage of mankind and had fitted them for slavery and subjection; an observation which would certainly be just, were there not many other circumstances in human society which control the genius and character of a religion. Brasidas [an old heathen of Sparta] seized a mouse, and, being bit by it, let it go. "There is nothing so contemptible," said he, "but what may be safe, if it hav but courage to defend itself." Bellournine, an eminent Catholic divine of the sixteenth century, patiently and humbly allowed the fleas and other odious vermin to prey upon him. "We shall hav heaven," said he, "to reward us for our sufferings; but these poor creatures hav nothing but the enjoyments of the present life." Such difference is there between the maxims of a Greek hero and a Catholic saint.—Hume's History of Religion.

THERE is such a recommendation by nature of one man to another that one man ought never to appear unfriendly to another—for the simple reason that he is a man.—Cicero's Good and Evil.

NEITHER consult with a woman touching her of whom she is jealous; neither with a coward in matters of war; nor with a merchant concerning exchange; nor with a buyer of selling; nor of an envious man of thankfulness; nor of an unmerciful man touching kindness; nor with the slothful for any work; nor with a hireling-for-a-year of finishing work; nor with an idle servant of much business. Harken not unto these in any matter of counsel.—Ecclesiasticus xxxvii, 11.

Odds and Ends.

FORESIGHT: "But, Sylvia," said Hattie, "if you climb that fence Mr. Tawmus, who is over there, will see your stockings." And Sylvia replied, "I thought of that."

A JERSEY CITY man has asked for a divorce because a moustache is sprouting on his wife's lip. As a rule it makes a man mad to hav any moustache on his wife's lip but his own.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL examiner: "Giv an instance from scripture of an animal endowed with speech." Pupil: "And the whale said unto Moses, 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.'"

"HOW many races are there?" was asked by a Kentucky schoolma'am. Up sprang a shock-headed youngster and exclaimed, "Three—the Spring meeting, Midsummer speeding, and Fall fairs."

TALMAGE says that church-members embrace three times as many women as men. That is probably correct. There is not more than twenty-five per cent as much fun in embracing men as women.

TO say that a procession was three hours in passing a given point doesn't, according to the Chicago Times, necessarily show that it was a long procession, since the given point might hav been a beer saloon.

"DON'T you think it a little inconsistent in a church-member," said Parson Jones to a wealthy parishioner, "for you to go out riding on the Sabbath?" "No, indeed," replied the parishioner, "that is my way of saving soles, you know."

AN English psychological society is racking its brains over the conundrum, "Are angels ever sleepy?" Not very often, but when you hear a bootjack rolling down the front stairs you can make up your mind that the angel's father is sleepy, which practically amounts to the same thing.

"MY son," said an Arkansaw colonel to the reformed school, "in life always make it a point not to fight." "Suppose a man calls me a d—— liar, what must I do?" "Find out whether he has told the truth or not. If he has, acknowledge the accusation; and if has not, move to another neighborhood."

"NOT married yet?" said a gentleman acquaintance to a tolerably elderly maiden, whom he hadn't seen for several years. "No, indeed; and I never will be," she quickly responded. "I've had several offers, but I wouldn't accept any of them. Ugh! I think it's just too awful for a modest person to get married."

DUMLEY was making an evening call, and the nice little boy of the family had been allowed to remain up a little later than usual. "Ma," he said, during a lull in the conversation, "can whisky talk?" "Certainly not," said ma. "What put that absurd notion into your head?" "Well," he replied, "I heard you tell pa that whisky was telling on Mr. Dumley, and I wanted to know what it said."

TOM, six years old, noticed one winter morning after sunrise the moon in the western sky. Having never before seen both orbs at the same time, he was deeply impressed and ran to his mother with, "O mamma, I've got an awful joke on our father who art in heaven!" "Why, Tom, what do you mean?" said the mother, in a rebuking tone, greatly shocked. "He forgot to pull his moon in," cried Tom, his voice quaking with glee.

WHENEVER you hear of a new railroad pool, you can bet your bottom dollar that there is going to be six months of lying, cheating, cutting, dodging, stealing, and deceiving among the crowd. Whenever you hear of a railroad dividend, squint up your left eye and imagin to yourself the hunter who throws away his coat for the bear to stop and smell of. Whenever you hear that Jay Gould is going to Europe, Vanderbilt is to retire, and Jim Keene has concluded to go upon the lecture platform, let go your hold and slide off the fence as fast as possible. Whenever you hear that short crops, business failures, lock-outs, strikes, high prices, and a hard winter are certain to force non-paying dividend stocks from 72 to 100, sit down on a codfish box, and sandpaper your head until you strike a streak of common sense.

A FEW engineers and firemen were sitting around a coil of steam pipe in the round-house telling their yarns. Among them was a pale young man who had lost his health in a dry-goods store, and had just engaged as an extra fireman. "I never was so mad," said big Bill Dempsey, "as I was when I licked Jim Rapsom fur not flaggin' me." "When was that?" asked one of the firemen. "Let's see," said Bill, thoughtfully. "It wus in the year they put in the Clarion side track." "For what offense did you punish him?" asked the pale young man. "Hey?" "What did you whip him for?" "Waal," said Bill, "the confounded ejiot stopped down in the Kewanee holler an' never sent no man back to flag me. I wus a comin' down the hill hellity-split when I seen his way car. I had the old '70,' with 24 cars, an' I hadn't no idee I could stop 'er, but I flung 'er over an' giv 'er the plug fer all she wus worth. I tore her old fire all out, but I got 'er by the neck all the same. She stopped within three feet o' Jim Ransom's way car. Thunder an' sour milk, but I was mad! Jim wus a standin' there, as rattled as a woman on a crossin', an' I says, 'You infernal ejiot, why didn't you send nobody back to flag me?' 'By gosh, Bill, says he, 'I'll be darned if I didn't forgit it.' 'Oh, you did, eh?' says I, an' I jumped down out o' that gangway an' giv him the eternalest wallopin' he ever got." "Why didn't you report him to the superintendent and hav him removed for such gross carelessness?" asked the pale young man. "Say, look a-here, young feller, I'll giv yer a dead straight pointer," replied Bill. "If you're a comin' on this road with them sort o' ideas, the quicker you don't come the better fur you. If it's good health you want, you just rent out them air notions to some feller with kid gloves. Yes. I would look pretty, I would, a-goin' an' reportin' a man that's got a family to take care of, an' hav 'im throwed out of a job in the dead o' winter. Young feller, them ideas may do fur counter-jumpers, but they hain't good fur nuthin' to railroad with."

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 11. No. 5. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, February 2, 1884. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

"THE hypocrit" and "professional crank" is the way the Houston Post speaks of Anthony Comstock.

A NEW anti-vivisectionist organ called the Champion, and printed in two languages, is about to appear in England.

THE London World, appearing in the new character of religious teacher, says, "The Church Catechism abounds in anachronisms, which, when the book of Common Prayer is revised after the fashion of the New Testament, will perhaps be weeded out."

UNDER Mississippi law a woman is liable to indictment for assault if she strikes her husband; but the man is not liable for assaulting the woman if he uses a switch no larger than his little finger in doing so. It is now proposed to so amend the statutes as to giv the wife the same immunity that her husband enjoys.

THE African traveler, Signor Massari, lectured at Brussels recently before the Geographical Society of that city. He declared that the insurrection of the False Prophet was provoked chiefly by the untoward interference of the Egyptian government in religious matters and by their oppression of the people.

THE Rev. Winslow, Boston's great forger, is editing a newspaper in Buenos Ayres, where he owns a block of fine buildings. He finds the South American climate to be very agreeable, and swears that Boston is the best place on earth for a poor man to start from. There is a great deal in a reputation.—Texas Siftings.

MR. CHARLES W. QUICK, who formerly resided at Rhinebeck from which place he went to Yonkers, where he did a prosperous business in the undertaking line, enjoying at the same time the reputation of being one of the most pious men in the city, and acting as one of the pillars of the First Methodist church, has run away from that place with a girl named Maggie Smith, a daughter of wealthy parents residing in that city. The truants are supposed to be located somewhere in New Jersey.

A SCHOOL-BOY somewhere has achieved the following biography of Moses. Though slightly mixed, it is probably as authentic as anything we hav. "He was an Egyptian. He lived in an ark made of bulrushes, and he kept a golden calf and worshiped brazen snakes, and et nothing but kwales and manna for forty years. He was caught by the hair of the head while riding under the bough of a tree, and he was killed by his son Absalom as he was hanging from the bough. His end was pease."

HELEN WILMANS, says the Winsted Press, has discovered a use for ministers. She would send them to the Fiji Islanders. "Make them sleek and fat," she says, "on the good things of this world before they go, and when there they may serve a better purpose than they ever served here, by successfully administering to appetites that are not imaginary." But who will take the job of fattening the raw-boned and dyspeptic country parsons of New England? Helen, the days of miracles are past. It can't be done.

PRESIDENT GREVY, of the French republic, is one of the most modest rulers known to history. He livs in a large house, the Chateau of Montsons Vaudray, which has twenty-five guest-rooms—to which, however, no strangers are invited. His daughter is married to a Mr. Wilson, an Englishman. Their child is the delight of the domestic president of the republic. M. Grevy rises at eight, works until the afternoon, and fishes for an hour or two on the banks of the Loire, which is noted for its abundance of the finny tribe. After dinner he plays billiards and enjoys his family life. At twenty minutes past ten all the lamps in the chateau are extinguished. M. Grevy is not a very brilliant man, but he is a good and solid one; and, while he may not be a second Washington, he has many of the good traits of character which hav given such an enviable fame to the first American president.

THE printers' union of this city has adopted the boycotting method against the Tribune newspaper. Some time ago the Tribune signed a contract with Typographical Union No. 6 to pay union prices and employ only union men. This contract the Tribune has broken. The union publishes a paper called the Boycotter, showing the printers' side of the question, and endeavoring to influence advertisers and others against patronizing the Tribune. It is claimed that much has been accomplished in this direction.

THE Bureau of Labor and Charities of Syracuse appears to be a sort of pawnbroking shop, $33.25 having been advanced to the needy in one week. One man was lent five dollars on a half-dozen silver spoons, and another received a similar amount on a Bible. A needy old man, who has an $800 policy in the Guardian Mutual Life Insurance company, which is defunct, said he had received fourteen dollars on it and was promised more. The society will correspond to see if they cannot get more money from the company. A grocer's clerk, employed at seven dollars a week, was advanced $5.50 on an album. Mr. Bagg took a mortgage on a shoemaker's goods for $15, and $3 was advanced on a colored boy's Sunday clothes.

THE London Standard of January 2d says that an extraordinary scene took place on Sunday night on the top of a Welsh mountain. The inhabitants of the vale of Glamorgan were startled by witnessing flames ascending from the summit of a mountain near the town of Llantrissant. About a thousand people made their way to the top, and in the midst of a center of fire saw an aged physician, named Price, standing, robed in white, chanting a Druid funeral hymn. Dr. Price has long assumed what he calls the dress of the Druids. The people presently discovered that the body of the doctor's own child was in the midst of the flames, and they became greatly excited. The police having secured the doctor, the crowd rushed forward and snatched away the corpse, which they conveyed to the Llantrissant police station. The hill on which the attempted cremation took place was the doctor's own property.

IN the Cincinnati Enquirer Robert Burdette takes this paragraph for a text: "The Cathedral of the Incarnation at Garden City, built by A. T. Stewart, is completed. It has been five years in course of construction, and cost $2,000,000. The organ cost $100,000. The bishop's residence will cost $80,000, and the stables, already finished, hav cost $10,000." Pondering on this, he writes in verse, "A Study in Osteology." Some of the stanzas are as follows:

"Gray shadows fall 'neath the arches dim,
Bright lights through stained-glass windows swim;
There's a touch of gold in crypt and hall—
But where are the bones that built it all?

* * * * * *

The chimes ring out from the steeple tall,
And "Bim, bones, bell," is their rythmic call;
While the five-part organ in chorus moans
In its hundred-thousand-dollar tones,
'Here is the organ, but where are his bones?'

O foolish man, with heavy gold,
To build a chapel, gray and cold,
Costly and gloomy, grim and tall,
And lose his own bones, after all!

When a tithe of the gold, with its mighty charm,
Spent for humanity, living and warm,
Instead of these cold, dead, senseless stones,
Would hav saved the man who stole his bones."

THE Evansville Argus will hav to bear whatever unpleasant penalty falls upon the relater of the following story: A young gentleman of this city, while on a visit recently in Indianapolis, imbibed quite freely to the health of several of his friends on the eve of his departure for home. After boarding a number of out-going trains and getting "fired" from each for being on the wrong road, he finally seated himself in a coach on the Vandalia line, which, by the way, was the right train to convey him home. He had not been in his seat long ere an Evansville clergyman saw the youth, and approaching him said in a kind tone, "Young man, do you know where you are going?" "Yezzer. Ish goin' (hic) home," said the dizzy youth. "Very true, no doubt," replied the clerical gentleman, "but do you know what road you are on?" "Yezzer (hic), b'lieve Ish on the Vandalia." "Young man, let me tell you what road you are on," said the good man in a sad voice; "you are on the road to Hades." "On the wrong road again!" howled the young man, as he sobered up somewhat at the startling information, "damfino which ish right road." And before the minister could speak again the young man had grabbed his valise and sprung from the train.

MRS. BESANT reads Henry George, who is now lecturing in England on the land question, this much-needed lesson: "There is a remarkable amount of religious cant knocking about just now in speeches and articles which are supposed to be, and which ought to be, political. Mr. Henry George, the other night, said that 'the land of England, by virtue of the grant of the living God, belongs to the whole people of England.' Mr. George would find it difficult to produce the grant, I fancy, and if the people are to wait for the land until 'God' givs it to them, the landlords need not become uneasy. And then he asked the audience to act on the principle of Christ, and so on. It is a pity to introduce silly preaching of this kind into a practical question. The Pall Mall Gazette, criticising Mr. George, says: 'We hav no objection to Socialism, but it must be Socialism plus the Ten Commandments.' This journal, which has lately been adopting a tone of mawkish religious sentimentality, does not condescend to explain the connection between Socialism and— say the Fourth Commandment. Cant, adopted to curry favor with fashionable religionists, is repulsiv, both in Mr. George and in his critic, and it is not likely to win for the former much favor from the hardest-headed of the working-class politicians of England."

THE practice of cremation appears to be gradually gaining ground in Germany, there being a steady increase in the number of bodies brought for this purpose to Gotha, which contains the sole establishment in the empire. It is under the control of the city authorities, and the cremations up to the end of 1882 were 84, viz., 17 in 1879, 16 in 1880, 33 in 1881, and 18 up to September, 1882. All parts of Europe contribute to the business of the institution, while several bodies hav been brought thither from America, in which country the cost of fashionable interment is so great that it is but a slight increased expense to hav the remains cremated at Gotha. The principal items of this expense are: The removal of the corpse from the railway station to the cemetery, 30s.; and the cremation itself, £7 10s. There are several formalities to be observed before permission is given by the officials. A permit has to be obtained from the municipal authorities where the death took place, and also from Gotha, that the body may be removed from one place to another, for without this latter the railway company would refuse to find conveyance. A corpse is not allowed to be moved unless encased in metal, and zinc is therefore prescribed, as readily melting under the action of the heat. This must be inclosed in a wooden coffin of certain dimensions, so that it may fit the receptacle in the chamber. In case a funeral service should be requested, a further charge of £1 10s. is made. The Gotha establishment, which was erected in 1878, is very complete, and cost for the machinery and buildings nearly £5,000. The apparatus is made after the Italian model, and consists of a large coal furnace for the production of gas, which is conducted by a pipe to the heating chamber in which the body is placed, this chamber being 21 feet in length, by 13 feet in hight, and divided into two parts. The gas is, first of all, let into the nearest section, where it burns until a white heat is produced. At the time of the operation the body is lowered into the second compartment, and the gas admitted from the other one, when the zinc case rapidly melts, the garments being then consumed, and the whole process occupying about two hours. As it takes a day and a night to properly heat the furnace, sufficient notice has to be sent to the authorities.—London Times.

CHAPTER VI.

THE POORHOUSE.

It was a bright and sunny afternoon in May when Cupples set out for the thirty-thousand-dollar mansion. He had not taken such a ride for years, and he enjoyed it with all the ardor of a boy. The sky was beautifully blue, and flecked with clouds of dazzling whiteness. The bits of green here and there, the just-budding flowers and plashes of water, delighted him almost like articulate music. He forgot the varied and uncomfortable experiences of the morning in the flow of life and exultation that the finally victorious spring was pouring upon the back of retreating winter, who had not strength enough left even to utter a howl as the insulting glory laughed and crowded upon him. Cupples was jubilant. He looked on all sides to see the Palace Beautiful crowning some goodly prospect. It did not appear, and so he kept jaunting on. The horse he was driving had seen twenty-five summers, and so his progress was somewhat slow. But everything was so lovely, even the very stumps by the roadside, brilliant with spangles of moss, that he cared not how deliberately his Pegasus advanced. His thoughts were winged, if his steed was not, and were constantly flying forward to the Olympic Towers. He passed into a sparsely-settled country, where the houses were few and far between, and the splendid object of his search did not appear. He determined to inquire at the next house, which was somewhat larger than the others he had lately passed, having two stories and a woodshed, and something that looked very like a barn, though if Hamlet had asserted that it looked very like a whale I hardly think that anyone would hav disputed him. The whole aspect of the place, with the dull, straggling woods about it, was intensely forlorn. Cupples drove up, and, with the air of an emperor, inquired of a rough-looking, slouchy individual where the poorhouse of E—— was. He felt quite important to think he had in charge a baby who was going to be heir to a thousand dollars per annum. He asked for the object of his search with the dignity of a drummer inquiring for the best hotel in town.

"This is it," said the slouchy individual.

"Good God!" gasped Cupples, and he almost fainted.

Imagin a man who has failed with the intention of paying ten per cent on a dollar, and coming off with a snug bank account, being obliged to pay one hundred per cent; or a member of Congress who has his maiden speech ready for delivery, when a motion to adjourn is carried, and you can form some idea of the feelings of Cupples.

O Virgil, you wrote long ago that it was easy to come down. It didn't take our hero a second to perform that operation.

"Who's in charge?" he asked, with a desperate effort.

"I am," said the slouchy individual, with just a streak of pride, and giving his ragged hat a little shove, and leaning on his hoe-handle, that, fortunately, was quite strong.

"I thought you had a better place," gasped Cupples faintly.

"It's good enough for poor folks. Can't waste much money on them," said the man, taking another good rest on his hoe-handle.

"Here's an order to leave this little baby here."

"Let me see it," said the man, dropping the hoe-handle and managing to stand without any visible means of support, and reading the order as well as he could between a dozen enormous squirts of tobacco juice.

"All right," said he; "walk in, I guess there's room. It won't take much to feed it."

Cupples got out of the wagon with a heavy heart. He took the baby in his arms and walked slowly into the house. He entered a large, bare room in which there was no furniture except two old chairs, a broken settee, and a ghostly cooking stove that seemed a survival of primeval epochs. It did not look as if it had ever been "set up," but had been lodged there by the "flood of years." Two old woman dressed in dirty calico sat in the chairs smoking. They just looked at Cupples as he came in, and then went on puffing and talking, one word at a time, with intervals of various length wherein they seemed almost asleep.

"I guess there's a cradle somewhere up stairs," said the man; "I'll hunt it up. There must be some old clothes about. The women 'll take care of it." "The women" stared at Cupples like two specters and then puffed a little more vigorously. "Pretty things to take care of a baby," muttered Cupples; "might as well toss it to a couple of alligators."

He walked into another room, more bare than the first. The end of it had been made into a cage, behind the wooden bars of which a man in rude apparel was striding and glaring like a wild beast.

"Crazy," said the master of the house.

"No wonder," said Cupples. "Any more inmates?"

"No; these are the stand-bys. Others come, but they don't stay long."

"Where do they go?" asked Cupples.

"To the grave-yard most of 'em. They don't seem to like living here. But I treat 'em as well as I can."

"These have an income of a thousand dollars a year, I believe?" said Cupples.

"I don't get any such money," said the man.

"These fixings cost about thirty thousand dollars, didn't they?" asked Cupples.

"They might have cost somebody that. Mighty little I get for runnin' this consarn. I'm at the bottom of the heap."

"Not quite," said Cupples, glancing at the man in the cage.

"Shall I take the baby?" asked the overseer, as he turned leisurely away, and washed the floor with some tobacco juice.

"How long will it live," said Cupples, "if I leave it?"

"Can't bother about that. It must take its chances with the rest."

"Not as long as I live," cried Cupples; and hugging the baby to his breast, he rushed out and got into the wagon and fairly screamed, "Maria, I'm going to take this baby home and keep it."

"What," shrieked Maria with surpassing note, "take that baby home? We shan't sleep a wink, and all my dress money 'll go for milk. You shan't do it, Cupples; I won't be bothered with the brat. Leave it here."

"I shan't," thundered Cupples; "I'll take it home." He looked straight at Mrs. Cupples with fire in his eyes. The conflict was short and sharp. Mrs. Cupples was beaten. Generally she was victorious; but there were a few supreme moments when Cupples had his own way, and this was one of them.

CHAPTER VII.

PATER FAMILIAS.

Cupples got through the night heroically and much easier than he expected. He had plenty of milk, and had got the hang of the bottle, and so the baby slept nearly all night. Mrs. Cupples, not being bad at heart, and submitting to the powers that be, took care of it with considerable kindness during the day, while Cupples was at the shop; though she assured Cupples that he must not expect as good meals as he'd been used to, for she couldn't spend much time cooking now the baby was on her hands. Cupples said he'd stand it; but he really found little difference in the matter, for Mrs. Cupples was a born cook, and it was almost impossible for her to set a poor table.

Cupples took quite a fancy to the baby. He still hoped to get rid of his charge; but his anxiety was not painful and grew small by degrees. He was congratulated on his benevolence, and began to have a vague idea that he was a Christian and might join the church on the credit of his being so good to the little waif. He had always wanted to join the church, quit swearing, and be respectable. But revivals had come and gone like fire alarms and he never could get up sufficient "interest." Mrs. Cupples was a member of the church and mourned over her husband's unrenewed state at the prayer-meeting, though generally she thought him a pretty good fellow. Now here was a fine chance for Cupples to slip into the church without the usual formality of regeneration; for was he not a father to the fatherless; and was not that pure religion and undefiled.

The Rev. George Adolphus Hapgood met him one day and made the following neat speech:

"I rejoice, Mr. Cupples, in the beneficence of your disposition. It is a credit to our fallen humanity. It is a revelation of the Holy Ghost, I am sure. Now is the day of salvation. I should like to have you come to our prayer-meeting, and I should like to converse with you on spiritual and divine things. You ought to unite with us now in the great work of redemption."

The Rev. Hapgood turned from him with a delicate shake of the hand, and a graceful bow. Just then he stepped upon a piece of orange peel and almost lost his balance. He got a bit of mud upon his hitherto immaculate boots; and he likewise did something unexpected. He felt inwardly just as Cupples did when he swore like a pirate; but of course the Rev. Adolphus would not swear. He restrained himself with professional patience; but if the boy who dropped that orange peel was anywhere about Adolphus would have liked to see somebody hit him; and he would, by an invisible stroke, have helped the blow. Beyond that his Christianity would not allow him to go. His walk was eminently consistent. The orange peel only caused a momentary divergence.

Cupples borrowed the "creed" and went home and read it, or tried to read it; but it made his head ache by the time he got to the trinity, and so he gave it up. "Dear me," said he; "if they'd only take me as I am, I'd go in and do the best I know how. But I'll be cussed if I can swallow this. I don't know what it means. I can't even spell out all the words. I didn't think joining the church was such a bother. I thought all I had to do was to promise to behave myself; and here I've got to believe all this confounded stuff. I thought it was love to God and love to man; and I thought if I loved this baby and took care of it I'd have a chance. But if I've got to swallow this, I'm a gone sinner. I couldn't say I believed it without lying like the devil; and a man hadn't ought ter lie to join the church. What a whopper Maria must have told! I suppose the ministers believe it who have a regular course of trainin'; but I don't see how any body else can. It would take me all my life-time to worry through it. I suppose I must go to the dogs, though I'd like to do better if I could only get folks to help me. But when folks insist on your knowin' all about the Almighty I must give it up. Thank God; the baby's crying and I've got a job on hand, and shan't have to bother about saving myself while I'm busy."

Dr. Dobson gave him a hearty shake by the hand. "I knew the baby'd be all right, Cupples. You couldn't get rid of it, and it's a good bargain. You'll make more out of it than you'll give. It's a bright, sweet thing, and you ought to stand one girl if I do seven. Teach her to wear calico; I do admire calico. Don't lisp of ribbons and silks, and, Cupples, keep her from ever knowing there's such a thing as a love of a bonnet. It'll be a mine of wealth if you can keep her in this blissful ignorance. There's where I mistook. My girls are good. I've nothing to complain of on that score. But they know too much. It's perfectly marvelous what they can see in a woman's gear. I wish they were blind every day after dinner and all day Sundays. I don't see what a woman's eyes are good for. She'll take any sort of a man for a husband without looking, but she'll look clean through a bonnet and see every stitch before putting it on; and she takes a man for life, and a bonnet only till she gets home. Cupid may be blind, but fashion isn't. It can detect the very twist of a hair. However, Cupples, if your girl's extravagant you can giv her plenty of tin."

Cupples was a tinman, and this was a favorit pun of the doctor's. It did duty on various occasions, like a bad quarter. The doctor could not dispose of it once for all.

Billy Stubbs was ready with his applause. "I'm glad you didn't take it to the poorhouse. You've shown your generosity in a way that's quite edifying. What kind of a place was that mansion, anyway? I understand you took a trip over there. How will it compare with Paradise?"

"Like—the bottomless pit," said Cupples, using, however, one syllable for the latter term. "It's a perfect shame. Where does that thirty thousand dollars go?"

"It must go somewhere," said Stubbs. "We appropriate it, and it isn't in the treasury. Somebody gets the good of it. If the poor folks don't that's their fault. They ought to be sharper."

"Why, Stubbs, you are paid a thousand dollars a year to look into this thing. Why don't you do it?"

"I do," said Stubbs. "I draw my salary regularly every three months. What more can you expect of a fellow?"

"I should think you'd want to earn your money," cried Cupples.

"Earn it!" said Stubbs; "earn it! Why, what a fool you are! The main thing in this world is not to earn money, but to get it. If you get it, what's the odds whether you earn it or not? If one gets it and don't earn it, he's so much the sharper, and so more worthy. You are green, Cupples. The world will run over you. Get all you can. Let other folks earn it, if need be. Look out for number one. That's the way to benefit humanity. Doesn't Shakspere say,

> "To thine own self be true,
> And it must follow as the day the night,
> Thou can'st not then be false to any man?"

Cupples was somewhat taken aback by this new rendition of Shakspere, re-enforced, as it was, by a ringing laugh and a puff of fragrant tobacco-smoke. But he resumed the attack:

"I shall expose this thing, at any rate. I'll put a stop to it. I pay taxes to support the poor, and I won't see them cheated, or be cheated myself. I'll tell everybody, and there'll be a rumpus."

"It won't do any good, Cupples. It'll only be a nine days' wonder. How many do you suppose will go out and see for themselvs? We shall contradict you, and that'll be the end of it. You can't help yourself, my dear fellow. You can't right a wrong so long as there's any money to be made out of it. Only when wrong is poverty-stricken and can't pay its way will people demolish it. If it's rich it has its pick of friends. The world is going to the devil, Cupples, and the best thing you can do is to go with it; only get off at the last station but one, and you'll have money enough to charter an extra train, palace car and all, for the Celestial City. Don't try the reform dodge, or, if you do, wait till it gets to be popular, so that you can make something out of it. The best reform never succeeds until it gets to be a confounded humbug. The devil must take stock in it before it can get a majority vote. When the devil patronizes a reform, then pitch in. It's perfectly safe. The devil always knows just when a good thing is going to succeed, and he's bound to be upon the winning side. Stick to him, and you are sure to do some good, and do it just when it pays best. It isn't time yet to make a row about the poorhouse. If you do you'll be set down for a villain, and, worse yet, for an ass. We know how to call names. We've got the seven-leagued boots on, and defy you to catch us.

"Thus far into the bowels of the land
We have marched on without impediment."

Stubbs meandered away in a triumphant cloud of smoke.

Cupples went home and tried to write for the newspapers an article detailing his experience at the poorhouse. He did not succeed, however, and tried to get Hapgood and Dobson to help him; but they declined. Other things occupied his mind, and in a fortnight the poorhouse was forgotten. Cupples went the way of the world.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Realistic Freethought in America.

COLONEL ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

There is no man better known and more highly respected in America than is Colonel Ingersoll. His name has a magic charm, and his presence an electric influence. His lecturing tours are like the triumphal marches of a conqueror; at his approach the Christian is filled with appalling wonder, and the Freethinker is rapt in pleasing expectancy. Even when business at theaters is dull, and the churches are partially forsaken, the Colonel can command a crowded audience in the largest building obtainable. There are few orators who can equal him, and none who can surpass him, in his hold upon the public. His extraordinary magnetic power entrances friends and subdues enemies. It has been truly said that, "if he had lived eighteen hundred years ago, he would hav been the founder instead of the destroyer of religion; for his gigantic intellect is supplemented with an equally Titanic affectionate nature. There is that about him which warms and cheers all who come under his influence. . . His life is so rich and strong, his presence so magnetic, that in a sick chamber he would be better than many a physician; and it would only require the ignorance of an age like that of Buddha or of Jesus to endow him with the qualities and power of a god." The religion, however, that Colonel Ingersoll would hav founded could not hav been one of mystery, creeds, and dogmas, but a philosophy based upon the simplicity of nature and the grandeur of humanity. "His language reports the sweetest music of the winds and waves, and intoxicates the senses like the budding beauty of spring or the amorous kisses of its soft, perfumed air." Though he writes in prose, he is one of the greatest poets that ever lived. What could be more sweetly beautiful and poetic than this discription of laughter, given in his lecture on "The Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child?"— "Strike with hand of fire, O weird musician, thy harp strung with Apollo's golden hair; fill the vast cathedral aisles with symphonies sweet and dim, deft toucher of the organ keys; blow, bugler, blow, until thy silver notes do touch and kiss the moonlit waves, and charm the lovers wandering mid the vine-clad hills! But know, your sweetest strains are discords all, compared with childhood's happy laugh—the laugh that fills the eyes with light and every heart with joy. O rippling river of laughter, thou art the blessed boundary-line between the beasts and men; and every wayward wave of thine doth drown some fretful fiend of care. O Laughter, rose-lipped daughter of Joy, there are dimples enough in thy cheeks to catch and hold and glorify all the tears of grief."

Ingersoll is equally great as a humorist—in fact, he plays in turn upon all the strings of the human heart. Under his skilful touch, tears are soon drowned in the dimples of mirth and joy. Wit and humor are most powerful weapons when wisely used against the shams and hypocrisies of the church. Madam de Staël was once asked if she believed in ghosts. "No," she replied; "but I am afraid of them." So it is with many people, who, while no longer believing in the dogmas of the church, are continually haunted with the fear of their childhood's training. Ingersoll's plan is to laugh away this fear. He does not make sport of the individuals, but with their foolish and fear-begotten notions; and his jokes are mingled with gentleness and kindness that win the involuntary assent of even his religious adversary. Moreover, his darts of wit are free from vulgarity, and are in no sense offensiv to ears polite. He is no harlequin; yet from the intellectual he evokes smiles where clowns would excite pity. As deep sentiment is relieved by Shakspere in the wit and humor of such characters as Touchstone or Dogberry, so is pathos tempered by Ingersoll with pleasantries which are as rays of sun upon the dark realities of life.

But our interest in this eloquent exponent of Freethought is more particularly in his pure and earnest devotion to the principles of Secularism. Herein lie the practical excellence of the man and the grand versatility of the teacher. Possessing a noble nature, a generous heart, and a kindly disposition, allied with keen perception and ready thought, he has the highest qualification for a public advocate of our principles. His character untarnished with moral doubt, and his private life unstained with social obloquy, he has the authority to teach; and, being able to govern himself, he is the better able to counsel others in the art of self-government.

It has been urged that this eminent reformer is simply a destructionist. This is not true. Granted that he aims to destroy the nightmare of priestly domination; but he also seeks to replace it with the wakeful consciousness of man's duty and power. In his own words, "the storm and tempest of thought must purify the dead calm of ignorance and faith." So long as men and women are held in cruel bondage by the superstitions of the church, and offered as victims on the altars of fear, so long will the work of destruction be necessary. If theologians will keep up a senseless imposition, shall we not render society a service in exposing such a fraud and deception? Well did Froude exclaim, in referring to those who, in the name of God, sought to mislead and degrade man: "What do such impostors deserve but to be denied, exposed, insulted, trampled under foot, danced upon, if nothing else will serve, till the very geese take courage and venture to their derision. Are we to wreathe laurels round the brows of phantasms, lest we shock the sensibilities of the idiots who hav believed them to be divine?"

But, while Ingersoll fearlessly destroys, he bravely builds up; and here is a most notable quality in his advocacy. He blends the two, without sacrificing the real genius of either. In this he does good service, in proving that negativ work, useful as it is, is not the be-all and end-all of our advocacy. His motto is, "One world at a time;" and whatever interferes with making the best of the only world we know he seeks to remove from life's path. His writings are filled with practical advice concerning all the real duties and needs of existence, from the cradle to the grave. He is a thorough believer in home and in domestic happiness. With him perfect equality between husband and wife should exist within the domain of the fireside. It is here that fidelity to or disregard of true Secularism in daily conduct is seen. Nobly does he exclaim: "If there is any heaven upon earth, it is in the family circle. If there is a man I detest, it is he who thinks himself the boss. Woman is the equal of man. She has all the rights men hav and one more, and that is, the right to be protected." To parents he says:

"Raise your sons to be independent through labor, to pursue some business for themselvs and upon their own account, to be self-reliant, to act upon their own responsibility, and to take the consequences like men. Teach them, above all things, to be good, true, and faithful husbands, winners of love, and builders of happy homes. Giv your children every advantage in your power. In the air of kindness they will grow about you like flowers. They will fill your homes with sunshine and all your years with joy. Do not try to rule by force. A blow from a parent leaves a scar on manhood. I should feel ashamed to die surrounded by children I had whipped. Think of feeling upon your dying lips the kiss of a child you had beaten."

Neither does the Colonel neglect attention to personal appearance. The old theological idea of treating our bodies as if they were vile, and neglecting the temple of humanity for heavenly adornments, has no favor with him. He sees that happiness is the outcome of making the best of all that attracts and cements the human affections. His advice is not only to make the best of our surroundings, but also to cultivate the central figure—the living person. "I hav sometimes thought," he observes, "that the desire for beauty covers the earth with flowers. It is this desire that paints the wings of moths, tints the chamber of the shell, and givs the bird its plumage and its song. O daughters and wives, if you would be loved, adorn yourselvs; if you would be adored, be beautiful." Thus I might continue to quote, to show the lofty teachings of this man, who has been traduced and maligned, and the sanctity of whose home—a paradise of domestic sunshine and purity—has been invaded and trailed over with the slimy slander of theological hatred and bigotry. The time is coming when the very church which now regards his name as a byword and reproach will go to his writings for gems of beauty and practical lessons in all manly duty. Thus are we reminded of his favorit illustration of the death of a good man. It is a sunset where the sun leaves a legacy of glory to the very clouds that obstruct its path. So the great man leaves a legacy of glory even to the ones who persecuted him. The world is glorious only because men hav been grand enough to die for the right.

Colonel Ingersoll also believes in the dignity and equality of labor. In his opinion, every man is dishonest who livs upon the unpaid labor of others, even if he be an occupant of a throne or a dweller in the mansion. All laborers should be brothers in the great hive of industry, and share the toil of keeping in order the vast and diversified machinery of existence. The dogma of the fall of man may pronounce labor to be a curse; but the truth is, the curse is not in labor, but in its unequal distribution, one portion of mankind having to excessivly toil to keep another in idleness and luxury. The result of this injustice is seen too often in the emaciated form of the overworked peasant and in the useless and unproductiv life of the indolent peer. This anomaly in our Christian civilization will be remedied when each man shall do his part in his own sphere to contribute to the wants of society and to building up the grandeur and stability of the general commonwealth.

In Colonel Ingersoll man has no truer friend, the church no deadlier foe. Under the force of his brilliant tongue, his keen wit, and his withering rhetoric, priestcraft and religious shams hav no mercy. With him the church is the enemy of man and the tempter of woman, fettering human thought and impeding human progress. As he truly says: "It has done harm enough. It has covered the world with blood. It has filled the asylums for the insane. It has cast a shadow in the heart, in the sunlight of ever good and tender man and woman. I say, Let us rid the heavens of this monster, and write upon the dome 'Liberty, Love, and Law.'"

Such is an outline sketch of the greatest Freethinker that not only America but the world has produced. His greatness is not confined to one phase of existence, but it includes the whole range of life. In him is concentrated that which makes man noble and renders character sublime. He has the wisdom of the philosopher, allied with the simplicity of the child, and the intellect of a giant molded with the sweet tenderness of woman. His mental grandeur is illuminated with ethical purity, and his practical nature is enriched by the benevolence of his heart. With a deep yearning to be useful to his weaker brethren, he has, during the best years of a ripe and vigorous life, fought for liberty, justice, and truth. Gifted with a rare genius and a distinct personality, that might hav carried him to the pinnacle of any ambition, he has preferred the hard life of a pioneer in the forest of superstition, laying the ax of reason to the withered tree of antiquity that obstructs the growth of the living present. Thus has he caused the wilderness to blossom, kindling anew the torch of thought in thousands of minds, inspiring them to hope for and believe in the dawn of a period on earth when freedom, truth, and joy shall supplant serfdom, falsehood, and mental gloom.—Charles Watts in the Secular Review.

Pulling a Church Fair.

"Well, Deacon Fakir," observed Elder Twemlo "what do you think of it?"

"I think its scandalous," replied Deacon Fakir, rising from his chair and turning the rear elevation of his anatomy to the cheerful glow of the grate fire, and parting his coat tails like a dude's hair, in the middle. "I think it a downright shame. Sister Belcher says so, too."

This indignant dialog occurred in the front parlor of the parsonage inhabited by Elder Twemlo.

"Yes," resumed the elder, "it is very unfortunate. It is not so much the loss of the money which I deplore, but I am afraid it will hav a discouraging effect on the church and any future efforts in that line. Having busted our game once, they will be quite apt to raid us again."

"It is the most disheartening thing that has occurred to our church since the laying of the corner-stone by the Masons in 1879."

"Everything was running along so nicely," said Elder Twemlo.

"Slick," replied Deacon Fakir. "We had just cleaned out the Chicago drummers, three of 'em, and I had my eye on a sporting man from St. Louis. I intended him for my meat, and was working him for his leather by proposing a quiet, single-handed game of draw-poker, when the police broke in at the front door of the vestibule and the jig was up.'"

"Must hav been between four and five hundred dollars on the board when the coppers gobbled it."

"More'n that!" said Deacon Fakir. "That Colorado cattle man who is sweet on widow Drummle had just laid down a couple of hundred on the queen, open, and Deacon Slickfinger was dealing, and he fixed the cards so that the stockman didn't pick any of it up again, either. Must hav been five hundred dollars in the contribution box if there was a cent. Yes, the boobies made a rattling big haul, including chips, faro boxes, roulette table, monte lay-outs and grab-bags. I never saw a girl so broke up as Miss Sunshower, the soprano in the choir, when the police took her grab-bag away from her and wouldn't let her work the dry-goods clerks. She was playing the snap at a dollar a grab, that evening, and she had two good, fly cappers, one of whom had drawn my gold watch and given it back to me, and the other had pulled a $20 note belonging to Sister Belcher, and had just slipped it back into her hand when we were pulled. Dear me, the poor grab-bag girl felt as badly as Deacon Toplifter when the police knocked his hazzard table to pieces and burnt up his dice, dice-box, and lay-out."

"It seems too bad that we can't hav a quiet church fair or festival to raise money for the poor heathen in Bamboo, Bamboozle county, Africa, without the carnal minded authorities breaking us up. I'm afraid it will be a long time before the poor church recovers from this blow."

"They don't seem to hav the least bit of appreciation for true Christian charity."—Texas Siftings.

Speculation in Parsons.

Church quarrels would not be so frequent if the feeding of hungry souls was not so much of a business which the faithful seek to cover up with a sickly sentimentalism. In the case of the Rev. Heber Newton objection was made to his preaching down the biblical fables by other clergymen not so much because he was disseminating false doctrins as because he was hurting the business. And the Rev. Mr. Newton agreed to let the myths of Moses alone, not because they are not myths but on account of business considerations. Then there is the case of the Rev. Dr. J. P. Newman. Dr. Newman, a Methodist, was employed as pastor by a Congregational church for business reasons. When it was found that the speculation was not as profitable as had been anticipated, there was a very unchristian "kick," and meekness was at a discount in the household of those who feed on the milk of the Word. What do these things prove? Nothing, except that the speculation in parsons and pulpits has become very lively.—Truth.

The Liberal Club.

Mr. John E. Remsburg spoke at the 324th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club to a delighted audience. The lecture was "False Claims," with which, in printed form, the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are already familiar. Those who hav not heard this discourse from Mr. Remsburg's own lips, however, hav lost half its value. The speaker was introduced by Mr. Wakeman with flattering remarks, which the audience indorsed with hearty applause. Mr. Remsburg's manner is quiet and unpretentious; his voice deep and sonorous, and his gesticulations few but appropriate. There were no attempts at ornate oratory. He depends more upon the force of facts than upon the method of stating them. Scarcely moving from the position which he first assumed, the speaker lay down indisputable truths and unanswerable arguments, one after another, as fast as the mind could receive them, and held his hearers ready to break into applause whenever a pause afforded them an opportunity to do so. A vein of humor running through the discourse also kept the audience awake to the ridiculousness as well as the falsity of the church's claims. All that reason, indubitable proof, and scorching sarcasm can do in one lecture to show the the true character of ecclesiasticism as represented by the Christian church is contained in Mr. Remsburg's "False Claims," and all the force embodied in that masterly piece of work is brought most irresistibly to the fore by its author's method of delivering it. Applause of a very hearty character ensued at the termination of the discourse.

The chairman announced that, after the usual custom, the lecture was open to discussion by members of the club. Mr. Bently arose to suggest that, as the members of the club in the main agreed with the speaker, it might be appropriate to invite those who were not members, and who disagreed with Mr. Remsburg, to offer their criticisms. The chair acquiesced.

Mrs. Sparks took the floor. She wished to dissent from the lecturer's estimate of Jesus Christ. In her opinion, the Galilean reformer was just as much a Universologist as Stephen Pearl Andrews, only, of course, he was not so wise a person as the Great Universal Preacher. Then, again, Mrs. Sparks could not indorse Mr. Remsburg's statement that woman suffrage was in its infancy. A movement that was forty years old was no longer an infant. It was an adult.

Dr. Atkinson succeeded Mrs. Sparks, and criticised the lecture in a rather irascible manner. Mr. Remsburg, he thought, had shown too little charity for those still in the church, and prided himself too highly on the fact that he had escaped from it; whereas it was not to Mr. Remsburg's credit that he had emerged therefrom, but to the credit of those who had enlightened him. The club was getting to be too much of a mutual admiration society, and had not made adequate provision for supplying the place of the church when that institution had passed away.

A certain Mr. Thompson was appended. He believed, and expressed his belief in a reverential tone, that the holy Bible was the inspired word of God. He could not help it; he was brought up to believe that way. Of course he did not accept the creation anecdote in a historical way. Adam and Eve represented merely the intellect and affection of the world. Mr. Thompson's further remarks were devoted to sustaining this notion from a Swedenborgian point of view. His drift was slightly indefinit.

Dr. Weeks, who has his ups and downs in the endeavor to secure the patient attention of the club, held that there ought to be more mutual admiration in that body. There should be more lectures delivered like the one we had listened to. The opening speaker had studied his subject long and well, and understood the significance of what he had said. The church was obtrusiv in its authority. That was what the lecturer had protested against, and that was the offensiv characteristic of ecclesiasticism against which Dr. Weeks would also continue to protest. There is a large amount of valuable timber in Dr. Weeks.

Madam Delescluze wished to defend St. Paul, and to apologize for that individual's practical non-advocacy of woman suffrage. Paul, she said, being a Roman, had the notions of the Roman fathers, and in Rome none of the women were allowed to make themselvs conspicuous except those of infamous character. That accounted for St. Paul's conservativ utterances on the woman question. She admitted that in the Dark Ages crimes had been committed in the name of the church. But in the nineteenth century, in this republic, and under the banner of civilization, crimes had also been committed in the name of liberty. "Why," she inquired, with an apparent inspiration, "why are not these crimes charged up against our century, against our civilization, and against liberty?" The audience was much impressed; and a nervous man, with his pockets full of some sort of incendiary documents which he was working off impartially upon all comers, and who had hitherto been laboring under a great depression of spirits, nearly expired in a paroxysm of applause. The speaker, however, calmly proceeded to state as her opinion that if Liberalism were to triumph the pope's head would be cut off and civilization would go down in blood and ashes. She then relapsed into silence.

Mr. Andrews hoped the audience would excuse him if he soared a little. The audience to all appearance assented, and he soared. It would not be safe to affirm that all his hearers followed him. Neither could it be successfully maintained that a few did not. There are some marvelous heads in the club, and some not as marvelous, and the latter could admire Mr. Andrews's power of ascending a chain of abstruse ideas even if they could not shin up after him. From a Universological aspect, Mr. Remsburg was a boy amusing himself with the playthings of youth. Within every human being there were the elements of love and justice. These were opposed to each other, eternally in conflict. Mr. Andrews challenged attention on this point, which, he believed, had never before been emphasized.

Mr. Cohen spoke vigorously, as he can always be depended upon to do. He supported Mr. Remsburg. The church must be held up in its true light in order that its dupes may know what kind of an institution they are supporting. If this was not done, how could we expect to ever liberate them? He had no apprehension as to what should be put in the place of the church. When the people are educated enough to leave the church they will then be sufficiently intelligent to know how to supply whatever of value there is in it. Mr. Cohen had noticed that while many had disagreed with Mr. Remsburg, all had discreetly refrained from attempting to answer him.

Mr. Putnam spoke of a recent official decision which had prevented a woman from obtaining a position to which she aspired, the refusal of her application being based on the fact that she was a woman, and on the alleged fact that this is a Christian country. This decision, the speaker said, was infamous. Mr. Putnam is a firm upholder of the rights of woman. Indeed, so gallant a gentleman as himself could not be otherwise. He would sooner see anarchy reign, and all legislation annulled, than allow a law to exist that compasses the liberty of any individual.

Mr. Remsburg's replies to his critics were appropriate and happy. In reference to Mrs. Sparks's denial that woman suffrage was in its infancy, he averred that in the eyes of the law anything was in its infancy until old enough to vote. Therefore, practically, woman suffrage was not of age. Madam Delescluze's affirmation that none but infamous women were allowed to lead public lives in Rome, Mr. Remsburg denied. If he had read history aright, women occupied a higher position in pagan Rome than Christian civilization had ever accorded them. The answer given by the speaker to the hackneyed question, "What will you giv us in the place of the church?" was most thorough and satisfactory. Said he, to illustrate, a thief breaks into your house to rob you. A policeman sees him and marches him off to justice; you thrust your head out of the window and shout, "What are you going to giv me in the place of that thief?" An offensiv carcass lies in the street before your residence; the health board remove it; you follow after them and interpose the query, "What will you giv me in the place of that carcass?" He saw a man lying in a dungeon clothed in rags, and on his person countless vermin crawled and fed. The walls are torn down, and the man is brought forth, bathed and clothed anew, and becomes a human being once more. The church is a dungeon. In it lies mankind garbed in the tatters of ecclesiasticism, and infested with parasites called priests. The walls should be torn down, the tatters and parasites removed, and mankind rehabilitated.

Mr. Remsburg left New York last Saturday for Boston, to speak before the New England Freethinkers' Convention. A list of his subsequent engagements will be found in another part of this paper.

The program of the Liberal Club for the month of February has not yet been printed. Reliance, however, can be placed upon the chairman's statement that it will be an attractiv one. On Washington's Birthday it is designed to hav a lecture on "Washington as a Liberal," and on the 29th a discourse by some lady upon "Leap Year."

An Open Letter.

To BROTHER W. F. JAMIESON: That's right! Giv it to Mr. E. C. Walker. Mistaken man, he thinks "moral reform" is to be effected by moral means. Poh! it will never do. We must pound reformation into mankind. If parents will plant hereditary desires for stimulants in their children, and then cultivate such desires with liquor-soaked pies, tarts, cakes, pickles, and brandy-drops, we must pound it out of them "with a rod." And if perchance their "total depravity" leads them, like hogs, to run in the opposit direction when we are trying to drive them; and they chance with all our beating to grow up unredeemed, we must continue the flagellations and brute force on the brutes, in the shape of fines, imprisonments, etc.; and whether this policy shall make them better or worse, we must continue it as the "God-ordained and sanctified means of salvation."

It was tried with great success, with the death penalty attached, some six thousand years ago, on a young couple engaged in gardening. It was "just the thing" when England's king tried it on Oliver Cromwell. It worked to a charm for the slave-power under the Fugitiv Slave law. It operated grandly for the temperance cause when, under the control of the "church of the living God," it has, in less than forty years, brought the cost of the consumption of alcoholic drinks in this nation from $800,000 down to $800,000,000. It has worked gloriously for Iowa, for we hav built five large distilleries in the last four years.

Yes, Brother Jamieson, pour out the vials of wrath upon every crazy fellow who would reform society by education, or an appeal to reason and judgment, and swing with giant hand the God-ordained club of salvation. "Spare the rod and spoil the child." "Thou shalt beat him with a rod; so shalt thou deliver his soul from hell." M. FARRINGTON.

Not Believing Things Unreasonable.

The pastor of our place, one week ago, to illustrate what he claimed to be the untenable and fallacious position of unbelievers, gave the following oft-repeated anecdote: A minister, while stopping at an inn, overheard a number of young men saying, in substance, that they would not believe anything they could not understand. After he had heard them through he told them that on his way to their place he saw several different animals, the hog, the goose, and the horse, all feeding on grass; that it grew bristles on the hog, feathers on the goose, and hair on the horse. Could they understand that?

First, the meaning of those who say they "will not believe anything they cannot understand" is purposely distorted and misinterpreted, for what they mean to convey is this: that they cannot believe anything unreasonable.

Secondly, the very fact that the different processes through which the grass went in the different animals, owing to their different constitutions, grew bristles on one, feathers on another, and hair on the other, is just why we cannot and do not believe things unreasonable. If a man should tell me that in California feathers grew on the horses and hair on the geese, I should say I did not believe it because it was not reasonable. And what I would mean by its not being reasonable would be that it was contrary to all experience and our knowledge of things. If we should see a skeleton of a horse or goose we would know with certainty, by a knowledge of things, which skeleton had hair for a covering, and which feathers.

If we sow wheat we know we will not harvest corn therefrom; and if people should tell us they planted potatoes in Colorado and raised beans from the seed we would deny it, because we know it an impossibility, from our knowledge of nature. We know nature's laws never vary. We know the same process produces the same results when all circumstances are alike. So when they ask us to believe that a whale swallowed Jonah, and that Jonah lived three days in the whale's belly, we say we do not believe it, because it is contrary to our knowledge and experience of things, and contrary to all the laws pertaining to animal life. We know that a man must hav air to breathe, or he dies. So when they ask us to believe that Samson caught four hundred foxes and tied their tails together, we say we cannot believe it, for by our knowledge of men we know he could not do it.

So when they ask us to believe that Christ raised Lazarus from the dead, killed a fig-tree by his word, or turned water into wine, we do not believe it, because it is contrary to the laws of nature, contrary to all knowledge of things, and therefore an impossibility. And so when they giv us the doctrin of the Christian Bible, man's creation, his fall, and plan of redemption, the characters of God and the devil, we say we do not believe it, as they are contrary to all our experiences and knowledge, all ideas of justice, honor, sympathy, and respect, and contrary to all nature's laws, and therefore cannot be true.

There are many things we know, and in a general way we understand them. In a general way, we understand how it is that matter will take a different form of covering upon different animals, because it goes through with a different process in their several constitutions. By one process a man makes sugar out of corn, by another alcohol, and by another oil. In a general way we understand how grass and grain grow, how fruit is the result of the life of the trees, etc. But as we do not really understand what life is, so we cannot understand the results of life, or rather the actions of life, in as definit and clear a manner as we understand that two is contained in twelve six times, because six times two are twelve. But we understand sufficient to know that when a person asserts a fact contrary to what we actually do know, it is false. We know that all truths must harmonize, and we know enough truths so that when a lie is told the jar it makes in coming in contact with these truths brands it as a falsehood. When they tell us Christ ascended up into heaven flesh and blood, we know it is not so, because the law of gravitation would prevent it. In other words, it is contrary to all experience. Man can reason only from what he knows, and what does not agree with what he knows he calls unreasonable—or at least should. So when a man states that he cannot believe what he cannot understand, he means he cannot believe that which is contrary to all experience, as it is unreasonable.

Although such an anecdote is so glaringly ridiculous as to be an insult to intelligence, yet there are so many church-going people that never think for themselvs, and to whom such stories are weighty arguments, that I was constrained to pen these few thoughts.

FRANCIS M. BUCK.

Mr. Putnam's Book.

THE PROBLEM OF THE UNIVERSE, AND ITS SCIENTIFIC SOLUTION. By S. P. Putnam. Price, 25 cents.

I hav just read this interesting little work of Mr. Putnam, and find it is like all the other works of our author—plain, simple, and practical, as well as full of beautiful, symmetrical, scientific truths and facts. I don't see how anyone can read it and not fall in with the ideas therein expressed. I do not see that a better compliment can be given the work than to quote from itself—or one that will more plainly unfold the solution of the problem presented. He says: "Mind is not a substance; it is simply phenomena; it is a manifestation. We cannot make it identical with pure existence, for it has no independent life. We cannot conceive of it as existing in itself, while we can so conceive of matter. The exhibitions of mind as we know it are limited. They begin and they end. Matter exists throughout all space and time. It flashes in millions of stars. Motions come to the eye to-day that started on their course before humanity had a being. As science sweeps the eternal heavens, it continually discovers matter, but not mind; there is no evidence of what we call intelligence. There is simply orderly force, but orderly force is not mind—it is law. The existence of law does not indicate mind; law is not a thing; it is a mode, and this mode always has been, always will be. . . . As law never began, mind as a cause is superfluous, and therefore, to the eyes of science, there is no such thing. . . . Mind is not matter, however subtil and ethereal. Neither is it a property of matter, or quality, or attribute. Neither is it an entity or thing. It is simply a process. It is a movement, an activity. The soul of man is not a substance; it is action, action, action—wonderful, magnificent, far-reaching, piercing, and penetrating—but action, and nothing more."

There it is, my friends; all the problems of mind and matter solved in a few simple axiomatic sentences. Matter is all there is, and it is everlasting. Matter in motion is and does all that is. Mind, soul, and spirit are nothing but "orderly forces," laws of matter in motion. Whereon, then, is the theory of continued existence to base itself? What can our Spiritual friends bring us as proof that the dead liv again, when it is proved that mind or spirit is only a process, an activity? Will they "please rise and explain?" I do not see how theologian or Spiritualist can reconcile the facts of this simple essay with their ideas of life beyond the spheres.

Mr. Putnam thus continues: "This universe is not an iron universe. It is not a fixity, a foreordained affair. Its existence is necessary, I grant, but not the endless forms of its manifestations. This is a flowing universe. It is ever in motion. It is matter, and it is force; unchangeable in essence—never greater, never less, but millionfold in phenomenal procedure. . . . If we fly in the face of Nature, she is our enemy indeed, and builds an iron wall about us; but if we bend to the dictates of her eternal order, then that order becomes a mobil and wonderful force. It flashes into the steamship, the palace car, the electric flame, the sounding wave, and the earth becomes a beneficent mother, and we revel in her riches, and in the sweat of our face we win sovereignty even of the skies."

These few quotations will giv our readers an idea of the drift of the book, and, I trust, induce them to help giv to it a broad and wide circulation. Those who do not accept its conclusions will, by attempting to combat them, find out how impossible it is to go behind them. It seems to me that friend Putnam has gleaned all the philosophies, the sciences, and facts of the past and the present, and gathered therefrom the pure wheat and made of it the only bread of life that is perfect and complete—that will sustain man in the highest and strongest mental vigor.

He himself says: "This essay is the result of years of mental conflict. I hav tried both theology and metaphysics, and they hav turned to dust and ashes. They hav given me no solution of the universe, and hence no joy and no comfort. They are Dead Sea apples; they glisten only with poisonous enchantment; they lure, but they lure to death—to death of hope and death of human progress. Only without God is there liberty in the world."

As Bakounine nobly says, "If there was a God it would be necessary to abolish him. Indeed it would, for an infinit God is an infinit despot. An infinit good God would still be a tyrant and the foe to human freedom. In the hands of such a God we would be machinery only. The liberty of man demands the dethronement of deity."

Is not a book that abolishes gods and ghosts, and givs us science grounded on pure fact—science so simplified that even a child can comprehend it—one of the most valuable of acquisitions to our literature? Is not a man who writes such a book—a man who has given us "Gottlieb's Heaven," and "Prometheus," and "Golden Throne"—a better friend, a truer helper, a nobler savior, and wiser God than all those he is doing so much to abolish? To know how to liv our one life is the heart of all true knowledge.

"Yet not in indolence shall man advance,
But by his own endeavor, power, and glance;
By character, by labor's changeful zest,
By all his being struggling for the best;
And he shall work in sacrifice and love;
Like serpent wise, but harmless as the dove;
Seeking with skillful hands for all things good;
Yet not for self but for the multitude;
So shall the rich reward o'er-bloom the whole,
And every home be jeweled bountiful;
While each one shall be free in wise control,
The voice of all shall in one mandate roll,
Of noble government and serene desire.

The Loan Exhibition.

"Hav you posted up any on the question of opening the Bartholdi Loan Exhibition on Sunday?" asked the managing editor of the religious editor, who was examining a pimple on his chin at the sanctum looking-glass.

"I hav a vague impression that something ought to open some time," growled the religious editor, with a keen glance at the closet door. "In my judgment, everything should be open the year round."

"This Bartholdi matter is a pretty serious business," continued the managing editor, disregarding the pointed allusion to the demijohn. "It brings up the question as to what shall be done for the poor of refined tastes."

"It goes further than that," retorted the religious editor, scratching the pimple tenderly. "It brings up the question of Sunday, and threatens to break down all the religious notions of Sabbath desecration. The opening of that show will be followed by the opening of all the galleries and libraries, and that in turn by the establishment of Sunday amusements, until there will be a strong prospect of closing the churches."

"Think so?" asked the managing editor, turning his cigar in his mouth reflectivly. "Can't we take the ground that it will be well to unlock the doors on this particular occasion, and stop there? The money for that pedestal must be raised."

"But what doth it profit a nation if it gaineth a pedestal and loseth its grip on Christianity?" demanded the religious editor, surreptitiously trying on the managing editor's overshoes, to see if they would fit. "Yield to the Bartholdi movement, and you've got to giv way to the next man who gets up a side-show, until in time you will hav a circus in full blast. I don't see where you're going to stop it, unless you giv this loan exhibition a purely religious twist and show that Christianity demands it."

"Can we do that?" inquired the managing editor, doubtfully.

"Certainly. The general impression among Christians is that the French are pagans and given over to the devil. Now, if we come out and show that Bartholdi is a missionary and the exhibition is to raise funds to enable him to convert the French nation, the churches will snap at the bait, the doors will be open Sunday, the poor people will religiously stay away, thereby saving their imperishable souls, you hav accomplished all that is asked on both sides, and the paper becomes immensely popular."

"Prodigious head!" murmured the managing editor. "If I had your inventiv faculty I would start a patent office of my own. How do you catch it?"

"It burns considerable carbon," replied the religious editor, with an air of weariness, "and it wastes a great deal of mental tissue. You would scarcely think it," he continued, trying the knob of the closet door and turning away with a disappointed look. "You'd hardly believe it, but that little scheme, small as it appears, has entirely unnerved me. No man can stand up long against such a strain without extrinsic assistance."

"But won't the theaters and circuses come right in and claim that they want to convert some nation?" suggested the managing editor. "Now, I think of it, doesn't your first objection apply to your Bartholdi scheme?"

"What if they do?" grunted the religious editor. "That very claim will ruin the object, because you can't get the poor people into the missionary business, no matter what you do. The churches hav worked that lay until it is barren. The people shy at any suggestion of it. Put up anything you please as intended for the conversion of the heathen, and the public slide across the street and up the alley. I believe," continued the religious editor solemnly, "I believe if the bar-rooms offered free drinks on behalf of the foreign missions, it would break up the drinking of liquor outside the churches."

"I didn't know the missionary business was so unpopular," sighed the managing editor.

"It is. I'll bet a New Year's card that you can't start out to-day with a subscription to buy a new set of false teeth for the King of Siam and raise enough money to get your hair cut, between here and Calvary Cemetery. I tell you, the churches hav worked the good field dry. There hasn't been a thing patented or copyrighted in the past forty years that they haven't spread abroad among the suffering souls who know not the Word."

"Well, perhaps you had better take the view you suggested," said the managing editor. "It hadn't occurred to me, but I can't think of anything else."

"I've a little idea of my own that I can work in," said the religious editor with a grin. "I don't thing the heathen hav heard of it yet, and it will go a long way toward ameliorating their condition. Did you ever see a cork pulled with a jack-knife?"

"Without breaking the cork?" asked the managing editor.

"Doesn't break it as much as a cork-screw does. Bring out the demijohn and I'll show you the prettiest thing yet."

The managing editor developed the demijohn with alacrity.

"You see," continued the religious editor, opening his knife, "you run the blade down between the cork and the glass. Then you giv it a quarter turn to catch the cork, and jerk it—Hello! what the dev—! What's all this, anyway? Does any kind of ointment come with this to take the stain out of a man's breeches?"

"That's buttermilk," replied the managing editor, calmly. "I hav been advised to drink koumiss, but I find buttermilk cheaper. Try a little?"

"I don't think it will spoil his pants," said the city editor, who had been attracted by the noise the religious editor made in getting out of the office, and who had listened attentivly to the managing editor's explanation.

"I should be very sorry," returned the managing editor, regretfully, "because his scheme for drawing a cork was really a meritorious one. I will try it on the bottle of apple-jack to show you."

"Buttermilk!" hissed the religious editor between his teeth, as he started into the street. "Bartholdi and buttermilk! Let him go on with his editorial, and when he gets through let him add a paragraph, if he can, showing how the scheme is liable to raise any money for the pedestal! Buttermilk!"

And the last seen of the religious editor, he was trying to trade a couple of tickets to a church oyster-soup festival for a sleigh ride to the park.—Brooklyn Eagle.

As to Faith and Churches.

From Truth.

Many of our contemporaries are widely excited over Truth's attitude on the Newton controversy.

One of them, the St. Louis Chronicle, even affects to fear that Truth is disposed to pull from under many millions of people the foundations of their faith.

As a matter of fact, we hav no such purpose.

As a matter of fact, the many millions hav very little faith to be pulled from under them.

Intelligent men and women cannot be induced at this late day in the world's history to accept the biblical stories of the creation, the deluge, the building of Babel, and the saliniferous qualities of Lot's wife.

How many men who hav taken the trouble to think about it at all believe in the miraculous birth of the child Jesus?

But, says our St. Louis contemporary, theology is outside of the province of the daily newspaper.

Why?

Churches are a greater burden upon the people than the tariff.

For every steeple that lifts its senseless spire to the skies hundreds of men, and women, and children are compelled to burrow in cellars, and die in wretched tenements.

Fat priests are fed by starving parishioners.

Ever preacher who utters wretched drivel in a splendid church on Sunday is supported at the expense of a toiling population.

The church is a severer drain upon the people than all other forms of taxation, and it is the cause of more actual misery in the world than hav been all the wars of all the ages.

Testimonial to Frances Wright.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you kindly copy into the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER for preservation the following remarks concerning Frances Wright, which appeared in the Brooklyn Eagle, in answer to a correspondent? Probably no Liberal writer or speaker ever received more Christian abuse than this noble woman, and the qualified praise of the Journal of Commerce scarcely does justice to her great talents.

PETER ECKLER.

"Frances Wright d'Arusmont was born in Dundee, Scotland, September 6, 1795. She was married while on a visit to Paris in 1831 or 1832 to M. d'Arusmont, to whom she had one daughter. As to whether she was generally liked in her time it is quite probable she had enemies, but the Journal of Commerce, which was not regarded as friendly, made the following frank statement regarding her: 'Fanny Wright was the first female orator we hav ever heard. Her elocution was excellent, her gestures impressiv, her style perspicuous. She was the author of many Infidel works, republican essays, sketches of society and manners here and abroad, and a tragedy entitled "Altorf," which bears the unquestionable stamp of genius. She was a bold, independent, sincere, and highly-gifted but misguided woman. Had she been trained in a better school her name would hav gone to posterity side by side with that of Maria Edgeworth or Joanna Baillie. In point of intellect she was very far the superior of Harriet Martineau.' She died in Cincinnati, Tuesday, December 14, 1852."

An Appeal to the Friends of 284.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As a very prominent Liberal has written me that he will do more for the new calendar after there shall be a better agreement concerning its title, and as the name I gave it at the time I instituted this reform, viz., Year of Science, or Anno Scientiæ, as it is in Latin, is of necessity the only real title it can ever hav, I therefore ask all friends of this progressiv step to so call it, and thereby obviate all difficulty on that score in regard to the new dating.

Very truly yours, GEO. N. HILL.

Science in the Serpent's Coils.

Knowledge, which should grasp, direct, and control, surrenders its best and main points to the triumph of gross selfishness and ignoble power, and only maintains a hopefully prospectiv success. After all the research and assertion respecting this motley conflict affecting the world, the most common, most dreaded contest is that with the nineteenth century myth, Mistress Grundy. That gossip sprite is the glamour of petty, ephemeral fame which has no basis in merit. Ever cheating, ever beguiling, it is sustained by pretension and ceaseless vigilance of greed for gain, regardless of its source, incurred privation, and all consequences. She is begotten of the gizzard of mastery, born of prurient pride and vanity, nursed in slavish usages, and wedded to all tyrannies. The mythic tyrant was given feminin title that the odium of her senselessness might fall, with other oppressiv burdens, on the subject caste. Ruling institutions hav been masculin dominations since time has preserved records, and oppression and suffering hav ruffled the ceaseless disorder. At least twenty centuries hav groped under them, including a long period called Dark Ages, in which persecution unto death stifled the struggle for light. Martyrdom was the price of free thought and honest speech. The rest of the ages endured a large degree of the cruelty; the present age, far from being exempt, reels in discord, suffers under violation of high trust, and the author of literature which would teach woman such care of herself as would prevent her slavery to social masters, is imperilled in person and property. The era of man is but prefigured—it cannot dawn till both sexes are freer than one now is and science is above false courts. Wrongs and many sorts of compulsion abound, holding the weak-minded on a system of designing racks, and few are strong enough to declare real causes of basic hindrances to happy peoples and periods. This age wrongs itself as no other has by abused opportunities and ignored knowledge.

Finally, enough truth in several departments of nature is tested and acknowledged to admit of the proud title, Science. Humane minds, deploring fraud and folly where only firm integrity insures from lapse and invasion, and believing the adoption of scientific life the only remedy, appeal in their large impatience to professed sources of knowledge in physiology, hygiene, and ethics. They want, and know the weak masses need, assurance, public sustainment, and fearless example in a life of right uses, and of resistance to crowding abuses, rushed by monopolies and defended by the mythic genius of scandal. The two words popular and respectable hav passed pure limits and are presented to the vice-agency; long misuse makes them odious in the true sense and spirit of growing liberty and of worthy honor.

It is apparent that the most needed of lacking things cannot be gained till labored for by the feminin half of humanity—things over which the Grundy tyrant specially displays a lash of sneers. Powers producing false usages purposely intend them to foster timidity and crush woman's selfhood; hence, men seeking open fields of study, art, enterprise, should know they do not open for one sex alone, and should encourage women to energize their powers and advance with them.

In nature's order motherhood is endowed with developing forces proportioned to its vigor—with ability to transmit traits, tendencies to truth or falseness, proportioned to its qualities and culture. Fatherhood is similarly endowed, but in a degree not as well understood. Well-poised, honest children and just institutions cannot exist till free and healthy parents produce sound offspring, that, wisely reared to true men and women, may be qualified to construct and sustain an invincible democracy. Yet, with much light gleaming on men's purblind inheritance, they essay to revise the interpolated structure of state that leaned, one-sexed, toward flattering and threatening tyrannies a hundred years; and seem not to know women necessarily co-act through various conditions, whether willed or not; and when not allowed to rightly assist, influences naturally tend to defeat. Justice elements rejected in part leave the whole fabric faulty.

Women's present diseases and universal debility, their slavish stupor concerning derangements, show how they hav been perverting life through depleted progeny and depraved men, for the last carelessly conducted seventy years, now marked by usurpations, robberies, and frauds innumerable. Amid the scramble for vain show on one hand and artful ambition on the other, many signs of grave and great dangers long since appeared. These should be recorded as future warnings, and the worst features of degeneracy should receive attention from first efforts. Diseased and ill-conditioned propagation has received notice and some notes from physicians of both sexes, and other people begin to discuss hereditary law in the light of safety for any desirable acquisition. If they were imbued with ardor likely to diffuse a common zeal, the cause would appear hopeful; but mother-fear seems manifest. They proceed so far as to name the disease, the cowardice, and the dark cause, deathly fashion; then, as if the Grundy myth were glaring round, the club adjourns, and no valorous soul proposes rebellion against the greatest life-corrupter of modern, perhaps of ancient, eras. Women somewhat informed prefer scorning themselvs in the capacity of becoming body advertisers of fancy finery, stimulators of passions and appetites crude ages transmit, to being scorned by the popular myth, which fact should be reversed by the rising of latent principle long kept dozing on the poppy couch of sinister praise and sickly hopes of some soothing affection. The blighting mania for wanton prettiness that panders to foppish fancies has wrecked young hopes too long, and good men's advice to women is the best incentiv to enable them to choose a useful and dutiful course.

In view of the safety of all that is worthful—of the craved equality and the securing of liberty—of mental and moral excellence with their superior joys, shall not such kindly encouragement help to firmly inaugurate the cause of causes, physical culture for women? Awake to action the principle of right in women, and, rising to noble purposes, they will inspire men purely. Mental evolution awaits this revolutionary work; so does ethical, social, and civil. Women of other nations watch and wait our success, as do other governments for a stable, just republic. Patriotism in Eastern dungeons echoes the plaints in ours, and suffering innocence watches with strained eyes for decisiv Western action at the bottom of disturbing causes. To these none need be blind. Past ambition, force, and submission, a little modified in the present, flooded with excess and vanity, infilled with consequent disease, vice, and fraud, then garnished with hypocrisy, in brief explain and describe the debasing and opposing causes of our dangers.

The world had abundance of evils, great and small, before fashion's torturing destroyers were invented; but these originated new series, and hav produced a hitherto unknown phenomenon—a nation of invalids. The first compression of ribs, displacing inner organs, is related to consumption and nervous agony, as the dime swindler is to the billionaire; and these derangements are related to crime, lunacy, and conspiracy, as Sunday bells are to cathedrals and popes; as dollar ballots are to perjured senates and parliaments, irresponsible courts and judges. Beginnings are pedestals and feet, upholding and extending. To displace the foul source of our demoralization by reforming abnormal habits of women, and through that process rectifying the cowardice, excess, cant, and grasp of men, is commencing at the lowest root it is possible to reach; and eradication will naturally proceed as stimulants, drugs and cosmetics, corsets, bustles, and tramels, disappear, and human figures in free exercise imbibe vigor and renew conditions. Since general health, rectitude of character, and peaceful society cannot be obtained by other means, what but stupidity or wilful wrong can put farther away the vital reformation?

Let it not be forgotten that redemption cannot be wrought by correct diet without combining hygienic clothing. Nutrition is vitiated ere it can be assimilated, under pressure and in juices poisoned by limited action of circulatory processes, displacements, irritations, and unequal distribution of blood and warmth. The whole human machinery calls for full natural opportunities for efficient action, and promises no blessings, nor even compensation, with deprived capacity. Ease in exercise and relief in repose are requisits of the power and harmony of all functions. To this recognition conviction has advanced in the last decade.

Thousands of woman are anxious for due encouragement from scientific quarters and public teachers. Such assurance is also needed by husbands, brothers, and fathers; for home opposition needs culture when transition takes discreet degrees. Sanitary usages are the next innovations for weakness to sigh over and wickedness to waste invectiv upon. Both will be readily quieted when signs of true life show dissent is futil. Will institutes called Liberal, clubs progressiv, professors free, journals radical, men true, and women brave speak frankly on this theme—answer the people's cry, What can we do? and giv wholesome cheer at this point of the crisis? Or will pressing coils of sect and caste cobras, and financial boas, suffocate courage till the sole influencing agency is the myth of the century? MARY E. TILLOTSON.

Public Schools.

The Rev. Father Gleeson, of San Francisco is reported in the Catholic Citizen to have spoken as follows:

"The public school system has lost to the Catholic Church 180,000,000 of souls! . . . A large majority of Catholic children educated in the public schools hav drifted into indifferentism, if not into Infidelity, and that is what they desire. Those Catholics, then, with this knowledge staring them full in the face, who send their children to the public schools, with their own good schools at their doors, are traitors to their church and a dishonor to the faith which they profess. . . We hav Catholics now-a-days who are ever trying to pare down the objectionable points of our faith. They love to be called Liberal Catholics; they are forever trying to explain away what non-Catholics most object to. Theoretically speaking, they believe in miracles, but shrug their shoulders when you ask them to believe the miracle of Lourdes. Veneration of relics, the doctrin of indulgences, and of purgatory they rarely alude to. They never want to hear a sermon on exclusiv salvation. They would not be seen wearing a scapular, and don't know how to say the beads. They hav no devotion to the saints, and don't care to know even the meaning of devotion to the Sacred Heart. If the pope sounds a note of warning to any people, they say he is meddling in politics. If the archbishop disapproves of a society, or condemns an abuse, those very Liberal Catholics shake their very Liberal heads, and say they don't see anything wrong in it. The church is not progressiv enough for them."

If this be true, it furnishes the strongest possible argument in favor of our public schools.

The Vice Society.

The appended note of invitation was recently received at THE TRUTH SEEKER office:

150 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK, Jan. 18, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find tickets of admission to the 10th Anniversary of this Society.

The report of the past year, with the address and a synopsis of the great work accomplished during the past ten years, will, we believe, impress you with its important bearing upon public morals, and your personal presence will encourage us in our arduous struggle for the moral purity of the young.

After these years of faithful service in the cause of public morals, we feel we hav the right to ask and look for the hearty co-operation of every good citizen.

Please hand extra tickets to your friends. On behalf of the Society. Very truly yours, SAMUEL COLGATE, Pres.,
ANTHONY COMSTOCK, Sec'y.

The society on behalf of which this invitation was made is the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. Upon the paper on which the document is printed is a list of the board of managers of the concern, and the seal of the society. This latter represents a stern-faced policeman clubbing a hand-cuffed culprit into a dungeon cell, on the one side, and a gentleman in a plug hat burning a quantity of books on the other. From the expression of holy horror on the countenance of the man who is burning the books, they are evidently obscene. All of which was accompanied with a ticket of admission, dated Tuesday evening, Jan. 23, 1884.

Taking all the available moral encouragement that was lying loose around the office on the date in question, together with a Christian young man connected with the establishment, a representativ of THE TRUTH SEEKER sought the hall of the society, which is in the Young Men's Christian Association building. The visitors were halted at the door, the man who took the tickets explaining, "The minister's prayin'." The men from THE TRUTH SEEKER office waited, but Mr. Henry Bergh, who came along at the same time, passed in and sat down. The prayer, offered up by Dr. Deems, endured some ten minutes, and then the visitors were admitted. Some three or four hundred men were in the hall. On the stage, seated in a semicircle, after the fashion of the minstrels, were Morris. K. Jessup, William E. Dodge, the Rev. Dr. Buckley, editor of the Advocate; the Rev. Dr. Roswell D. Hitchcock, the Rev. Dr. Roderick Terry, and Anthony Comstock. These were soon re-enforced by Mr. Bergh. President Colgate, whose name may be found stamped on innumerable pieces of soap throughout the country, presided and introduced the treasurer, Mr. Kiliaen Van Renssalaer, who read his report. Mr. Van Renssalaer is what Josh Whitcomb would call "wobble-jawed," and read as though holding something hot in his mouth. The society had expended about $9,000 the past year, and there was a deficiency in the treasury of $374.43. All of which was respectfully submitted.

Anthony Comstock was next presented. Mr. Comstock is growing fat and baldheaded. The outline of his face is midway between that of a bulldog and a jackass. He had a report to read. This he delivered with such energy as to lose his place several times, violating the rules of grammar with a wild freedom that must hav been painful to the educated persons behind, as it was ludicrous to those before him. In the year 1883, he stated, 128 arrests had been made by himself and assistants. Of these 125 resulted in conviction. The aggregate of the sentences which might hav been inflicted was something like 150 years. Instead of that, however, the sentences which had been imposed aggregated only 4 years. This caused Mr. Comstock considerable grief. Wicked men known as Infidels and so-called Liberals had attempted to persecute "your secretary." They had even tried to get the laws repealed under which he operated. It was further divulged by the speaker that bribes had been offered him if he would let up on certain parties. This, however, he had heroically refrained from doing, though sums as high as $20,000 were tendered. "Your secretary" is obviously of the notion that if a person is going to tell a lie, he may as well tell a big one. In one breath Mr. Comstock stated that vice was decreasing, and in the next presented the fact that more arrests had been made in 1883 than in any previous year. There is a contradiction here which none of the speakers endeavored to explain. The one, however, was evidently designed to show the usefulness of the society in the past, and the other the necessity of supporting it in the future. In all the results that had been achieved, the secretary thought he perceived the footprints of an almighty hand, and he could exclaim in the language of scripture, "What hath God wrought!"

President Colgate brought up the financial necessities of the society. He said that the salary paid Comstock was $4,000 per year. This was none too much, as he had to take his life with him. The Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley followed the soap man. Mr. Buckley is not the sort of man one would suppose him to be from reading the paper of which he is the editor; for whereas the Advocate is generally little more than a petrifaction of ancient stupidity, the reverend doctor himself is tolerably modern. Like the secretary of the society, he is bald above the ears. The top of his head, moreover, is as flat as the bottom of a bucket. He alluded facetiously to the scar on Comstock's face, told laughable and racy anecdotes, and related some alleged facts in regard to the effects of immoral literature that were shocking in the extreme. Within the last year three ministers had been hurled from the high position they held on account of the commission of crimes which could not be mentioned. Words which are usually spoken in a whisper Dr. Buckley rattled off with a glibness that must hav added to the horror in which they are held by the society. Before closing, the speaker suggested a collection. This was to all appearances spontaneous, but the alacrity with which several young men carrying baskets distributed themselvs among the audience suggested that it was a preconcerted arrangement. Dr. Buckley contributed $10, and urged his hearers to remember the society in their wills. He would remember it in his will only for the fact that he belonged to a profession, that of an editor, which never by legitimate means accumulated any property. Perhaps the money obtained by speculation in mining stocks Mr. Buckley does not regard as legitimately accumulated.

The Rev. Dr. Terry, a lusty-looking person, well-fed and well dressed, made a brief and innocuous speech mainly in words of one syllable. He knew a man who saw a vile picture when only fourteen years old, and who did not recover from the shock until he was thirty-five. The audience were discouragingly silent during the continuance of Dr. Terry's remarks, and no applause greeted his closing appeals. The eloquence of Dr. Buckley had exhausted their enthusiasm, and the collection had had a depressing effect. The members of the society were requested to remain when the visitors had departed. What was done thereafter is unknown. The surmise is that Comstock opened his celebrated gripsack and displayed the collection of rare pictures which he is known to possess. Having looked at these, the members would, for prudential reasons, voluntarily resign their money to the possession of the treasurer before exposing themselvs to the temptations of the street. As for Comstock, he will go on in the great work of seizing tons of that sort of literature, which, if we take his word for it, his society has practically suppressed.

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

VIVISECTION.—ELLIOTT PRESTON TO E. B. FOOTE, JR.

Sir: Permit me to thank you for calling attention, through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER (Jan. 12, 1884), to the essay upon vivisection which I published in that journal's issue of Dec. 29, 1883.

All that is necessary is that some one should "set the ball rolling," get the public interested in the matter, and thus bring before them, in its full measure of atrocity, this terrible subject; and this, not because they will take pleasure in hearing of it (until their sympathies become enlisted), but for the sake of justice and of humanity.

I do not, my dear sir, intend in any way to imply that you speak otherwise than as you believe in your criticism of my article, which now lies before me, but I do say, and that most emphatically, that if you are honest in the expression of your views on this subject you are wofully ignorant of its atrocities.

You speak of "straining at gnats and swallowing camels." This remark reminds me of the poor, ignorant vivisector who was filled with innocent wonderment that any reasonable being should object to a vivisector "scratching a newt's tail."

Let us see if vivisectors stop at the "scratching of newt's tails."

I quote from the lecture upon vivisection delivered by Mr. Henry Bergh before the New York legislature. The extract describes the vivisection of horses. Quoting from Mr. Murdock, "a most conscientious and able veterinary surgeon," he (Mr. Bergh) says:

"Here lay six or seven horses, fixed by every mechanical device, by the head and feet, to these pillars, on which the students were engaged in performing different operations.

"The sight was truly horrible!

"The operations had begun early in the forenoon, it now being three o'clock in the afternoon, when we entered the place, so that the poor wretches had ceased being able to make any violent struggles; but the deep heaving of the panting chest, and horrid look of the eyes, where such were yet left in the head—the head itself being lashed to the pillar—was harrowing beyond endurance.

"The students had begun their day's work in the least vital parts of the animals; the trunks were there, but they had lost their tails, hoofs, and ears, etc., and the operators were now engaged in the more important operations, such as tying the arteries, trepanning the cranium, cutting down upon the sensitiv parts, as we were informed, on expressing our horror, that they might see the retraction of the muscles by pinching and irritating the various nerves!

"One animal had the side of the head, including the eye and ear, completely dissected, and other students were laying open and cauterizing the back of the same animal.

"A little bay mare, worn out in the service of man, one of eight, on a certain operation day, having unfortunately retained life throughout the fiendish ordeal, and looking like nothing ever made by the hand of God, with loins ripped open, skin torn and plowed by red-hot irons, riddled by setons, tendons severed, hoofless, sightless, and defenseless, was exultingly reared on her bleeding feet, just when gasping for death, and dying, to show what dexterity had done in completing its work before death took place!"

Here I close the extract. Now, Mr. Foote, how many thousand or hundred thousand slaughtered animals would be required to supply a sum of agony sufficient to counterpoise that of this one poor little bay mare? I deprecate, in the strongest terms, all cruelty in the slaughtering of animals for food, since it is an operation which could be easily accomplished absolutely without suffering (by an electric shock, for example); but to compare the pain of slaughtering to that of vivisecting is like comparing a single grain of sand to the mighty desert.

This is a subject the facts of which I chance to know something about, and I absolutely deny that any discoveries of great value to mankind hav been made through the aid of vivisection. Such statements are the veriest "poppy-cock," and hav been exploded, again and again, by the disciples of true science, as opposed by those of pseudo science.

"Harvey, and the circulation of the blood," "Hunter and the stag," etc., are about used up, as part and parcel of the stock in trade of the medical fraternity, kept to be used as ramparts in their crusade against the friends of humanity.

Do I understand you, sir, to countenance the law (in practice) of "let the strongest liv, and the weakest die," which you quote in your criticism? If so, I disagree, absolutely and entirely, from you. Such is, indeed, the cruel law of nature, and goes far toward making this world the hell it is to so many myriads of earth's creatures; but, for myself, I will fight "to the last ditch," to protect the weak and oppressed against the powerful and the oppressor.

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

An Incident in Paine's Life.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As the friends of humanity and equal rights propose to celebrate the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine, I feel as though a word from an old man of 84 years might be of some interest to those who, like ~~myself, honor the name of Thomas Paine, a man~~ whose whole life was spent in doing good to and for his fellow-man. No man on earth was more unselfish or made greater sacrifices for the freedom of his race than he.

I was brought up on a farm five miles east of Lancaster, Pa. Henry Martin, an old Revolutionary soldier, who enlisted and served through the war, joined farms with us. He was in camp at Valley Forge during that awful winter, when in the darkest hour of the nation's existence, starvation and want of clothing made the situation horrible in the extreme, and few there were who were not ready to desert.

One day a council was held, when a resolution was passed to leave the camp in a body and go out among the farmers of Chester, Montgomery, and Lancaster counties to seek shelter, clothing, and food. When they were about to start, a soldier who had been on picket duty came running through the knee-deep snow and announced the approach of three four-horse teams. All were on the look-out, when a small man was seen making his way on foot through the snow, ahead of the teams and wagons. Notice was given to the officers—who occupied the old stone house in which I hav been living for more than sixty years—of the approach of the teams and little man. All the camp were on the look-out, when the little man said: "Come on, my friends; we hav in yonder wagons clothing, provisions, blankets, and boots and shoes for you."

"Every heart," said Henry Martin, "leaped with joy."

This little man was Thomas Paine. He had gone around and begged anything the citizens and farmers of Philadelphia and vicinity could giv, and bought with his own money flour, meat, etc., and left Philadelphia at 2 o'clock in the morning, and traveled, as the road then ran, twenty-eight miles to Valley Forge. He with his own hands handed out boots, shoes, stockings, mittens, and clothes.

Martin said Paine would cheer them to persevere. "You will," said Paine, "be victorious. Only keep together, and do your duty." "Those three wagon-loads," said Martin, "made us comfortable, and our resolution was rescinded at once. Paine came on foot two weeks afterward with all the papers and books he could carry. No man," continued Martin, "was so beloved in the army as Thomas Paine. He brought to us during that winter loads of luxuries such as we could not get, and when any one of us was sick he would sit by and cheer us. All the soldiers were rejoiced to meet him."

William Kirk, with whom I lived, asked Martin one day if Paine ever carried whisky to the soldiers at Valley Forge. "No," said Martin; "he always would say, when asked to bring us liquor, 'My friends, it is very hard to get you clothes and such food as you ought to hav and cannot do without; but you can get along better without liquor."

Henry Martin was the soldier that climbed into a cherry-tree on the night after the army retreated from Chadsford on the Brandywine and during the massacre by the British. Martin was thus saved. I last saw that cherry-tree fifty years ago.

Martin could never bear to hear a word spoken against Thomas Paine. He often spoke of the great friendship that existed between Paine and Washington and Lafayette, and all the officers of the army. He said Paine at one time got the Quaker girls to form sewing and knitting socials, and in two or three weeks he brought socks, mittens, neckerchiefs, and lots of cakes, boiled hams, pies, etc.—enough for a feast for the whole army. Such acts of kindness and his devotion to the rights of man were evidence of an honest man and a friend to humanity.

When Elias and Willett Hicks called to see him on the day he died, Elias said: "Thomas, had thee not better say that thee might hav been mistaken in thy opinion as to the divinity of Jesus, and by this retraction disarm thy enemies who may slander thy character?" He extended his hand, and said: "Dear friends, I hav nothing to retract. I hav endeavored to do my duty to humanity and my adopted country."

Willett Hicks told this in my hearing in 1831 in Philadelphia. It is a lamentable fact that such a spirit of slander should exist in the orthodox church against Thomas Paine, after a life so devoted to humanity as his. I am glad that the world is waking to its duty to the memory of Thomas Paine.

Battle Creek, January 20th. H. WILLIS.

Elder Willard.

The manner of disposal of Elder Willard's claim, as recited in the following, is respectfully recommended to those senators and congressmen who are considering our army chaplains' back salary grab.

The petition of Elder Willard to the County Board explains itself:

To the Hon. Board of Supervisors of Dodge County:

The undersigned would most respectfully represent that he was elected and acted as County Chaplain for the said County of Dodge for the years 1873 to 1878 inclusiv, and has never received any compensation therefor, although the claim has been repeatedly before the board, and as repeatedly rejected. I claim there is justly due me $10,000, $5,000 for the yearly salary, and $5,000 as accumulated interest; and firmly believing that the present Board will do even and exact justice by your petitioner at this time, I present the above claim, and would refer the Hon. Board, for confirmation of the said claim, to the Hon. Judges Sloan, Lamoreux, and Lewis, and the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Bridges.

All of which is piously and prayerfully submitted.

ELDER WILLARD,
Pastor of the First Broad Gauge church.

At the elder's request the petition was referred to the Committee on Equalization, who made the following report:

To the Honorable Board of Supervisors of Dodge County:

Your committee on Equalization, to whom was referred the petition of "Elder" Willard, in respect to back pay as chaplain of this county, having thoroughly examined the subject matter of said petition, and after due deliberation, long consultation, and mature reflection, respectfully submit the following report:

While we are not insensible to the earnest efforts and continuous labors of our esteemed brother in our behalf, etc., we feel that his influence has not been successful in so far winning us from the ways of the world as to prevent us from using the greater part of our substance in supplying our temporal, physical, and spiritual wants, which condition of things leaves us with no means wherewith to either open a spiritual "jack pot" or "smear" the track of our reverend friend to "kingdom come," where assignments are few, and County Boards fewer. Yet being aware that our brother's perfect faith in a blessed immortality in the "Sweet By and By," is of far more value to him than any amount of sordid gold, or filthy lucre, and knowing that he will remember the example of that Truly Good One who admonished his followers to giv all to the Poor Committee, and follow him with a dude cane and little bag, and offer to a fallen world a salvation free as a bridge appropriation, and priceless as the columns of a ring newspaper, and as we desire to render him all the aid within our power, to render his eternal happiness secure, we offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That an order be drawn on St. Peter, payable on sight at the box office of the New Jerusalem, in favor of Elder Willard, for the sum of $10,000, in the circulating medium of that locality, to be drawn from any funds not otherwise appropriated; it being understood that such order be not transferable, nor shall it subject the drawer to payment of exchange.

J. A. BARNEY,
H. C. J. ENGELBRACHT,
WM. JECHE,
SOLOMON RUDOLF,
GEO. W. MORSE,
C. T. MOUL,
ERNEST DOWE,
ANDREW WILLARD.
} Committee.

Touching remarks were made in support of the report by Judges Sloan and Lewis, laymen of the elder's church, and it was adopted. They doubted their ability to ever be able to collect the money for the elder, but he was so pleased with the Board's good intentions that he was willing to accept the order, take his chances, and giv a receipt in full for his claim, and offered the following resolution, which was also adopted:

Resolved, That the chairman of this Board cause to be published, at his own expense, the petition and claim of Elder Willard and the report thereon in the Beaver Dam Argus, a religious newspaper published at Beaver Dam.

Is Bishop Potter Also a Heretic?

The rage of the clergy over Heber Newton's heresy has not yet subsided. A healthy portion of it, however, is being transferred to the assistant bishop, not for his letter silencing Mr. Newton, but for his remissness in not dragging that individual before an ecclesiastical court for trial. It appears that the senior bishop of the diocese, Mr. Horatio Potter, has given the assistant bishop, Mr. Henry Potter, an ecclesiastical power of attorney to bind and loose, save or damn, and do in all things with the sheep and shepherd as the senior bishop himself would do were he not too old. And it is for failing to unfrock Mr. Newton that the pious are wroth with him.

One irate doctor of divinity charges that the assistant bishop is dodging the issue. When Mr. Potter wrote to Mr. Newton beseeching him to desist from promulgating his heresy, it is claimed he had the power to order the disturber of the faithful from the pulpit.

Another eminent D.D. said that among the papers handed over with the ecclesiastical power of attorney to the new bishop by the old bishop was the presentment of Mr. Newton for heresy. With him alone rests the responsibility of continuing the traitor to Christ in the pulpit.

Nicholas Quackenbos, a lawyer who has figured prominently among the clergy and laity who for nearly a year hav vigorously denounced the Rev. R. Heber Newton as a heretic, said that he and the gentlemen associated with him were not disposed to retreat one inch from the stand they hav taken in regard to Mr. Newton, namely, that the gentleman must either recant or leave the church whose doctrins he has impeached.

"Assistant Bishop Potter, however, is in no sense able," he said, "to comprehend his duty in the premises. One thing is certain, the power to disciplin a rebellious priest rests somewhere in the diocese, and it has always been considered the prerogativ of the bishops to exercise this authority. The gentlemen who are alive to the necessity of settling the question whether Mr. Newton shall continue to preach doctrins subversiv to the tenets of all religion, and do this as a clergyman of the Episcopal church, or whether he shall be deposed from his priesthood, concluded to settle the question of Dr. Potter's powers. With this object in view, and desiring to put the assistant bishop in a stable position, Stephen P. Nash, a member of the standing committee, and a lawyer than whom there is none better versed in the modes of ecclesiastical procedure, drew up an assignment of the bishop's powers in favor of his assistant. Bishop Potter executed this instrument in December, and it has been in the possession of the assistant bishop ever since. It is due to that gentleman to say that he does not consider even this document strong enough to warrant him in suspending Mr. Newton. It is hard to believe, though, that Mr. Nash, knowing the purpose for which the instrument was intended, failed to make it perfect. Men like the Rev. Drs. Morgan, McKim, Decosta, and Houghton, and Prof. Buell, of the theological seminary, are entitled to some consideration," continued Mr. Quackenbos. "All unite in denouncing Mr. Newton's teachings as heretical, and yet, with the issue fairly joined and the presentment made, excessiv ecclesiastical red-tape appears at every point, and meanwhile Mr. Newton stands before the world an accredited minister, and to all outward appearances indorsed by the church whose very foundations he is undermining. The case must come to a trial. It is a false shame which prevents Episcopalians from engaging in a trial because it may cause scandal. A public trial, followed by the deposition of R. Heber Newton, will not stir up one-hundredth part of the scandal sown by one of his sermons. He has attacked the dogmas of the church, and if he desires to continue the warfare let him do it outside the Episcopal church, and not expose us all to contempt. He will without doubt contest the charges by using every technicality, but a judicial proceeding can end but with one result—his expulsion. He has delayed the day of accounting for a long time, and has been ably seconded by many friends among his clerical brethren in staving off the trial; but now there is no retreat—R. Heber Newton must be adjudged heretical in his teachings or the church must revise the Thirty-Nine Articles and the creed; and, to quote Hamlet, 'I'll fight with him upon this theme until my eylids can no longer wag.'"

So it appears that Mr. Newton is only scotched, not slain—silenced but not suspended—under bonds but out on bail. Alas and alack! poor church! poor bishop! poor preacher! They all deserve the sympathy of a laughing world.

But did it never occur to the Christian brethren who are thirsting for the preacher's blood, and upbraiding the bishop for not shedding it, that perhaps Potter believes Newton to be right about the mythical and legendary character of the Old Testament?

The Plymouth Thermometer.

Mr. Beecher preached last Sunday a notable sermon. It partook more or less of the nature of a confession. He has been for thirty years a successful theological trimmer, seeing the truth, but afraid to speak it for fear of the effect upon his congregation and the world. "I take it for granted," he said, "that if I had preached thirty years ago what I preach now, it would hav been the greatest mischief to you—if you had believed it; but for thirty years I hav been cautious; I hav held back. When I think a thing to be true, and hav proved it true, God has given me the courage of explicitness, and of thunder, if need be, to enunciate it." There is much in Mr. Beecher's character that we can admire, but this insincerity is not to his credit, and his congregation must, after this laying bare of his heart, hav their doubts increased. How do they know that his fervid panegyrics of God are not a varnished veneering to conceal his doubts of the existence of that "person?" It may be that Mr. Beecher intends this; but how can they or anyone else be sure of what he means?

Mr. Beecher is in perfect sympathy, he assured his hearers, with what is called the school of advanced thought; for twenty years he has undergone a gradual change in his opinions upon the structure of the Old Testament, which he has corroborated year after year by investigation, so that he has long been prepared to accept the new light that has been let in upon the dogmas of verbal and plenary inspiration—yet after this he thinks "every minister of the gospel should be cautious and careful."

This is the coward's cry. It has been howled in our ears alike by orthodox Christians and conservativ Liberals. "Don't uproot faith in the supernatural, for the consequences may be disastrous." "If people are so bad with religion, what will they not be and do without it?" We hav no patience with such sophistry. If a spade is a spade, call it a spade, and not a shovel. No amount of "caution" and "carefulness" can convert black into white. If Genesis is a legend, say so. If robbing anyone of the belief in miracles causes him to rob his neighbor of his money, shut him up. To all the claptrap of cautious theologians and public teachers Mr. Beecher has himself formulated the unanswerable reply, "Liberty corrects its own mistakes." Believing this, we cannot see why the Brooklyn teacher should in the past hav been so cautious.

Continuing his confession, Mr. Beecher said:

"I must add one thing. The pulpit has no longer that absolute jurisdiction in morals and religion which it once had. A thousand books are doing that which the church ought to hav done. A thoasand able men—scientific—are doing that which if the church won't do will be done for it. Young men read Huxley and Tyndall and Spencer and the rest. If you won't help them they will help themselvs, and if our Sunday-schools go on printing books that are built on the plan of five hundred years ago, and will not explain the truth to our young people, they will grow up outside of the church, and from the outside light be enabled to see that they hav been uninstructed in the church. Then they will become Infidels."

Mr. Beecher has been happily likened to a thermomometer. The theological atmosphere has great effect upon him. His altitude is the altitude of Protestant Christianity. If this be so, the church is in a sorry plight. Seeing the truth, it dare not affirm it, and yet it asks to be accepted as a moral guide. Out upon such whiffling! Either the Bible is a supernatural production or it is the writings of men. Which is it? Let us hav some explicit opinion at last from the pulpit of Plymouth church.

Mr. Beecher said that "the Old Testament has got a great deal of straw upon which the wheat grew. Don't think that we are bound to eat the straw." Of course not. But will Mr. Beecher be so good as to point out a scientific truth, or a historical truth, in the Pentateuch? And will he pick out a work from among all the classics that contains so much immorality as the thirty-four following books that compose the Old Testament. Why, then, is it that "the greatest need in the religious instruction of the young is a wise and judicious instruction in regard to the nature of the Bible—the history of it, the value of it, and wherein the value consists—reverent and helpful, written by men who are in sympathy with the work of God?" If a book could be two things—if it could be false yet true—there might be some sense in this double-dealing, this jugglery of words. But what profit is it to the young, looking at the matter from Mr. Beecher's apparent standpoint, to hav "wise and judicious instruction in regard to the nature of" a falsehood? Much better will it be to use the time in the study of the true. If Herbert Spencer's philosophy is to supplant the scripture, let the young study that, and not waste more time over the Jewish Bible than they do over the Vedas or in a study of Mohammedanism.

The varying states or phases of Mr Beecher's mind are in themselvs no unworthy study. He is a man of almost unlimited influence, of wondrous power, of well-nigh boundless capacity for good. It is a pity he is not more logical, and that he feels the need of dissembling. Years ago he said to Stephen Pearl Andrews: "I thank God, Andrews, that such men as you exist; men who hav the courage to face the world and say the most radical things." If Mr. Beecher could only pluck up the courage he so much admires in others, he might easily be the much-needed new Luther.

Public Lands.

The jobbery in public lands, the abuses of which hav been the theme of many of our contributors, led by Mr. Hacker, to whom hundreds of small farmers in Maine are indebted for the ground they till, is meeting with a quick and practical solution, if Congress is not bribed to inaction by the railroad corporations whose grants are forfeited.

William Steele Holman, of Indiana, has introduced, and the House of Representativs has passed, a resolution containing three points which seem to meet the requirements of the public. The resolution provides, in the first place, that all railroad land grants which hav not been earned by the fulfilment of the conditions specified in the respectiv acts "ought to be declared forfeited and restored to the public domain."

The second part of the resolution declares, in effect, that the whole system of land laws now existing ought to be overhauled and so changed as to open the agricultural portions to actual settlers only, and to prevent grabs of public lands of any kind, whether farming, mineral, or forest. This involves a thorough revision of the Pre-emption, Homestead, Bounty, Timber Culture, and other laws under which private individuals now acquire title to parts of the public territory.

In the third place, the resolution passed on Tuesday puts the land question at the front by providing that the Committee on Public Lands may report its bills at any time, yielding precedence only to revenue and appropriation measures.

If provisions of these resolutions shall be embodied in a law, and put in force, it will redeem in the neighborhood of 100,000,000 acres of land, of which fifteen millions will come from the Texas Pacific Railroad. Congress has, altogether, given to railroads direct, and to the states for the use of railroads, 179,922,528 acres. By the terms of their grants they hav forfeited over one-half of it. This land is worth, in round numbers, four hundred millions of dollars, three hundred and twenty-three millions of which remain unsold in the hands of the railroad corporations. The facts in this matter were set forth some months ago by George W. Julian, a prominent Freethinker, in the North American Review, and in a recent issue of John Swinton's Paper his Washington correspondent has retold them. By means of these immense grants of land the government of the United States has furnished the Pacific railroads about forty per cent of the cost of construction. Besides this, "the subsidized Pacific roads owe the government, in principal and interest, ninety-six million dollars, and the Auditor of Railroad Accounts estimates that in addition to the large amount of interest already paid by the United States the government will pay—though the companies are ultimately responsible—the annual interest on the loan for the next seventeen years, amounting to nearly sixty-six million dollars."

When the corporation first asked for a land grant for a canal in Illinois, their representativs said they wanted it for the purpose of encouraging the development of the country and of internal improvements. This cry, says the correspondent, has been the key-note of every request that Congress has granted ever since. But, after our recent six years of financial stringency:

"Members of Congress began to wonder whether this development of public domain had not been a littte too expensiv, and when they looked into the matter they found that, with very few exceptions, the corporations that had obtained these enormous grants were snapping their fingers at the government and violating almost every condition upon which the grants were contingent. They found that by the conditions of the grant in nearly every case the road to which it went must be completed within a fixed number of years—a condition which, in a majority of cases, might as well never hav been inserted. They found that in nearly every grant there was a provision that the government should hav free use of the road for transportation of troops, etc., and that the government had been hoodwinked into so wording this provision that it amounted to nothing, and the government has to pay transportation prices just as anybody else does. They found that immense sections of land were withdrawn by the Land Office for the roads, so that it was not safe for settlers to go on the lands. Nor could they be opened up and cultivated; nor were they available for taxes; they were just about as valuable for present use as they would hav been if they had been so many sheets of water. They found that there had been over-certification of lands to railroad companies, and they found in general a disregard of obligation on the part of railroad corporations, and a disposition on the part of the government to ignore such disregard. They found, too, that the great Pacific corporation were scheming to avoid their many obligations to the government, and, though checked, they had the authority of the Auditor of Railroad Accounts for the assertion that, without great care and consideration on the part of the government, there was danger that the entire debt these companies owe and will owe the government, amounting at maturity to more than one hundred million dollars, would be lost. With these startling discoveries, efforts were made as early as 1877 to bring the subject to the attention of Congress by discussion. Resolutions declaring the unearned lands forfeited were then introduced. It was then estimated that the passage of such resolution or bill would remit back to the United States not less than 100,000,000 acres of public land, which hav been granted to but not earned by railroad corporations, and which were forfeitable by the failure of these corporations to perform the conditions of their grants. It was then claimed that the reclaiming of these lands would open up to settlement valuable lands that had been withheld for more than twenty years, much of them. This withdrawal of these lands has not only defrauded of their rights thousands of home-seeking settlers, but has also prevented the settlement and development of an immense domain, while the treasury has suffered the incidental losses arising therefrom. It was reported to Congress at this time that the abuses of public faith and public credit that these land grants hav caused demand immediate remedy. It was also said that it would be hard adequately to estimate the loss of wealth and time, because of a failure to develop, from year to year, the material rosources of the extensiv tracts of lands long locked up in land grants to corporations, many of them not deserving the name, being to all intents rings, who are and who had been using their grants as bases of credits with which to enrich their own coffers, at the expense of the hardy tillers of the soil, the prosperity of the country, and of innocent purchasers of their worthless stocks and bonds, without so much as an attempt to comply with the terms of their respectiv grants, and who hav thus made the government a party to their fraudulent transaction."

Nor is this all. Something like three hundred millions of acres more hav been pre-empted by large holders, many of them foreigners, and between the two the small settlers are squeezed out, while our public lands are going without yielding adequate returns, either in money or advancement of civilization. A writer in the Star recently tabulated some of the enormous holdings of companies and individuals. Nearly eight million acres are held by thirty-two individuals. But these are Americans. The foreign holdings are much larger, being given as follows:

Mr. Thomas K. Beecher, a Greenbacker and Labor Reformer, whom Mr. H. L. Green voted for but did not elect, characterized this foreign invasion as "a high-lifting, frowning portent that should startle every intelligent patriot, and cause him to instruct his congressman inexorably to the effect that the ownership of land by non-residents must come to an end; and further, that the ownership of lands in great blocks must come to an end. However plausible, because profitable, their temporary occupancy may be, we cannot afford to repeat in this country the horrible experiences of Ireland."

Such, in brief, are the sins of the corporations, and of the Republican and Democratic politicians. All must admit that the evil is gigantic. The methods by which the railroads acquired their lands were very recently fully exposed by the printing of C. P. Huntington's private letters to his friend Colton relativ to influencing members of Congress by means of "$1,000 down and $10,000 in stock when the bill is passed." Yet it is by some considered doubtful if Holman's resolutions will become a law. The Senate is considered a "bulwark of capital," and it is feared that the grip of the corporations upon some of our law-makers is too strong to be shaken off.

However, the duty of every American citizen is plain—that is, to aid in redeeming for the use of actual settlers the millions of acres squandered by previous Congresses.

A Sensible Bill.

Assemblyman Hunt introduced a bill at Albany last Wednesday, providing for the teaching of hygiene and physiology in our public schools. It was prepared by the temperance people, and is the most sensible thing they hav done for a long time.

Let our children be taught to shun all intoxicating ~~beverages, and the next~~ generation, at least, will be free from the demoralization that marks this. And a great problem will be solved in the only thorough and lasting way: no personal rights are invaded; the most extreme individualists cannot, and we may safely say will not, object. The objects of the prohibitionists will hav been accomplished, and freedom preserved. The study of hygiene and physiology, when supervised by competent teachers, will show that not only is excessiv drinking injurious, but that excessiv eating is nearly as bad. We hav been assured by physicians that the well-to-do people stand in nearly the same danger from the latter as from the former. They gorge themselvs until their digestion is ruined, and then rush to the drug-store for relief. It is needless to say the laborers of the country are in no danger from this source.

The introduction of this bill develops the fact that some of the temperance people of New York hav level heads. It is a pity the railers at the Mormons do not show as much common sense. Polygamy is supported by the Old Testament. Educate the Mormons out of their religious superstition, and polygamy would die of itself. Persecution only makes it thrive.

Mr. Remsburg in New York.

At last the people of this city hav had an opportunity of hearing this favorit orator. Mr. Remsburg lectured before the Liberal Club on the evening of the 25th. Though that body is in some respects one hard to please, the speaker captivated it from the start. The club is made up of all sorts of elements, and a lecturer may consider himself fortunate if he escapes from its criticisms with unshaken confidence in his own mental soundness. But Mr. Remsburg's positions are so well founded in fact as to be positivly unassailable. There was no speculation, no splitting of hairs, but an earnest and eloquent presentation of the naked truth. A more destructiv volley of facts it seems the church never had hurled at her tottering walls. These lectures are, therefore, what the people need. They go straight to the intellect of the hearer, and carry conviction with them. If THE TRUTH SEEKER can do anything to add to the success of Mr. Remsburg, he has its full support and indorsement.

Editorial Notes.

MR. HEBER NEWTON preached last Sunday from Exodus xxxii, 24: "I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf." This was his only allusion to his brethren who are demanding his expulsion from the church.

A GOOD old Christian lady up in New Hampshire has dubbed our Annual "The Devil's Book." This must be flattering to his Satanic Majesty, for when compared with "God's Book" the "Truth Seeker Annual" is in every respect a superior work.

OUR old friend Jeremiah Hacker has printed No. 2 of his "Racing Rhymes." As a poet Father Hacker may be a little crude, but the sentiment he embodies in his verses is honest and true, and they can be circulated with good effect. It is pretty cold weather down in New Jersey now, and we imagin the old gentleman's woodpile is none too big. Send him ten cents or a quarter for some of his rhymes so he can add to it and keep the rheumatism from the limbs of himself and aged partner. Recollect that his address is Berlin, New Jersey.

THE Baptist pastors were warned by Dr. Armitage last Monday at the Pastor's Conference against reasoning with heretics from the pulpit. "Preachers," he said, "need not drill the people in Infidelity to teach them its folly." This is par excellence a coward's refuge. It is a confession that Dr. Armitage, for one, does not dare to giv his congregation the real reason why Infidels abound. He knows that a truthful statement of the Freethinkers' positions and philosophy would increase instead of diminishing their number.

AT the session of the Society for Ethical Culture, held at Chickering Hall last Sunday, Professor Felix Adler said he would begin to-morrow a series of addresses on New York tenement houses. He said that a few members of the society had lately subscribed $10,000 as the nucleus of a fund for the building of at least one model house for the poor, to be managed by the society. He had no doubt the necessary money would be raised for this project, but the real necessities in the struggle for the amelioration of the lives of the poor was that the citizens at large should distinctly understand what the horrors of tenement house life were, and what were the causes from which these horrors sprang. Mr. Adler is doing a gloriously practical work. There is no inconsistency in such a man preaching the gospel of humanity. But what hollow professions are those of the Christian ministers!

"THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL" is winning lavish praise from all sides. Acknowledging the receipt of his copy, Mr. H. L. Green remarks: "I am delighted with it. I had no idea you would succeed in getting out such a splendid publication. It would hav been cheap at fifty cents. You should sell 20,000 copies. I inclose an editorial notice I shall publish in the Directory." The notice he speaks of reads thiswiss: "'The Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac' has made its appearance. It is one of the finest productions that has ever been issued from the Liberal press, and just the thing that the Freethought movement needs. There is a fund of important information contained in its columns that can be found nowhere else. The publishers of this annual hav put the Liberal public under great obligations to them for bringing out this very valuable publication. We can't understand how it can be furnished at the low price of twenty-five cents. No Freethinker can afford to do without it." We thank Mr. Green for his flattering words. After having done a really good thing, it is pleasant to be encouraged. And we take the occasion, as the Sun would say, to renew to our valued friend the assurance of our most distinguished consideration.

THE San Francisco Truth welcomes the National Liberal League to the ranks of the Socialistic revolutionary army. There was once a time when Mr. Haskell, the editor of Truth, had doubts of the honesty of the leaders of the League. Had he not had those doubts "there never would hav been any question concerning their ultimate bringing up under the red flag." These doubts hav now been removed, and Mr. Haskell is most happy to realize that "we hav a new and vigorous band of recruits." If THE TRUTH SEEKER may be allowed to hav a word, we would suggest that Mr. Haskell's Truth is a little premature. The planks quoted were not adopted—they were only submitted to the people for their opinions as to their merits, and can be adopted or rejected as the majority of the delegates to the next congress prefer. To quote the League as being under the "red flag" of Socialism is not correct. It is true that Man has a Socialistic editor, but we do not gather that he is to be allowed to crowd out the legitimate League work. He was taken on, as we understand it, to relieve Mr. Wakeman's great labors, and broaden the scope of the paper. The managers are of course responsible to the League, but as they hav paid all the expenses out of their own pockets, we are, for one, not going to complain.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG'S appointments for the next three weeks are as follows: Norwich, Conn., Feb. 2, 3; Summit Station, N. Y., 5; Bradford, Pa., 7; Olean, N. Y., 8, 9; Salamanca, N. Y., 10; Forestville, N. Y., 11; New Comerstown, O., 13, 14, 15; La Rue, O., 16, 17; Bradford, O., 18, 19; Laura, O., 20; Chesterfield, Ind., 21.

MRS. LAKE writes us that she and Mr. Peck hav been reengaged by the Liberal Society of Ottumwa, Iowa, for the month of February. The Society celebrated the birth of Paine with a dinner, and lecture by Mrs. Lake. The Children's Lyceum, which was organized and is conducted by Mr. Peck, is a success, great interest being manifested by both parents and children.

ONE of the best ways to help along the cause of Freethought is to circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER. Trial subscriptions of three months for 50 cents.

Communications.

Has Man an Immortal Soul,

AN ENTITY, SEPARATE AND DISTINCT OF ITSELF, WITHOUT HIMSELF?—CONCLUDED.

It appears unreasonable, without tangible foundation, against natural evidence, and is very contradictory, obscure, and declamatory. When he says "every seed has its own body;" then, "Thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain," this is too obscure and general to say just what he did mean; but if he says there is a chance for wheat to bear oats, or any other grain, I refuse to stand sponsor to the declaration. I deny that any God ever changed one grain into another, or sowed one body natural and raised a spiritual body out of it. Do you say it was singular that the Jews were so universally uninfluenced by the new dispensation? Is it not a proof of the weak and contradictory manner in which it was advocated? and what other innovation ever had so slim a following in the house of its friends?

It was not singular, for in all the statements of the new pretended philosophy, then announced as being brought to light so miraculously through Christ, and as taught by Paul, there was no lucid explanation of a single element of matter, or spirit, nor any knowledge or mystery talked about or preached about, that they did not know and understand as well as he did. And his own assumptions, ingenious as some of them were, and startling as they are to the ignorant in regard to the future, and in regard to man's position and moral character and God's pretended government, were contrary to those acknowledged to hav been established for the Jews, and in which they believed; and they also knew the new notions were a revamp, and had been existing notions, some of one and some of another pagan authority, and all mixed up to suit the claim, as well as they could, that God himself had come among them in their form and as a man, and suffered death as the only way to save them, to save all men—the heathen included—from an endless misery.

The Jews knew of Christ and his family all that Paul knew; they also knew that Paul's claims for Christ, and for himself, touching his marvelous pretensions and conversion, were false and visionary, and Felix thought him crazy. They still believed their sin-offering valid, and could not and would not believe their God, whom they had known so changeable, had abandoned plans of so many centuries and of such special import to them, his old chosen and favored people. Their whole history had been checkered—at one time struggling in a flood, and never knowing the moment they would hav to die in a war, but in constant fear; death on the right hand and Babel on the left, as the only way God could keep up with them, a change of base often, and now came a proposed change more startling than any they had ever known. The bold declaration was made that God had quit winking, and they must abandon and stop their useless sacrifices and observances; that they were now on a par with the heathen; that everything was changed in plan and command; that they must believe in one man or be eternally damned.

Who could expect them to believe this with their knowledge? Certainly no reasonable, thinking being ought to. They had seen, and knew all about, the pretended miracles and revelations, and how had all these thrown any light on the nature of the elements, or materials, of which only our senses take notice?

If we were so informed that we could understand a miracle, or revelation from infinity, we should be so far infinit, with powers different from those we now hav. No man could disbelieve a miracle, if he had a sense, a power, to know it was one and fully understood it or anything else. Of course this embraces revelation, for an infinite revelation would be a miracle, and would embrace the belief even in a personal or spiritual God. But when understood, it would cease to be a miracle, but we could certainly demonstrate to the understanding of others what we well understood ourselvs. That is more than the Christians' God has ever done, claim as egotistically as they may about it. We cannot, we do not, really know or understand any principle of the elements, their combinations, conservativ or destructiv, their proportions, the duties performed by each, or the influence they hav in combination or separately in the wonderful animal structure of man; and why arrogate to ourselvs this knowledge, knowing we do not possess it? Other animals are as wonderful, and we know as little about them. The vegetable world is full of just such wonders, and we know as little of them. Colonel Ingersoll, in his terse, inimitable, and unanswerable way of stating things, says: "A blade of grass, rightly understood, destroys the orthodox creed." Combinations show by chemical demonstration many wonderful things; they are really the only true demonstrations, the only way man can copy from nature through the elements, of which all animals are inheritors, to show their powers and infinit varieties. Such demonstrations are in a sense miracles to the ignorant. We repeat, we find as astonishing things in the animal world as in man, and also in the vegetable. Let us take brief notice of the animal. If there is a natural-born mechanic, it is a beaver. Each individual beaver, without the aid of our language or books, possesses high mathematical power, can engineer the laying of a dam of resisting force better than a majority of learned engineers can do, with the same materials. Each one is a master engineer, and by some language or understanding they work as a unit. They need no teacher or master; they seem to hav common projects, having for their basis society, and work understanding each other and in concert. In some ages they were revered. "The ancients knew them, and by the religion of the magi it was forbidden to kill them." The animal's senses are very acute, and so delicate is its smell that it will suffer no filth to remain near it.

The dog, independently of his beauty, vivacity, strength, and swiftness, has all the interior qualities which can attract the regard of man. The tame dog comes to lay at his master's feet his courage, strength, and talents, and waits man's orders to use them; he consults, interrogates, and beseeches; the glance of his eye is sufficient; he understands the signs of his will. Without the vices of man, he has all his ardor of sentiment, and, what is more, he has fidelity and constancy in his affections. He is all zeal, all warmth and obedience, more sensible to the remembrance of benefits than wrongs, which he soon forgets, or only remembers to make his attachment stronger. Far from irritating or running away, he even exposes himself to new reproofs; he licks the hand which is the cause of his pain; he only opposes it with his cries, and at length entirely disarms it by his patience and submission. Dogs hav performed wonderful feats, showing sagacity, which would fill volumes, some of which no human sagacity could hav known, or achieved if known, and possess reason and memory in excess of man in many particulars. They are oftentimes sagacious above our comprehension. Read the history of dogs in any good natural history, and retire with respect for the average dog. We hav come in close connection with the dog, and know pretty well what association does. It givs us preference and prejudice, especially in and with what we can adopt to our use or pleasure. Did we know the thousand other living creatures surrounding us as well, we would find some wonderful features and intelligence in all.

All volumes written on such subjects are only a small synopsis of facts that can never be fully written or understood by man, any better than he can understand himself. The universe only holds the full history of anything. What the combined intelligence of man in the universe could write in a trillion years would be a puny, almost undiscoverable book, beside the one containing what they did not know. It would be more difficult to write the true full history of the horse than Bancroft's "History of the United States."

The elephant would compare well, intellectually, with his size if he should be fairly written up. This is perhaps sufficient for our purpose in this direction, until we make the application to our question.

Let us take a bird, the mocking-bird, a description of which we hav personal knowledge.

The plumage of the mocking-bird has nothing gaudy or brilliant about it, but that which so strongly recommends him is his full, strong, and musical voice, capable of almost every modulation, from the mellow tones of the woodthrush to the savage screams of the bald eagle. In his nativ groves, mounted on the top of a tall bush, in the dawn of a dewy morning, while the woods are already vocal with a multitude of warblers, his admirable song rises pre-eminent over every competitor. The ear can listen to his music alone. Nor is the strain altogether imitativ. His own notes are bold and full, and varied seemingly beyond all limit. They consist of short expressions of two, three, or five syllables, are generally interspersed with imitations, all of them uttered with great emphasis and rapidity, and continued for an hour at a time with undiminished ardor. His expanded wings and tail glistening with white, and the buoyant gaiety of his action, arrest the eye, as the song most inevitably does the ear. He sweeps around with enthusiastic ecstasy, he mounts and descends as his song swells or dies away, and, as Mr. Bartram has beautifully expressed it, "he bounds aloft with the celerity of an arrow, as if to recall his very soul, expired in the last elevated strain." While thus exerting himself, a bystander would suppose that the whole feathered tribes had assembled together on a trial of skill, so perfect are his imitations.

The mocking-bird loses little of the power and energy of his song by confinement. In his domesticated state, when he commences his career of song, it is impossible to stand by uninterested. He whistles for the dog. Cæsar starts up, wags his tail, and runs to meet his master. He squeaks out like a hurt chicken, and the hen hurries about with hanging wings and bristling feathers to protect her injured brood.

The barking of the dog, the mewing of the cat, the creaking of the passing wheelbarrow, follow with great truth and rapidity. He repeats the tune taught him by his master, though of considerable length, fully and faithfully.

He runs over the quiverings of the canary and the whistlings of the Virginia nightingale or red-bird with such execution and effect that the mortified songsters feel their own inferiority and become silent, while he seems to triumph in their defeat by redoubling his exertions.

This excessiv fondness for variety, however, in the opinion of some, injures his song. His celebrated imitations of the brown-thrush are frequently interrupted by the crowing of cocks, and the warblings of the bluebird, which he so exquisitly manages, are mingled with the screaming of swallows or the cackling of hens; amidst the simple melody of the robin, we are suddenly surprised by reiterations of the whip-poor-will, while the notes of the kill-deer, blue-jay, martin, baltimore, oricle, and twenty others succeed with such imposing reality that we look around for the originals, and discover with astonishment that the sole performer in this singular concert is the admirable bird before us. This sketch does only weak justice to this bird's great power. No human voice or skill has ever obtained such mastery of sound.

No musician, with the best instrument, or many in concert, hav ever been able to execute such a variety of original and imitativ sounds. To do so requires instant application of a stored mind and intelligence, in which ear and voice are only aided by a reasoning, correct memory, willing, wishing, and knowing beforehand what they intend to do. Is it answered that it is all instinct and natural?

How does it explain anything to say it is natural any more in a brute, bird, or flower than in man? It never proves anything, but simply declares it is not of man's originating, when we say a thing is natural. That is the very question—whether man has any superior powers or elements, different from those of other animals. We need not go on with endless facts to show comparisons of reason in brutes, birds, and fish, and even in reptils and insects, strikingly parallel to man; and the potato growing in the dark corner of the cellar, running toward the light with unerring certainty, staggers the mind of the philosopher as much to answer the reason why as any supposable question can; and we could go on and on in the vegetable world, the inanimate world, and find as inscrutable and unexplainable wonders. The only difference seems to be in elementary combinations. Different proportions and mechanical structure, the differentiation or proportionate parts, at first adapted to one set of circumstances, location, light or darkness, air or water, and then to another, evolving for ages, may be all the difference, according to evolution, yet in such a vast aggregation very little can be certainly affirmed. The activ principles engendered or existing, the life, must be alike, of the same kind, from the same source, and, as we hav already seen, could not exist, so far as we know, without the sun; equally mysterious in the beast, bird, or flower, as in man. Even inanimate matter is held together by a power undefinable by man.

Matter, in its combinations and proportions, is, as far as demonstrated by science or mechanics, or any human knowledge, the cause as well as the result, or the cause and result, and it thus conserves in proper, rather certain, combinations to its own form and existence. Any failure, then, of the parts, or combination of parts, or change of parts in the whole individual or thing, they then disintegrate, and naturally and certainly each seeks its relativ place in the elementary whole, or changes to new and continued combinations, which are constantly repeating themselvs in like manner, and all hidden from human knowledge alike.

The universe pays all drafts by the individual, and can well afford it, for it is as constantly receiving back, to the separate and respectiv elements, what has been taken by some individual whole or parts. It maintains its balance no matter what man may say or believe. It can change no single fact in the universe, whatever man believes, or does not believe. Let us make one example from combination. Take a well constructed violin, completely furnished, strings and bow, and every part of the best material and proportion, they must all be in place and hav something else or might as well remain dumb. Greese will not answer, you must "rosin the bow." It cannot then play itself, is inanimate and dead. It is a wonderful piece of mechanism and parts, but the man who had never seen one would hav no idea it could be made to produce a sound; he would find out by touch and never otherwise. When he learned and heard the sound, his ear would be interested, perhaps, and find how to wake him up to the production of its sounds. The whole parts must combine with his combination; application and knowledge must join the class to make and ever reproduce.

A single string, peg, bridge, or part, rosin, finger and hand to bow, one gone and it is ruined for perfect music. Take the same material and make a box of it, tie or wind strings around or over it, make every effort with a bow well rosined, and there is no violin music. A million such could not be made to utter good violin sounds.

One will say it takes human reason, and in addition to your other requirements, the exercise of a will and intelligence to master its sounds, remember them, or reduce them to writing, so they can be reproduced by others. There must be great memory to guide the ear, the hand to bow, the finger to divide, and the thousand nice intricacies and sentiments connected with a masterly execution or playing the instrument. Granted also that it takes reason and will; but Blind Tom's brain, they say, was not lighted with a single ray. In the dark corner of his idiot brain something sparkled like a diamond when he touched the instrument to call for sound, and his ear justified his reason on that point. Memory, the most notable of reason's attributes, enabled him to play a difficult composition the first time he listened to its execution by another, no matter how difficult, and the great master with educated ear could only stand by astounded, his acknowledged reason, memory, and vast musical attainments falling short of such musical intelligence guided by the uneducated ear.

Back there in that black idiotic head, lighted by no human lamps, was reason enough to enable him to perform so wonderful a feat, and excel the most studied and famous musicians.

Call the same manifestations and exhibited powers reason in Black Tom and the mocking-bird, or cease to call it reason anywhere. Call it reason in the tens of thousands of examples of the consistency and sagacity of brute animals, birds, and fish, even insects—that by united society ties provide for the safety of all, not part, that lay up stores by their industry, incur no vicious habits, never attack man, except for preservation—or cease to call inconsistent man the only possessor thereof.

Understand and learn, and prove it, if a fact, that man possesses powers and elements other animals do not, or that any other combination of man's material would make such a man; that any intelligence or thought can exist without any element, material or part, and we are bound to listen, and will listen, to your proofs.

If you understand our position, hav you not seen that such proofs are impossible with human beings, even with their use of language and science, unless you believe in miracles of infinit revelations.

The miracle and revelation business has evidently outlived its usefulness in the minds of a large number of the laity, and is not accredited to-day by the intellectual world. Many things combine to make men conceal or not reveal their real belief. But enough contrary belief (not unbelief) is avowing itself against the Bible as being divine, and against the unreasonable one-sided creeds founded thereon, to make the churches and pretended believers look around them; and their establishments seem to hold a majority of the dry bones and whited sepulchers, as some in the interior, in one way and another, are daily acknowledging. When we hav good knowledge enough to acknowledge that we cannot and ought not to believe without proof, or on a simple say so, and confess that publicly we can save a vast amount of intellectual labor, vast sums of money and time, which are now unjustly obtained from somebody, and which hav been so lavishly expended on matters of mere authority, faith, and fancy, and can apply it to the finding out and proving what we do or do not know, what we can reasonably believe, and what we ought not in reason to believe, the millennium will then hav come. There must be a contrary belief, a universal disbelief in miracles and revelations.

The question is not now, but ought to be, open to all men, with a right to show and demonstrate, so far as they can, what is or is not reasonably proven, and until then the question can never be as well settled. Intelligent persons must become free and intelligent thinkers, we must hav Freethinkers.

Whether matter always existed, was first, is all there is, fills all space conceivable, to the exclusion of myths and spirits, and in its infinit combinations causes all effects, as seems to us reasonable; or whether mind and intelligence always existed and was first, inconcivable and alone, and then and there created matter out of nothing—a thing no more inconceivable than how matter came to exist, but extremely ridiculous as a proposition; or whether mind and matter hav always existed, are each eternal, and conduce conjointly and unitedly to produce all life's demonstrations and phenomena, which could not be produced by either alone, is of small importance to us as human beings. Neither of them affords us any certain evidence that man exists hereafter, or has any duplicate being. All of them are insufficient to enable man to fully understand anything, even the workings and powers of his individual combination.

He cannot tell how or why he thinks, or his ear hears, his nose smells, his palate tastes, his body feels, or his eye sees, as he can demonstrate any known fact. He is as far from the first cause of the senses as he is from the first cause of the universe. Being unable and failing to interpret his own present being and its combinations, how can he interpret a duplicate of itself without himself and that is to be immortal?

It is all-important that we know that right and wrong cannot change places, and any claim that a God made us, to be finally immortal, and without our fault, knowledge, or consent, made us in such a way and manner that there is any possible chance that a single being so created is to be eternally miserable, is an eternal falsehood, or this pretended God is an eternal fiend, or does not know the difference between right and wrong. The Christian Bible and creeds teach such a creation by a God powerful enough to fulfil its conditions, which can be escaped in only one way, the innocent suffering for the guilty, thus wrong taking the place of right. We shall refuse to follow such teaching and the doctrin of that new dispensation set out in that book, trying to teach man's separate and double existence. If Christians can take pleasure in believing in such a creation, that the teachings of their book are inspired and infallible, in following Paul's lead, and believing that man is a double being or ever will be, they ought to be reasoned out of it, or allowed that pleasure, so they treat others respectfully who believe to the contrary.

Although it seems impossible to prove that man has a dual existence, it can be proved satisfactorily, and believed sincerely, that every element in man and matter, yea! in the vast universe, so far as we can conceive, is eternal, but subject to such changes that no human reason can follow them, and this mysterious existence here is just as mysterious as some combination may be made, not contradicted absolutely, because we do not see through the blank death seems to create. All we may hope proves nothing, and what changes are made by death none has ever solved or proved. Hence the true Agnostic says, "I neither affirm nor deny." A. W. Wood.

Letters from Friends.

Burton, Texas. Jan. 1, 108.

Mr. Jno. A. Rutherford, Dear Sir: Noticing your epitaph composed by yourself in The Truth Seeker reminded me more forcibly of our neglected duty as Liberals. It has ever been the purpose of the orthodox, especially those of pulpit notoriety, to proclaim lies on deceased Liberals, and make it appear that in the last hour they retracted, and renounced their skepticism, advising friends not to follow their course, etc., etc.; and the greater the influence of the deceased the more persistent are they in circulating those lies. The calumny heaped upon that noble benefactor of his race, Thomas Paine, would form mountains high. Their good book teaches them in more than one place that lying is commendable when Christians thereby can be made; and this is strictly adhered to bv them.

Therefore I think the time has come when we truth seekers should unite and agree upon some appropriate service to be performed over our bodies at the grave, by one of our belief, and positivly exclude any sky-pilot's harang whatever. Of course it don't affect us then, let be said what would be, but it is a duty we owe our glorious cause. We are—or should be—doing all we can to advance Freethought, and therefore exterminate superstition, the huge curse of all curses. Perhaps nothing has tended stronger to advance their cause than the belief taught by the clergy and their dupes, that in the hour of demise the future is revealed and all the horrors of hell are viewed then by the sinner, whilst that beautiful land of paradise is welcoming the Christian, and smooths the dying pillow, making death a pleasure instead of sorrow. They well know this huge lie cannot be impeached by the victim, hence all sorts of lies are concocted to frighten their dupes. Therefore I say it is time we should take this thing in hand and thus cripple one of their strongest recruiting points. Many of us Liberals are too backward in upholding our cause. Simply because it is unpopular, the truth should not be ignored. Let every honest Liberal glory in his cause, and swerve not from duty on account of filthy lucre. Some hav suffered martyrdom for the cause; let it not languish now for the sake of paltry gain.

Hoping you many years more of happiness in this life, and that we may hav the pleasure of meeting, not above, but on earth, I remain

Your friend and brother. H. B. Jones.

Cleveland. Dec. 29, E.M. 283.

Mr. Editor: I received the twelve copies of "False Claims" all right, and hav scattered them around where I think they will, in time, do some good; at least, I hope so. Mr. Remsburg delivered his lecture on Thomas Paine before the League on Thursday last, and the hall was well filled with a select audience. The League is in a prosperous condition and is steadily increasing in numbers. We hav found it necessary to secure a larger hall already, as the present one will not accommodate the League. The new hall is in the same block however. We intend to put forth stronger efforts the coming year (284) to make the League a grand success. And let me say that we do not know what the word fail means, at least, we don't intend it shall hav anything to do with us. We are having a discussion every Sunday on some topic, and the meetings are exciting some notice, for some of our reverend D.D.'s, hav taken it upon themselvs, as is most becoming their holy calling (and in accordence with their most merciful God), to do all they can to slander and abuse our League. But let them go on, they can't hurt us any, but will help our cause more than they think. I am doing all I can for the cause and will keep right on. It is comical to see how pitiful some of my Christian friends will look at me and say, "Denny, my dear boy, you must change your ways or you are lost." How thoughtful they are for my welfare! And when I ask them to explain certain passages in the Bible, as a general thing, they hav some business that demands their immediate attention and cannot take time to answer, which looks bad for their side of the question. Well, I must say that when I take my Bible and look over its pages I wonder how it is that any one, claiming any intelligence at all, can believe it to be the word of a God. It seems almost impossible that any one could read the Bible, with its glaring contradictions all through it, and accept it as the divinely inspired word of a God. And then to ask the people to put the Bible, which is the most obscene book that was ever published, in our public schools as a standard from which to teach children how to be moral and virtuous! To think that people can be so blind. If you could only get them to read the Bible it would be all right, but they won't do that even, and I do honestly believe that not over one Christian out of a thousand ever read more than one-fifth of the Bible, and that one, if he remained a Christian, was so blinded with faith that he would not see a contradiction when he read it, and could not tell you of it five minutes after if he did. Dennis Lossing.

East Chatham, Jan. 2. 1884.

Mr Editor: Since I hav been favored with the perusal of your ever-welcome journal, and through your indulgence been permitted to contribute occasionally to its columns, I find myself in a new and interesting field of social intercourse, an enjoyment doubly dear to me at my advanced age, after being separated from nearly all of my early associates, relativs, and friends, who hav passed "to that mysterious realm where each shall take his chamber in the silent halls of death," and from whom I hav not as yet received any reliable instruction concerning the future.

Notwithstanding, within the last few weeks, I hav received several friendly communications from strangers still in the flesh, besides copies of various Liberal and Spiritual journals. Although not a Spiritualist I hav no feelings hostil to their faith and theory, inasmuch as they hav no endless hell for us if we should fail to guess right on all the complicated questions of baptism, the trinity, the atonement, the infallibility of the pope, etc. And I feel gratified that there is so much fellowship and good feeling existing between us, and I hope, if we are to exist hereafter, we will be able to commune together on friendly terms without being separated by that great impassable gulf that lay between poor Lazarus in Abraham's bosom and the rich man in hell as represented in the old book that has befogged the brain of humanity so long, as I hav a near relativ and warm friend who now occupies a prominent position in the Spiritual ranks, from whose pen I hav lately received an editorial in the Spiritual Light, published at Chattanooga, Tenn., setting forth, in detail, many of his prominent beliefs in Spiritualism, most of which are self-evident; but with my limited opportunities and lack of scientific knowledge, as in the different articles that hav appeared The Truth Seeker on the question of "Mind and Matter," I cannot clearly comprehend any theory opposed to the material stand-point. But my Spiritual relativ and friend seems to attempt to flank this, my position, with his belief in matter and spirit, as indivisible, or, as he expresses it, "I believe in matter and spirit, that fine etherealized matter is spirit, that gross spirit is matter, and that which is not material, or substantially something, is nothing." And he further says, "I am fully convinced that spirits who are capable may and do manifest themselvs to and hold intercourse with people in earth life, that some of the communications are good and truthful, while others are false and deceptiv, that their character depends very much upon the character of the parties giving and receiving the intelligence."

Now this last announcement seems to strike my intuitions quite unfavorably, as I had always involuntarily entertained the idea, if this was really a probationary life, and if our merits or demerits here were to attend us in the future, that when we passed to the unknown there could be no opportunity or motiv for fraud or deception, but all would be unalterable reality.

However, be this as it may, as our belief or unbelief cannot change the future, and we hav vast interests in common here upon which we cannot reasonably disagree, as we know, to a moral certainty, that the old fabulous story that has undermined the happiness of human life and held in mental bondage so many of our race, that an omnipotent god (who knew in the beginning what the end would be) has made such horrible mistakes as to even "repent that he had made man," as "every imagination of the thoughts of his heart were only evil continually," etc., I say what rational mind but must rejoice at the inroads the collectiv forces of Liberalists are now making among the rank and file of the old church, as one of the strongest evidences of the progress we are making is the manifest effort and anxiety made by the combined forces of Protestants, and even Catholics, in defending and sustaining their old creeds and dogmas by defaming and vilifying the unanswerable defenders and advocates of Freethought. Yes, even Catholics against Protestants hav layed aside their axes and old weapons of torture and are now calling right lustily for help.

As an evidence of this fact, I was lately handed for perusal a small book of some two hundred pages, entitled, "Notes on Ingersoll," written bv a Catholic, Rev. L. A. Lambert, of Waterloo, N. Y., and prefaced and published by Rev. Patrick Cronan, of the Buffalo (N. Y.) Catholic Publication Co., in which preface we find the following: "Regarding these [Notes] as a complete annihilation of the pretentious scoffer, and desirous that they should reach a much larger public than could be secured by newspaper circulation, the writer pointed out to the author the advisability of having just such writings as the 'Notes' spread broadcast in the interest of religion, and especially at this time." The author adds in the preface that these "Notes" are written from the broadest Christian standpoint, so they ought to be as welcome to all who believe in Jesus Christ, and in the revelation he has made, as to Catholics. What a happy union it would be if these old contending elements could for once wipe out the cruel, brutal records of the past, where dissenters hav been tortured, roasted, and slaughtered by tens of thousands to sustain the Catholic creed, pope, and priesthood, and come together in unity, for it seems that thev are aware that the common people are heartily sick of their confinement in the old barnyard inclosure, and feeding on bog hay, and being filled with the east wind—that thousands of them are now in the open, glorious fields of Freethought, enjoying the sunshine of reason, with the full rights of private opinion. In quoting from the "Notes" we find the following arguments on the laws of nature:

Ingersoll: "To make myself clear, water always runs down hill."

L. A. Lambert: "How, then, did it get up the hill? Or is there a perennial spring up there? Water does not always run down hill. To run down hill is an exception to the general mode of the action of water. In the present condition of the physical world the tendency of water is upward and outward. This will be admitted of water in the form of steam or vapor. The water that falls as rain has been first taken up by the sun's heat. Water runs up in the capillary tubes of every vegetable that grows. More water ascends in the capillaries of the vegetable world in one day than falls over Niagara in a year. Water runs up in all rivers that run toward the equator. The Mississippi river carries its waters up an inclined plane, a perpendicular distance of about four miles."

Who would hav "thunk" it? And yet this profound work has appended some thirty favorable opinions of the press, and we must still quote the Christian's charitable, refined sentence: "Of course we do not expect him to reply to us for several reasons. First, he won't want to; second, he can't; third, he can pretend not to notice an obscure country pastor. Very well. Then let some of his disciples or admirers try to rehabilitate his smirched character." etc. Our popular Catholic father in this locality has been circulating these "Notes" in this section quite extensivly, with, I presume, none to object, as I saw at the Rochester Liberal Convention while in session full liberty was given to parties interested in the work to circulate them without restraint.

JOHN M. BARNES.

EUREKA, WIS, December 28, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6. to be applied as directed. Occasionally I hav noticed articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the subject of how Freethinkers should conduct their funerals, and as this is an important subject, I hope to see more of the same kind. The time was when it was thought the services of a minister were indispensable at all weddings and funerals; but that time has passed, or is passing away. People are finding out that they can get married or bury their dead without the benefit of clergy. As far as I am concerned, I made up my mind some time ago that no minister would be called upon to officiate either at a wedding or a funeral where I had the control.

I also noticed a few weeks ago in THE TRUTH SEEKER something relativ to the number of church-members in the country compared with those belonging to no church. The idea suggested itself to me that a good way to get at the facts would be for Freethinkers all over the country to canvass their neighborhoods, whether cities, towns, or villages, and ascertain the facts on the subject. In furtherance of this idea, a few days since I took down the names of all the heads of families—voters—on the different streets in this little village, until I reached the number of seventy-six, and the result is as follows: Belonging to no church, 55; Methodists, 12; Catholics, 6; Episcopalians, Baptists, and Adventists, 1 each; and as to standing in society, either morally or intellectually, those belonging to no church will not suffer when compared with those that do.

E. B. ROUNDS.

FRESNO CITY, CAL., Jan. 14 1884.

MR. EDITOR: C. B. Thompson, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 5th, represents alcoholic drink to be the greatest curse that ever befell the human race. He made the assertion. Will he be so good as to giv some proof, as I do believe the Christian church has done more and greater evil than alcoholic drink, and is still a greater evil and greater curse to humanity.

GEORGE PADDINGTON.

SOUTH BEND, IND., Jan. 12. 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a money-order for a year's subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav read several copies which were handed to me by a friend, and was very highly pleased with it. May the time come when we will arrive at that stage of civilization when our guesses will be replaced by proven facts, and when man will be honest and brave enough when he reflects his imaginary mind in the dark unknowable to have the conscience of heart and the audacity of genius to say of unsolved problems, "I don't know."

Yours very respectfully, D. N. STRAUP.

SCRANTON, PA., Jan. 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am an old reader of the well-named journal founded by D. M. Bennett. I thought when they got him in prison THE TRUTH SEEKER would go up, and again, when he left on his trip around the world, I thought it would damage and weaken the charging column. But it ceased not to pour in its well-aimed shot and shell among the ranks of the enemy, gaining ground and, after hot pursuit, capturing guns and manning them from the fleeing ranks. But when the general who commanded Fort Bennett was compelled to evacuate his place forever, my hands fell by my side. I waited, and when the storm was past, and while the dirt was still fresh over the gallant hero, I looked and beheld the flag, and the bow of promis in the heavens; and the mantle of the greater than a prophet had fallen upon worthy and able shoulders. Let us sing, We still hold the fort of reason and truth, which is destined to destroy the dungeons of gloom. Go on, noble TRUTH SEEKER! Yours, L. M. BUNNELL.

JOPLIN, Jan. 12, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: While we hav many truth seekers in our town—good men and true—there is not any activ work done, and no proselyting. The Liberals of this town are, as a class, above reproach. We need, as it were, "warming up." The church element is largely represented and somewhat aggressiv. As usual, however, they are far from prompt in paying the parson. Even now several of our young ladies are soliciting the faithful to chip in toward th dear preacher's salary. How is it that preaching the gospel generally reduces a man to pauperism—he having to beg for his salary. Most of the faithful seem to want a reserved seat in the capacious bosom of Abraham, but want it deadhead. Please enlighten us ignoramuses.

Can you refer me to some Liberal friend in Los Angeles, Cal., or vicinity? We want some reliable information in regard to that country, but do not want "emigration papers." By getting the name of some Liberal friend from you we will write to him.

Yours faithtully, J. HEINRICHS & BRO.

[Will some of our subscribers living in the locality described please giv the desired information?—ED.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Jan. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It pleases and gratifies me to watch the progress which unbridled reason is making. The medium through which I receive most of my information in regard to that progress is your ably constructed, powerfully manned, and very interesting TRUTH SEEKER. This I receive every Saturday at R. I. News Co.'s.

I learn there that there are two or three other recipients of the paper in this place, and I shall endeavor to increase the number.

Please find inclosed 25 cts. for Billings's "Crimes of Preachers;" also find some other matter, which you may use as you see fit.

I would like to ask you one question, which I hope you will answer in THE TRUTH SEEKER. If you had a loving and dutiful wife, and an interesting daughter, the wife believing in Christianity and wishing to hav the daughter attend a Christian Sunday-school—being an Infidel yourself—how would you act in the matter? In other words, would you advise me, who honestly believe that the Christian education there received would result in detriment, rather than benefit to the child, to consent or refuse? Yours very truly, WM. P. BLYTHE.

[The first principle of Liberalism is, No coercion. When the daughter is taught biblical falsehoods, present the evidence to her that shows them to be falsehoods. Teach her evolution, and let her compare its grand truths with the pueril absurdities of Genesis. Show her how impossible it is that her sins can be atoned for by the death of a man eighteen hundred and fifty-five years ago. When her Sunday-school teacher tells her to be good because it is so written in the New Testament, explain the morality of the Utilitarian philosophy, and she will at once see its superiority. A morality dependent upon rewards and punishments is unstable and degrading to men and women. The young should be taught to do right because it is right, and for the beneficent influence righteous conduct has upon their own lives and the lives of others. A healthy child will take to the bright sunshine of the Liberal philosophy of life in preference to the gloom of orthodoxy and hell. Above all things, be loving with child and wife. Lead them by love and common sense. A generous education is the best antidote to superstition. Good books and papers are the best companions of childhood. If exerted, a father's influence is sufficient to save a son or daughter from growing up trembling slaves to the church. If the minister obtrudes in a disagreeable way, slap his face—metaphorically.

But the best way to thwart the church when it throws its slimy tentacles over the young is to unite and start a Sunday-school so much superior in its entertainment that the children will want to go to no other. This ought to be done in every place, and we confidently expect to see the time when it is done.

It is a delicate thing to advise as to family matters, and we do not propose to do it. But perhaps Mr. Blythe can get some ideas from what we hav said that will solve the problem without a conflict. —ED. T. S.]

FRATTON, PORTSMOUTH, ENG., Jan. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav inclosed a post-office order for 10s. 5d. to Charles P. Somerby for a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. You will find that my subscription is good up to March 15th next, as your card in my possession shows. I thought that no harm could be done in transmitting early to inform you that it is our intention to still subscribe (the members of the Portsmouth branch of the National Secular Society).

I am pleased to learn that you hav several able lecturers in the states.

The Radicals of this country are anxiously looking out for February 5th, when Mr. Bradlaugh will again present himself to the House of Commons to take his seat for Northampton. The Tories and Bigots are making him and our cause popular in this country. One may sympathize with them by saying, "O Lord, forgiv them, for they know not what they are doing."

Allow me to wish you a prosperous year—I would also say happy. I would wish it as much as possible. It cannot be all happiness to those who are fighting Christian bigotry; yet there is a pleasure in so doing. With kind regards, I remain yours sincerely,

JOHN E. BRUMAGE.

LAKE CITY, IOWA, Dec. 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find amount to settle for THE TRUTH SEEKER for a year from next May, and 25 cents for "Crimes of Preachers," the balance of what I sent to go for a number of Remsburg's "False Claims."

I wonder if THE TRUTH SEEKER's readers hav read the Chicago Inter-Ocean of December 19th. If not, it would be hard for them to sympathize with its editor as they should do. His grief appears to be almost too great to bear. Yes; you could hardly believe it, but the good and great Dr. McCosh has gone and done it. He has evoluted, to the great injury of God, Christ, and humanity. And then to think they let the great Dr. Patton go to grind in the same mill!—worse and more of it. But the editor has some comfort in knowing that Talmage still livs and is warming it to Ingersoll. Yes, friends, read the extracts from Talmage's lecture in the paper mentioned above, and see how big a liar and blackguard a man may make of himself.

We hav had quite a protracted meeting held by the Disciples here. It has just closed. They got ten or fifteen converts—nearly all babes and sucklings, who joined because their parents told them to. But they will all be dancing again in less than six months, if they are large enough to keep from under grown people's feet. With best regards to one and all, I am Truly yours, J. L. TOMPKINS.

BERLIN, N. J., Jan. 9, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading the lecture of J. E. Remsburg, delivered at the Rochester Convention, and I want every Liberal to read it. There are a number of good lecturers in the Liberal field, and it is no disparagement to any of them to say that there is no better one than J. E. Remsburg. I hav had my eye on him ever since he came before the public, and here and now nominate him as a future President of these United States—"and don't you forget it."

If all Liberals will come out boldly from the rotten churches, and rotten political parties, and do all they can to spread Liberal truth, they may elect a president within ten years. Infidels, Agnostics, Spiritualists, Free Religionists, and all other Liberals, though they may not agree in their theories about religion and a state after death, may consistently work together in harmony in regard to the things of this world, and if they would unite at once they could elect the next president—and I would like to liv long enough to see Remsburg in that office. He don't court the favor of presidents, nor toady around the big bugs; is not in favor of an aristocracy of any kind, but is with the people and of the people—is laboring for the people, and is willing for a workingman to line his vest with "good fat capon," as well as the millionaire or any other useless loafer.

Three cheers for J. E. Remsburg, our future president—if all workers do their duty! J. HACKER.

Story of a Little Mouse.

I'll tell you a tale of a little gray mouse
That lived in the pantry of grandma's old house;
He nibbled the pastry, the cake, and the cheese,
Then gamboled about at his pleasure and ease.

The moment he heard grandma open the door,
He'd scamper away to his hole in the floor;
While grandma, amazed at the loss of her cake,
Would think it was Billy, or else little Jake.

At last she espied mouse's crumbs lying round,
And said, "Ah, the rogue! he must surely be found."
And so she went hunting all over the house,
But naught could she find of the little gray mouse.

For mousey was cunning, it must be confessed,
And kept very still in his snug little nest,
Until all the hunting and searching was o'er,
Then into the pantry he went as before.

He climbed on the table, then ran up the shelf—
To cake rich and creamy went helping himself;
Then into the cheese-box he poked his gray nose,
And even the butter showed marks of his toes.

One day little mousey came out as before,
And scattered the cake-crumbs all over the floor,
Until of its richness he'd eaten his fill,
Then up he went, climbing a shelf higher still.

A jar partly filled with some rich, golden cream,
Was partly concealed by a large wooden beam.
"Now for a feast," said the mouse with a sigh,
"If I can but reach it—at least, I can try."

And so he leaped up to the edge of the jar,
And took a peep down, but the cream was too far.
With all his exertion, it just touched his chin,
And he then lost his balance and tumbled right in.

The cream filled his nose, it filled up his eyes,
It filled up his mouth, and it stifled his cries.
He struggled and struggled, but all was in vain;
The cream drew him under again and again.

At last all was silent; not even his head
Was seen in the cream-pot for mousey was dead.
With rich satisfaction did pussy's eyes gleam,
When she feasted on mousey all covered with cream.

Miss Marie Gold's Party.

Once upon a time Miss Marie Gold gave a party—a garden party; and invited all her friends and neighbors. She was all fixed up for the occasion, in a gay yellow dress, ruffled clear to her neck. Her hair was fastened with a "devil's darning-needle"—but you need not be afraid of this high-sounding hairpin, for it is only the common title of a harmless insect that Marie had caught that morning to do duty at the party. With a fan fashioned from a white miller's wing, Miss Marie stood awaiting her company, while Mr. Sunflower held a green umbrella over her head.

Presently the guests began to arrive in great numbers, all dressed gayly in their best. Like all similar assemblages, they were a little stiff and formal at first, but soon became more at ease, and laughed, chatted, danced, sang, and gossipped easily and pleasantly. The musicians were Mr. Robin's two sons, a Mr. Oriole, and Prof. T. Toad's brass band.

"Pray, who are those young gentlemen in green, standing outside so stiffly?" inquired Miss Slipper, stretching out one tiny white foot.

"Oh, those are the Box brothers," replied Miss V. Pink, smoothing out her rich velvet dress. "Very quiet, well-behaved boys, but quite reserved."

"Well, if I sha'nt giv it up if there isn't old Mrs. Hollyhock and her daughters!" exclaimed one of the Zenia girls. "I suppose the old lady thinks those great coarse, fat girls are beauties."

"I think they appear very well," said Miss Aster, a German girl of fine figure. "They are always full of fun; their dresses are pretty, too—so soft and silky; and when they wear flounces they are just elegant, I think."

"I do not think the Zenia tribe need to make remarks about other people," said Polly Primrose, pettishly. "They are no great shakes, anyhow. They know how to make a great show, and that's all."

"And they're as tough as owls, and proud as peacocks. But they do get a fall sometimes, though. I laughed so, the other day, that I almost split my sides, to see old Mr. Boreas come prancing along with his cane, and one of those tall girls was in his way, and he brushed against her so hard that she tumbled down, right in the dirt," and Miss Pinkey, a prim old maid, laughed and nodded her head in great glee. "They're very proud of their beauty," she continued, "but, for my part, giv me that little Petunia girl in her crimson dress, or her sister, who always wears white, and carries such nice perfumery about her. They are so good-natured, too! Why, I hav seen Jack Frost pinch them dreadfully, and they only laughed in his face."

"Who are those three gentlemen flirting so with the Balsam sisters?" inquired Miss Cora Opsis.

"Oh, they are three old bachelors by the name of Button," answered a little miss in a red satin dress. I really believe they would flirt with their grandmothers. One of them, I think, is making love to Marie Gold herself, for he sticks close by her all the time. How showy she is, to be sure! Do you think she is handsome, Mr. Candy Tuft?"

"Vell, I cannot zay ze is—that is, ze is not the style for me." Mr. Candy Tuft, being a foreigner, spoke with a slightly foreign accent, but he was dressed in very good taste, and always wore a white hat.

Miss Pride, of London, came in dressed in scarlet, and immediately one of the old bachelors nodded familiarly, and they walked off together, nearly trampling on little Sweetie A. Lyssum, who, modestly cuddled up in a corner, was hardly noticed by the crowd.

But all the girls went nearly crazy when Col. Nasturtium came with his regimentals on, and a very handsome parasol in his hand. He related many tales of his patriotism, and, to show his agility, he ran right up a tree, and without a word kissed Virginia Creeper, who was swinging in the tree, watching Jenny Wren feed her little babies with some delicate green worms.

Then there was another very handsome young man that some of the girls seemed very fond of, and others did not seem to care a row of pins for. His name was William, and those who liked him called him "Sweet William." He seemed to be quite attached to little Miss Pansy, who was certainly very charming in purple and gold colored velvet. Red Poppy made believe she was asleep, but she said she heard him say to Pansy, "O my dear little heart's-ease! you are my heart's delight, and in all this gay assembly, there is none as pretty as you!"

Pansy blushed and hid her face behind her dark-green fan, while she called him a "gay deceiver."

Some members of the Rose family overheard Sweet William too, but they merely tossed their beautiful heads and said nothing. They thought, however, that William was mistaken in thinking little Pansy prettier than everybody else, for were not they acknowledged beauties, all over the world?

Just then, a yellow butterfly came boldly into the garden and kissed everyone present, except the Zenia girls, and one or two others, without so much as saying, "By your leave."

"Oh, how very rude he is!" said a little old-fashioned girl of the Pink family, as her face turned red as blood, but there was no color in her sister's face when he kissed her.

"But he is very good-looking," whispered Miss Mossy Rose, as she settled back in her soft little chair.

Following the gay butterfly there came Major Bumble Bee, in fuzzy pants and a yellow jacket. He was playing on some kind of musical instrument, and they all stopped to listen.

"What horrid music!" exclaimed their own musicians. Mr. Oriole gave a prolonged whistle, and the two Mr. Robins sat back and laughed till they cried. Prof. Toad's band screamed out, "Quit! quit!" But the two Katy girls in the Balm of Gilead tree disagreed about the music. One said Major Bee played a solo on the cornet. The other said he didn't.

"He did!" insisted the younger.

"He didn't!" exclaimed the other in a great rage. And so they kept it up for the remainder of the day—"he did!" "he didn't"—until everybody was disgusted. In the mean time, Major Bee whisked around and attempted to kiss the girls the same as the butterfly did, but they screamed, and then Mr. Zephyr came up from the south and blew the naughty Major Bee far away, and all the party bowed their thanks very gracefully to the kind Mr. Zephyr.

"They make a great fuss about nothing," remarked old Mr. Caterpillar to his friend, Lady Bug.

"They do, indeed," she replied, "but I think much of it is put on for the occasion. Some people do so like to put on airs! But, why, sir, hav you got your fur coat on this warm day?"

"I do not find it warm. I keep quite still, you know, and need to be warmly clothed. Are your family relatives all well, Lady Bug?"

"Quite well, I thank you; but my children, I expect, are crying now, and I must fly away home. Good-day, Mr. Caterpillar."

"Good-day, good-day, Lady Bug."

Haughty Miss Dahlia was looking over the garden wall and watching the people there, and wondering what Daisy White was looking up in the sky for all day.

"Looking for angels, I suppose," said Little Buttercup, dancing and laughing, and tossing her head.

"Does she ever see any?" asked Miss Dahlia.

"I never heard if she ever did," laughed Little Buttercup. "She may hav seen them, for all that we know, however."

"What is she good for, anyway?"

"I'll tell you what she is good for," said Mr. Dandy Lion, his honest, yellow face looking like a miniature sun. "She has been keeping that little dew-drop all day from being sunstruck, and, you know,

"Small service is true service while it lasts,
Of friends, however humble, scorn not one;
The modest daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun."

"And that's just what she's been doing."

"And what are you good for, Sir Oracle?" sneered Miss Dahlia, rocking to and fro proudly.

"I—well, I am good for greens," laughed Dandy Lion.

"I suppose you think I am a greenhorn," and Miss Dahlia looked scornfully at him and his companions.

"Oh, no," said old Mrs. Everlasting, in her calm, motherly way. "He does not mean that at all. He is good for greens, and very wholesome, too, and as a blood purifier he is excellent, isn't he, Dr. Sage?"

"That he is," replied the doctor, sagely, from his bed where he was resting. "We think highly of him in the profession. Ahem! we couldn't get along without him, could we, Miss Savory?"

"Perhaps some couldn't, but I could," replied Miss Summer Savory, with some asperity.

Nurse Penny Royal laughed, and said, "We are all useful to one another in our way," and she whisked out her pocket handkerchief filled with a delightful perfume that scented all the air.

Mr. Woodbine reached over the wall and pulled the ears of red-headed Mr. Clover, who, with his white-headed brother, was watching the gay party through a crack in the wall. As he noticed Major Bee driven away by Mr. Zephyr, he cried out, "Come over here, Major, I hav some nice, sweet honey, I wish to send to your little ones." The major did not wait for a second invitation, I assure you.

They had a long talk, and Mrs. Wood Sorrel came along and said, "Kind friends, we are not permitted to join in the festivities over yonder, or to mingle in the gay crowd, but I believe we are just as happy, because, although plain and unpretentious, we strive to do our duty, and to liv up to our principles of right. If we are not handsome, we are honest and true," said Mr. Clover, "and, although we make no great parade and show, we all of us hav enough and to spare, without calling on our neighbors."

The sky had been growing dark, and a great shower came up, which scattered the musicians and wet all the nice dresses at Miss Marie Gold's party. But the gay guests all said they didn't care, for the colors would wash, and would look as good as new the next day. The repast was just about to be brought in by Daddy Long Legs and his corps of attendant waiters, who were all of the Grasshopper family, but that part of the program had to be "postponed on account of the weather."

Poetry.

A Wheen Banes.*

BY MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

The following lines were suggested by reading the lamented William Denton's incomparable lectures on geology.]

Land of Saxon, red the wine
Poured adown those hills of thine,
From whose fissures man has found
Gems of prehistoric ground;
Traces of the primal man,
Ere his morning star began,
Ere the vanguard of the race
Found Attilla face to face.
Savage might that held the wood,
Blot upon the solitude.
Land of Saxon, o'er the sea,
Tell us what thy mysteries be.

Solenhofen, full of years,
Who shall count thy beaded tears?
Days of yore did dark-browed Hun
Slay thy fathers every one;
Capture all thy maidens there,
Scorning babe's and mother's prayer.
Where his hordes had trod the plain,
Never grass was seen again;
Cursed with blood the desert sod,
Man unknown of man and God.
Solenhofen, lift for me
Now thy gates of mystery.

Home of Humboldt, rude the skull,
Taken from Neanderthal;
Thick and low the heavy brow
Soulless chamber, vacant now,
Lighted but when hunger pressed
Love's sweet pleadings uncaressed,
Warring beasts dispute with him
In the rocky caverns dim;
Craven fear of starry sky,
Ocean's wrath his lullaby;
Home of Humboldt, dreams of mine
Would unbar those hills of thine.

Solenhofen, rich in things
Hid beyond thy mountain springs,
Secrets that the waters kept,
O'er the early ages swept.
Gauzy wings drone o'er the stream,
Bird and beast one creature seem.
Strangest form of all the clan
Evolution builds for man,
Lying low in living bed,
Resurrect thy mighty dead.
Solenhofen, o'er the sea,
Treasure-house of mystery!

An Acrostic.

BY ALHAZA.

Inspired by truth he stands, the nation's seer,
Now while the world is wrapped in darkness deep,
Great is his kindness to our suffering race;
Ever his voice is raised to check the tide
Round us that sweeps of ruin and despair.
Sweet is the simple creed he offers us,
Opposed to all the crafty arts of faith.
Listen, ye nations, to the thrilling call,
Love, justice, liberty, and Ingersoll.

A New Version of the Rib Story.

BY W. F. GRAVES.

When Darwin met Moses in heaven, they say,
To adjust their creeds they tried straightway;
And after short arguments, pro and con,
They decided the thing could be well done.
Says Moses to Darwin, "When they read me aright,
Our creeds will be found exactly alike;
Man came from the dust, in truth we both say,
But a thousand years are the same as a day;
And when the monkey his narrativ shed,
It was that which they used instead of the rib."

Tonic Sol-fa.

This is a system of teaching music, which has been introduced and is rapidly becoming popular in America. Its advocates claim for it that it is the best system so far brought out for teaching music. Among the claims made for it are:

1. It supplies a simple notation which the youngest child can easily understand and use.
2. The ability to read music (sight-singing) can be acquired by this system in one-fourth the time ordinarily taken by the old method.
3. It leads to a more intelligent understanding of the staff notation.
4. It makes the study of harmony easy and delightful.
5. It simplifies the difficulties of music—such as modulation, transition, the minor scale, etc., making that plain and clear which is popularly regarded as mysterious and incomprehensible.
6. It is so easily acquired that day-school teachers and others who hav not had a special musical education can quickly learn it sufficiently to teach the fundamental principles, and train their classes in simple music.

In Great Britain it is used almost exclusivly, and is rapidly making the English a musical nation. It has been introduced in Madagascar, Cape Colony (for the Kaffirs and the Dutch), Hong Kong, Beyrout, Mount Lebanon, Fiji, South Africa, Bombay, Calcutta, Barbadoes, St. Helena, Norfolk Island, Spain, Japan, Burmah, Chili, etc. In this country it has made great progress during the past two years, and is now in use in many states and Canada. Of places near New York, it is being successfully taught in the schools of Newark, Elizabeth, Orange, Montclair, Bloomfield, and Rutherford. It is now taught in one of the public schools of New York city with surprising success.

It is no extravagance to assert that the development of the Tonic Sol-fa system is the most important episode in the history of music since the invention of the staff. It opens the door of music to the masses. Millions will learn to sing by this notation who would hav been voiceless without it. The staff notation gave music a definit form, and placed it among the arts. Sol-fa givs this art to the common people.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, AT $3.00 PER YEAR; $1.50 FOR SIX MONTHS.

Among the reforms THE TRUTH SEEKER aims to effect are:

Total separation of church and state, including the equitable taxation of church property; secularization of the public schools, abolition of Sunday laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

Its sixteen large pages are filled every week with scientific, philosophic, and Freethought articles and communications by the ablest Freethinkers in the country. It givs all the Liberal news, and keeps its readers posted on current secular and theological events. It is the armory from which hundreds draw their weapons in contests with priesthood. All the Liberal papers are good, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is

THE BEST AND LARGEST.

It is conducted in a broad and truly liberal spirit, and givs everyone a hearing upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the human race.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest [illegible] position has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winated, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances nder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

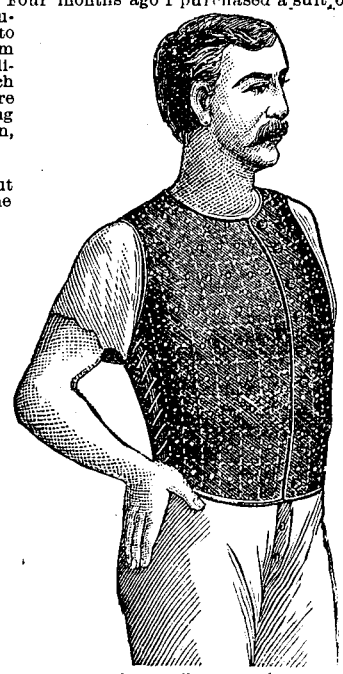
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult as much your physicians as you like, it will do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

Gems of Thought.

THE hireling fleeth, because he is a hireling and careth not for the sheep.—John x, 12.

IT is a very plain and elementary truth that the life, the future, and the happiness of every one of us, and, more or less, of those connected with us, do depend on our knowing something of the rules of a game infinitly more difficult and complicated than chess. It is a game which has been played for untold ages, every man and woman of us being one of the two players in a game of his or her own. The chess-board is the world, the pieces are the phenomena of the universe, the rules of the game are what we call the laws of nature. The player on the other side is hidden from us. We know that his play is always fair, just, and patient. But we know to our cost that he never overlooks a mistake or makes the smallest allowance for ignorance. To the man who plays well the highest stakes are paid with that overflowing generosity with which the strong shows delight in strength. And one who plays ill is checkmated, without haste, but without remorse. My metaphor will remind some of you of the famous picture in which Retzsch has depicted Satan playing chess with a man for his soul. Substitute for the mocking fiend in that picture a calm, strong angel who is playing for love, as we say, who would rather lose than win, and I should accept it as an image of human life. Well, what I mean by education is the instruction of the intellect in the laws of nature, under which name I include not merely things and their forces, but men and their ways, and the fashioning of the affections and the will into an earnest and loving desire to move in harmony with those laws. For me, education means neither more nor less than this.—Huxley.

VISIBLE and ascertainable phenomena giv no countenance to the theory of a future or spiritual life. The sense of identity, a conscious continuity of the ego, is an essential element of the astonishing doctrin of the resurrection of the body, which has so strangely and thoughtlessly found its way into the popular creed. The primitiv parents or congealers of that creed—whoever they may hav been—innocent of all science, and oddly muddled in their metaphysics, but resolute in their conviction that the same persons who died here should be, in very deed, the same who should rise hereafter—systematized their anticipations into the notion that the grave should giv up its actual inmates for their ordained transformation and their allotted fate. . . . The fathers of the church did not know, or they never considered, that the buried body soon dissolves into its elements, which, in the course of generations and centuries, pass into other combinations: form part of other living creatures, feed and constitute countless organizations one after another; so that when the graves are summoned "to giv up the dead that are in them," and the sea "the dead that are in it," they will be called on to surrender what they no longer possess and what no supernatural power can giv back to them.—Greg's Enigmas of Life.

M.—THE opinions of some philosophers do, indeed, bring us hope, if it is any pleasure to you to think that souls, after they leave the body, may go to heaven as to a permanent home. A.—I hav great pleasure in that thought, and it is what I most desire, and even if it should not be so, I should still be willing to believe it. [An avowal little worthy of a philosopher.] M.—What occasion hav you, then, for my assistance? Am I superior to Plato in eloquence? Turn over carefully his book that treats of the soul, you will hav there all that you can desire. A.—I hav, indeed, done that, and often too; but I know not how it comes to pass, I agree with it whilst I am reading it, but when I hav laid down the book and begun to reflect with myself on the immortality of the soul, all that agreement vanishes and slips away.—Cicero's Tusculan Disputations. [Note: Plato's Phædo fortunately remains to us, and is universally regarded as one of the noblest—if not the very noblest—productions of the Greek mind. But no one trained in the philosophy of the present day, as represented by Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, and dozens of others that might be named, would allow himself to be imposed on by the platitudes that Plato indulges in, and however pleasing the dream that he sets before us, we let it pass without a sigh of regret, believing that it is best as it is, whatever it may turn out to be. In utrumque paratus [Prepared for either alternativ] is our motto. If we hav to face another world, strength, we nothing doubt, will be given us to do so, and if God or Nature has no further use for us, we are content to pass on. Dear is Plato, dear is Cicero; dear, too, are Jesus and Paul and Locke and Channing; but dear above all is Truth.—Hylax.]

WHAT is it to die?
To leave all disappointment, care, and sorrow,
To leave all falsehood, treachery, and unkindness,
All ignominy, suffering, and despair;
And be at rest forever! O dull heart,
Be of good cheer! When thou shalt cease to beat,
Then shalt thou cease to suffer and complain.
—Longfellow's Spanish Student.

MEN are brought to anything almost sooner than to change their habit of life, especially when the change is either inconvenient, or made against the force of natural inclination or with loss of accustomed indulgences. "It is," as Hartley in his "Essays on Man" says, "the most difficult of all things to convert men from vicious habits to virtuous ones, as one may judge from what he feels in himself, as well as from what he sees in others." It is almost like making men over again.—Paley's Evidences of Christianity.

I THEREFORE so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air; but I keep under my body and bring it into subjection.—1 Cor. ix, 26, 27.

Odds and Ends.

MR. ROGERS'S latest group is a scene in church, representing a young man leaning over from his pew to show the place in a hymn-book to a pretty girl who has arrived late with her mother, or aunt, or some other female of mature years. It is supposed to be the first of a series, and will soon be followed by a group depicting the same young man and young woman lingering at the front gate, on their arrival from church, engaged in a conversation on astronomy, or civil service reform, or some other sentimental topic, while a big-headed and liberal-jawed dog, in the background, eyes the youth suspiciously. The final groups will show the young man being bounced off the front stoop by the girl's irate male parent, and the dog aforesaid sampling the lover's coat-tails. Mr. Rogers has struck a vein that has been successfully worked in literature, and which should prove no less remunerativ in art.

TO MISS MARY ANDERSON.

O fairest American actress, to me
You're better by far than our Kendals and Beeres;
In every new pose all your muscles I see,
And charming the outline of each one appears;
Sir Henry would surely approve of your triceps,
And Lister delight in your beautiful biceps.

I care not to hear Gilbert's cynical play.
For what are his lines to the lines of your face?
Your sweet sterno-mastoids, before me alway,
Can pose your small head with an exquisit grace;
Your attitude, Mary, 's an effort of genius,
When one of those muscles works well with the splenius.

Oh, fair is your deltoid, and fair too, we know,
The long supinator that flexes your arm;
The play of your eloquent lips serves to show
Your orbicularis hath singular charm;
And men will all follow your path like fanatics,
To hear how you laugh with those gay zygomatics.

Then take an anatomist's greeting, Miss A.,
And smile on the rhyme that would spread your renown;
Don't let the risorius come into play,
Nor stern corrugator be used for a frown;
While the bard will rejoice if you find aught that's comic
In viewing you thus with an eye anatomic.
—H. S. C., in London World.

"GIMME that gun!" the old man cried
To his son, a sprightly urchin;
"It's Sunday, yes, but I'll hav the hide
Of that coon if it costs a churchin'."

"O, father, stay," the youthlet plead,
"Remember, to-day is Sunday;
Call not down vengeance on thy head,
Wait, father, and shoot it Monday."

"Gimme that gun!" The man was stern.
"And gimme no more palaver;
You are young in years, and had better learn
When a coon's in sight I'll hav her!"

The youth passed over the heavy gun—
A gun which almost knocked him down—
Like a bold, bad, unregenerate son,
By the spirit of mischief goaded.

An ounce of powder and three of shot,
He had dumped in the carbine's muzzle,
And gloated over his hellish plot
Like a child with a Chinese puzzle.

Then he hied away to a safe retreat
'Neath a stone wall's friendly cover;
"I'll wait awhile," did the lad repeat,
"Till the din of battle's over."

Then came a burst of thunder sound;
The old man—where was he?
Curled like a squashvine on the ground,
While the coon skipped up a tree.

"O, father, father!" the youthlet cried,
"Remember, to-day is Sunday!"
"You bet; but I'll tan your tender hide
From now till the dawn of Monday!"

A POOR devil of a hair dresser was sold out at Moberly lately, and among the effects was a superb head and bust of a papier-mache female. The clerk at the Central Hotel purchased it, and the boys determined to hav some fun. There is a long room in the hotel divided by curtains, each half containing a bed. So they stuck the bust at the top of the bolster and put the lay figure comfortably under the sheets, where it lay like a reclining Venus. They then went down to the office to await the arrival of the eleven o'clock train and see who was apportioned to number seventeen, where the gentle dummy was reposing. To their chagrin old Silas Gregory, who is the solidest man on the road, in a religious sense, got the lucky number. Just before the solemn gentleman went up stairs Will Haverly called him on one side. "Sir," he said, with a little halting confusion, "can I speak a few words in private to you?" "Certainly, sir." "Well, sir, I suppose the clerk has forgotten it, but a young lady is sleeping in one of those beds—it is true that a curtain divides the room, and perhaps with a man of your character it does not matter after all." "Not at all," said the serious traveler. "I shall be rising early and need not disturb her." "Exactly. You'll be very careful—" "Sir, you don't know me; if you think I could be capable of—" "I know you are the very soul of honor. Good night." The boys sat in Will's room for an hour, and were just going to retire rather disgustedly to their chambers when the door of seventeen opened and the serious man rushed up the corridor, his face as white as a miller's. "Gentlemen," he gasped, "a great crime has been committed—that girl's face is cold as ice—she's dead! Merciful heavens, dead!" The whole crowd went with him, and when he found out the swindle he began to bluster, but Will Haverly said very quietly: "Now, look you here, Mr. Whatdoyoucallem, before you kick up a row here you've got to explain how you found out that maiden's cheek was cold." "I—I—I— Great Scott! Giv me my grip!" and the pious man frightened the night clerk out of a week's growth by dashing through the office into the gloom nd darkness of the night.

Notes and Clippings.

THE largest school in the world is probably the Jewish Free School in Spitalsfield, London. It has a daily attendance of over 2,800 pupils.

THE World is the authority for the statement that President Arthur, in a recent conversation with some old friends, admitted that he was a partial convert to the doctrin of Spiritualism.

AN English paper tells the story of an old gentleman who made it a regular practice to read a portion of the Bible every morning, and drink eight gallons of ale every evening. He died weighing several hundred pounds.

A MAN in Nebraska City is activly promoting starvation by giving away flour to the poor. He distributes it in sacks, one to every purchaser of one hundred drinks at his bar; and, under the circumstances, the winners are bound to be losers.

MRS. LILLIE DEVEREAUX BLAKE is holding Governor Cleveland up to the scorn of her sex. She says he is totally ignorant of the fact that more than half the people of the state are women, and when they are allowed to vote they will make a political corpse of him in short order.

A LARGE number of candidates hav applied for the office of assistant physician to the Edinburgh Infirmary, and hav put in great quantities of testimonials. But a resident doctor says that "more dependence in Edinburgh is to be placed on being a Free Churchman than on any real aptitude for a vacant post."

AT last it is expected that Mr. Bradlaugh will be admitted to his seat in the House of Commons when Parliament meets. It is unaccountable that the majority should hav so long submitted to be made a cat's-paw of by the Tories in this matter. The foregoing is from Truth. We trust our daily contemporary is correct, but we hav our doubts. We havn't seen any indications that the lamb can lie down with the lion—except on the inside.

FROM the annual report of the 2d Congregational church of West Winsted for the year ending Dec. 31, 1883, we gain the following statistics showing results of past year: Outfit—1 clergyman, 4 deacons, 30 Sunday-school teachers (and, we may add, a ten-thousand-dollar church not taxed). Result—9 conversions. Loss in members of church (various ways), 13. We trust the other churches will send their returns promptly to this office for publication. Nothing givs us so much pleasure, jibes the Winsted Press, as to publish statements like the above, showing as they do the rapid spread of Christianity in the backwoods of New England.

ST. MARY'S Protestant Episcopal church in Brooklyn is about to open a bowling alley in the basement of its branch church on Park street. The Brooklyn Times remembers that not many years ago Rev. Thos. K. Beecher created a terrible commotion in a local church by proposing a similar innovation on puritanism. It would be better, comments our heretical friend Pinney, if the churches were all turned into bowling alleys, skating rinks, billiard and dancing halls, gymnasiums, and game rooms, with weekly theatrical performances, music each night, and a lecture every Sunday afternoon, but a church with a pious ten pin alley in the basement will do to start with.

HITHERTO owners or managers of mills and factories in Russia hav been free to deal with their work-people as they pleased. But on the first day of this year a new Factory law came into operation for the regulation of the work of children. A complete staff of inspectors has been appointed to enforce the following stipulations of the new law: 1. Children under 10 years of age must not be allowed to work in factories. 2. Workers from the age of 12 to 15 years must not work more than eight hours a day. Night work for children can only be authorized in establishments where the process of manufacture cannot hav a bad influence on the health. Even if allowed, the work must not exceed four hours. 3. The work of children must be regulated in such a way as not to prevent their going to school three hours every day. 4. The owners of factories are obliged to admit inspectors and their assistants into their works at any hour of the day.

AN honest woman confessed not long ago that although the minister whose church she attends, of which she is a member in excellent standing, is not at all liked as a preacher by many of his congregation, she finds that he is doing her a great deal of good. "I always listen to the text and the opening of the sermon," she said, "and after that his voice is so pleasant, and I am so sure that I know exactly what he is going to say, that I sit there, in that quiet and restful place, and plan out my work for the week; and I notice that when I do this I always get along so much better during the week, for that Sunday morning hour is about the only one that I hav which is entirely free from demands upon me."

"WELL, my little man," said a Methodist elder who, during the progress of a revival, was stopping at the house of the father of the youth whom he addressed, "I hear you hav a little baby brother. Hav you named him yet?" "No, sir," replied the lad, shyly. "Name him after me and I'll giv him a present." Upon the next visit of the elder, about a month after the conversation, he asked the boy if he had followed out his wishes. "Yes, sir," answered the youth. "I spoke to dad about it, and he said he'd name the kid after you as sure as shootin.'" "Ah, ha, and what do you call him?" "We call him Bacon and Eggs fried on both Sides, Yellow-Legged Chickens, and Biscuits and Honey."

THE Sun whittles this story from something: Robert G. Ingersoll's father was a minister of the last generation, and for a long time pastor of the Congregational church at Madison, Ohio, and at Ashtabula, the place of the memorable railroad disaster. He was successful as a revivalist, and finally gave up the settled pastorate in order to spend his time in evangelistic work. He was capable of arousing the emotions to a high pitch of ecstatic enthusiasm. This description is by a man who sat under his ministry, and who also tells how little Bob used to engage his father in long disputations, bringing up the familiar skeptical puzzles of the whale, the frogs, and the sun standing still. He was always elated at cornering his father.

A NICE theological point has come up for settlement in Texas. Pastor A's congregation being without a place of worship, permission was asked and obtained to hold service on a given day in the church of Pastor B. At the appointed time Pastor A's congregation assembled, and their service had just reached the point of taking a collection, when Pastor B ascended the pulpit, took charge of the exercises, and demanded and received the proceeds of the collection. The question is, Will an action lie against Parson B for the recovery of the funds thus obtained, or did he simply appropriate that which belonged to him? In other words, does the title to money yielded by a church collection vest in the congregation owning the building, or in the congregation which happens to be making use of it for one occasion only? The point is a delicate one, and its adjustment will be watched with general interest.

THE wife of George J. Holyoake was buried two weeks ago at Highgate, and as Mr. Holyoake had often spoken at the grave of others, his wife had a wish—the only public one, it is said, that she ever expressed—that a few words should be said at her own. Mr. Holyoake, in respecting this request, spoke of "the three qualities which distinguished Mrs. Holyoake—that of service of others, in which she never thought of herself; that of truth—not of speech only, but of conduct—of which she had so clear a sense that the absence of it in others was not concealable from her; that of pride, which was more than self-respect—it was debtlessness, an independence of obligation which was not a second nature—it was her first, and she had no other. Though called upon early in life to confront alone the death of her first child—to be the sole watcher, the sole sympathizer, and sole mourner at an unattended grave, she brought away no murmur. During more than forty years she never forgot it, and never complained."

THE San Francisco Truth draws this contrast: James C. Flood is going to build another palace. It will be located on Nob Hill, and is expected to cast a long shadow over the residences of the railroad kings in that vicinity. It is to be a two-story and basement building, 100x100 feet in dimensions. The foundation will consume 1,000,000 bricks in its construction. The edifice proper will be of Connecticut brown stone. A portico of the Roman-Doric order will constitute the entrance to the grounds, with a depth of 25 or 30 feet. The plans show that the central hall will be 45 by 32 feet, with a height of 25 feet. The space for the grand staircase will be 25 feet in width, the principal flights being 9 feet wide, and leading to a landing 10x25 feet. The dining-room will be 45x30, the hall and music-room 50x37, the library 26x39, the grand reception-room 26x29, the drawing-room 40x30. These last three apartments will be en suite, and will present, when thrown open, an apartment 415 feet in length. There will be five sleeping chambers, each 30x30, and a smoking-room 25x25, eight servants' rooms, a wine-cellar, a laundry, a kitchen, etc., all in the modern style. The interior woodwork is to be of heavy South American timber. No bay windows or exterior ornaments will appear, but every pane of glass will be of plate. It will cost $4,000,000. If the rent of your tenement or hovel is raised a little during the coming year in order that Flood may recoup himself, please don't kick. Go up on Nob Hill and gratify your art-instincts by gazing at Mr. Flood's palace.

THE Dean of Canterbury recently became alarmed at the rapid increase of skepticism in England, and procured a Dr. Samuel Kinns to show that there is no conflict between science and the Bible. This Mr. Kinns proceeded to do in a series of lectures, the first being delivered in the library of Canterbury Cathedral. Mr. Kinns satisfied himself and hearers, but, unfortunately for his reputation as a scientific man, he referred to others as entertaining the same views as those which he put forward. He mentioned particularly the staff of scientific men attached to the British Museum. No sooner was this fact made public than these gentlemen came forward to deny the lecturer's statement, and their letters on the subject showed plainly enough that he was not qualified to speak with any authority on the questions of science he had attempted to discuss. Admission into the Geological Society was recently denied him because of the false science embodied in a published work of his on Moses and geology. "The order of the sixteen creativ events which formed the subject of his Canterbury lecture," says Mr. Carruthers, keeper of the department of botany in the British Museum, "is neither that of science nor of Genesis. He mangles the Mosaic record, and does not know the facts of science." As to astronomy, the case against the dean's lecturer, as stated by Mr. Carruthers, appears to be still worse: "He adds to his name F. R. A. S. I cannot believe that the crass ignorance found in his book can be found in any Fellow of the Astronomical Society besides Samuel Kinns. Witness his account of the miracle of the sun standing still on Gibeon. He had seen that, by refraction, the sun is visible for several days in the frigid zone after it is even as much as a degree below the horizon, and not understanding this simple phenomenon, he ignorantly holds that by increased refraction the sun was seen over Gibeon for at least twelve hours after it had set. He is incapable of perceiving the absurdity of an image of the setting sun being visible by refraction in the west at the very time that the sun itself is rising in the east." The Dean of Canterbury is still hunting for a man to reconcile science and the Bible.

Anniversary Celebrations.

Paine's Natal Day.

THE NEW YORK MEETING.

The friends who came together to celebrate Paine's birthday in this city filled the hall to overflowing. The meeting was held under the auspices of the Bennett Liberal League, and was presided over by Mr. S. P. Putnam. Many faces new to those who are in the habit of attending Liberal gatherings here were seen in the audience, notably the faces of young ladies and gentlemen. Though all enjoyed themselvs to a high degree, the happiest person present seemed to be Mr. Putnam, to whom the credit of so magnificent a demonstration is largely due. His enthusiasm and good humor were contagious, and communicated themselvs to speakers and listeners alike. After an overture on the piano, Mr. Putnam called the meeting to order. He had just returned from the Boston convention, where he reported a splendid and enthusiastic gathering. His story of this will be found further along. Reverting then to the objects of our meeting, he went on to say:

The genius of Paine was cosmopolitan. He embraced the whole world in his sympathies. It was not for a nation, but for mankind, that he labored.

He was pre-eminently a man of ideas. We know but little of his personal life; we know him mainly through the illumination of his thought. He worked therefore not for a day, but for all time. He is a representativ man, a landmark of human history.

In honoring his memory we do honor to those principles of which his life was such an illustrious example. He is identified with the great movements of man. He does not dwell apart. He was and is in the rushing tide of humanity. In every throb of the race he seems to bear a living part.

The French Revolution was the beginning of a new era. It was a volcanic outburst—but its power had been gathering for centuries. It was universal in its interest—a pivotal revolution whose lurid glare flung the horoscope of succeeding civilization.

In that terrific whirlwind of hope and terror Paine was a master-spirit. He had been trained in revolution, and knew its meaning. He was in thorough sympathy with the rights of man, and would maintain them at all hazards. His trust in human nature was boundless, for he felt that it must be noble, or the universe itself was a lie. Man was committed by the very law of his being to the good, the true, and the beautiful; and towards these he would advance, even through the most bloody paths.

Paine did not toil simply to overthrow, but to build up. He believed in liberty, but he believed also in justice. The rights of man are universal, and they clothe both the king and the peasant. Paine would strike the shackles from the peasant and make him the equal of the king; but when the king was dethroned and stood side by side with the peasant, then the king was to be protected equally with the peasant.

This was the principle that guided Paine in his treatment of the fallen tyrant, and for which he almost suffered martyrdom. It was policy, we might say profound policy, to keep the king alive and in subjection, and thus those who were in favor of a monarchy would be held in check—since their legal representativ was in chains.

But with Paine the reason was deeper and more universal than this. It was based on the recognition of fundamental rights. The criminal must hav justice, and the tyrant must be punished, not by passion, but by reason. It was not vengeance, but safety, that should be sought.

Liberty demands self-defense, but nothing more. When self-defense is accomplished, then brute force should cease. Reason and moral power are then the victorious agencies. The French people, degraded by centuries of servitude, could not see this. Having drawn the sword, they expected to win everything by the sword. They made that the arbiter. The commanding and penetrating genius of Paine saw otherwise—that the sword should be put aside as soon as possible, and reason left to assert the claims of justice. The king was a victim; he was not simply a criminal. He was the product of circumstances and preceding influence. His fate was upon him, and he could not be altogether responsible for the tremendous wrongs that existed. There was no need of the shedding of any blood. It was for this sublime justice that Paine pleaded, and it was for this that he suffered.

All honor to the hero and the martyr of two continents, to the grand idealist who amid the storms of the present saw the penceful solution of the future; who to friend and foe was alike unflinching in his devotion to justice. What is liberty without justice, and what is justice but the moral power of man? Brute force can simply resist; it cannot advance. Moral ideas must proceed by moral forces. It is fatal to any reform to be established by the sword. It then becomes a tyranny, and, like all tyrannies, must perish. The ultimate advance of mankind must be by reason. It was to reason that Paine constantly appealed. It was not the expediency of to-day for which he aimed, but for the eternal justice, whose light, like that of the sun, must fall both upon the just and the unjust, not for vengeance, but for the progress and joy af all.

Paine was far-reaching in his ideas. They belong to the future: they look onward. In recalling his life, we do not dwell altogether in the past. In the light of his lofty genius we see the days that are to come. He is our leader still, our teacher still. We can gather impulse and knowledge from his eventful career. He has touched strings that will vibrate music in the hereafter. He is a living and onward power—not merely a monument of achieved result, for that life which he communicated to the race was not simply that of his own personality, but the life of great ideas, which are immortal, and which from the splendors of the past lure to nobler achievement. No matter what we hav done, there still remains a greater, and to this greater, so long as man advances, will the name of Thomas Paine be an incentiv.

A violin solo was next in order. Victor Kurdo is a young man of brilliant musical attainments, and his performance was heartily encored. Miss Leona Leonard succeeded him with a song. The audience fell in love with her beautifully musical voice, and she also was compelled to repeat. Mr. Putnam then sent the hat around, but even this orthodox proceeding failed to mar the festivities. The good nature of the audience would hav forgiven John Knox for his share in establishing Presbyterianism, if he had appeared to us. The expenses of the evening were $16.50, and when Mr. Putnam recovered his hat he found $18.88 worth of collateral in it—more than it ever covered before, he assured us. This left $2.38 to go to the Paine Historical Association, which is to be formed. In after years this audience and their descendants will speak of this with satisfaction. Mr. Wakeman then ascended the platform. He was greeted with prolonged applause, which he was compelled to still before he could proceed. He said:

My Friends: They buried him by the roadside. It was sad. It was meant to be and was felt to be dishonorable. The Society of Friends, even, of which he was a birthright member, refused him the hospitality of the grave, a hospitality the denial of which has always been felt to be the very highest point of human dishonor. Throughout all the ancient world and ancient history the great leading thought concerning the end of human life was that the body might enter into a companionship with others in death. The Roman church even now can bring to his or her knees every child that was born in the Catholic fold by threatening that his or her remains shall lie in unconsecrated ground. Even that splendid genius, that eagle-eyed man who shot the arrow that seemed to pierce the very heart of superstition—even the great Voltaire, trembled when he felt that his career of Freethought would bring him to be buried like an animal in the open field. He had seen the remains of a beloved friend, the great actress, Adrienne Lecouvreur, thrown into the gutter in disgrace. His last expiring effort was to claim friendship of some power which could save his memory and his remains by associating them in honorable burial with his fellow-men.

I hav stood by that grave at New Rochelle by the roadside, near the little locust post where the head of the great man was once, and I hav felt that one of the great missions of Freethought in this world is to reverse the sentence that left Thomas Paine without an honorable grave. Yet there is much that may be said to be appropriate in that circumstance. A man whose great life maxim was, "The world is my country; to do good my religion," might, after all, be fittingly laid by the roadside of those who are to carry his fame to the ends of the earth. As was said of the great English reformer,

"The Avon to the Severn runs,
The Severn to the sea;
So Wickliff's ashes spread abroad,
Wide as the waters be."

Thus the name of this man justly belongs, not to any consecrated ground which he longed to hav his remains repose in, not to any church, but to the people at large through that grand church which is now just peering above the horizon, lit with the rays of the future thought and glory of man—that great church of the world, that church of humanity itself, in which and for which his life was spent. I love to think how generous, how far-extended were the efforts of that man, and I pray you here now to recall how much of him was not simply of his age, but of all ages; not simply of his time, but to leave the blessing that we and others, from generation to generation, shall inherit. It is in that capacity that he stands before us in an entirely different light from that in which he stood to those who thus dishonored him at his death, and whose disgrace it is that they allowed him to go into an unconsecrated grave.

Remember that this man was the great, leading republican of his age, the knight-errant of liberty and republicanism. Remember that he was the first man that said, "The free and independent states of America;" and that he put it expressly that these United States thus organized and thus made triumphant by victory, as he believed they would be, established the corner-stone of the United States of the World. Remember that as the knight-errant of republicanism and liberty he devoted his whole life to that sentiment and that object. That it is which has consecrated his memory, that it is which brings us here, that it is which will make him the patriarch of republicanism and Freethought the world over; and especially will it make him dear to us Americans, for whom he spent the best years and efforts of his life. He is the great patriarch of American Liberalism, and whatever may hav been his faults, however he may, under some circumstances, hav fallen short of the highest dignity that man can achieve, he achieved enough to enable us to regard his faults as simply spots on the sun. Look at his starting in England without any particular advantages of education, or birth, or social position! He worked his way by inherent genius of character to a position of honorable appointment in England.

He became familiar in his public employment, as few others could be, with the politics and history of his time. When Franklin was in London looking out for the interests of the young colonies, Paine was already one of the men to whom his eye was attracted, and one of the men who, he thought, would hav a remarkable influence upon the future. And furthermore, there is reason to suspect that even in his early life he performed one of the most superhuman tasks that any being ever accomplished. It is by no means clear that he was not the author of the "Letters of Junius." You remember that Mr. Burr, of Washington, has published a very excellent work on that subject. He has not as yet convinced me, but I admit it takes a good deal to convince me of some things. The style of Paine seems to me against that theory; the fact that he had not at that time of his life sufficient acquaintance with the men of England has seemed against it; the fact that he with his open heart kept that secret is against it. And yet only last Sunday, down in Boston, I sat with a man whom we all delight to honor, and all love to think of as the Nestor of Liberalism, the Hon. Elizur Wright. He took the pains to go over with me the arguments by which the hypothesis is sustained that Paine was really the author of the Junius letters. I admit I never saw the case so clearly put before. It is remarkable; every other man whose name has been proposed as the author of the Junius letters has been abandoned—even Sir Philip Francis. Scarcely one of them now has a single adherent. The problem has been given up. The last Encyclopedia Britannica expressly comes to that conclusion—that that secret is buried in the past. Now, in late years, has come forward this claim of Thomas Paine to that honor, and the honors which are contended for are certainly the most remarkable of any in the developments of that generation. We submit it to you that it is by no means clear as yet but that Thomas Paine was really the author of these extraordinary letters, which had such a wonderful effect in England. They were right in the line of Thomas Paine's work. About the time Paine left Europe for America, Junius said that he had written his last letter; that he had buried the secret with him; that he would giv to other lands and to other people the talents which the people of England were no longer capable of appreciating. The American colonies were ready for revolution. Paine came here and at once lit the fires of liberty, and at once threw his heart and soul into the cause. The first great words spoken by him to the American people were contained in that wonderful work called "Common Sense." He showed that simple rebellion against England was useless unless we had in view some constructiv object; that the change must not be strictly governmental, but it must be social and political, and we must become the children of the great republic. These great truths he put before our people; he argued with them, and they began to feel that the rebellion was no longer simply for the redress of grievances, no longer was it proper to send petitions to the throne; it was thought better to send delegates to the congress in Philadelphia. The result of his efforts in that regard was one of the greatest movements that any one individual ever started and made successful. He was not simply satisfied by having made this great thought permeate the minds of the people. When Washington, at the head of the army, was almost compelled to giv up in despair, we know perfectly well what this true hero did. We know that he rushed to the army himself; he gave his last cent and his last dollar, and his own salary in advance. He went and shared the sufferings of the soldiers at Valley Forge. He then sent out that thrilling word called the "Crisis." He rushed right into the gap, and into the breach, and by his singular openness of expression, by the sincerity of his style, made it seem, as he truly said, that he wrote all this with the pen dipped in his own blood. That spirit, that plainness, that simplicity, that attractivness, struck the heart of the people again, and revived them. The army was sustained; his means helped to do it. Then he went to Philadelphia and to France. He raised the money which really revived the army, and enabled Washington to co-operate with the French, and to gain the final victory which made these free and United States of America. How much he did in that regard only those who carefully look over the history of that period will know, because the record of it, to the shame of American historians, has been substantially repressed—has been substantially overgrown and forgotten. He was the living genius of that period, and without him the sword of Washington would hav been drawn in vain. I never can recur to these two great works, "Common Sense" and the "Crisis," without a feeling of unutterable gratitude to him, and of unutterable indignation at the infamous way in which his memory and his fame hav been treated.

As soon as the great treaty was signed which made these the free and independent states of America, Paine left this country, returned to England, and there started one of the great movements which as yet is permeating the British mind, and which will eventually reach its culmination and its victory, in a complete disenthralment of the people of England from their nobility and aristocracy. Charles Bradlaugh is a lineal descendant of Thomas Paine, and is simply reasserting in other forms the rights of man, by the advocacy of which Thomas Paine at this period put himself in the front of the battle, against a great leader of reactionism, the great Edmund Burke; and in that contest, though Burke seemed for a time, with all the material resources back of him, to be the victor, it was only for a time. The rights which underlie the duties of men on earth were set forth in that great book, the "Rights of Man," and eventually they will triumph. The revolution in England has been a long and smothered one, but it is none the less a revolution, and it will be none the less triumphant in the future.

Having done what he could then, and justly, as the knight-errant of republicanism and liberty, as he always was, to emancipate his own English brethren, he was called almost unanimously by the French nation, re-elected from a dozen provinces at once to go to France and to start a republican constitution in Europe, as he had in America—the constitution of the French nation. He was at once sent to the great convention from Calais, although many others besought him to represent them. In that convention he rendered great service to the French nation. He was one of the most conservativ members of the convention, and his advice was second to none in forming that great constitution which now underlies the constitution of France. Those services hav been nearly forgotten, but of late years, through our minister at France, Mr. Washburne, the part that Thomas Paine took in the French Revolution has been partially uncovered, and we now know that it was no less important in accomplishing the liberty of the people of France than that of the people of America. The time came that tried men's souls; there was not so much to excite the people to action as there was here; but it was to temper the people against the terrific outrages and wrongs which bore them down that he said, "This violence, this terrorism, will not giv us permanent liberty." The question came up, What shall be done with this king? Then was enacted one of the most beautiful, most glorious scenes that history has ever recorded, or human art can ever depict, when Thomas Paine, revered by all the republicans of the world, stood forward and defended that Louis Capet, the criminal, and tried to save him from a disgraceful death. He pleaded for his banishment to America. Simple is his speech on that subject. It is repeated in his works. Look it up before you giv ear to any of the charges of the church against Paine, and see the real magnanimity and heroism of the man in writing that speech. Never has there been anything superior to it; never was there an instance of greater statesmanship, of true manhood, exhibited in all the history of the world. The minions of the monarch pressed upon poor France and she lost her head, and became crazy in terrorism. They felt it was the only thing that could save them, and those who were the wildest gained the power, and those who had been moderate and judicious went to prison. Paine was one who was imprisoned, with the sentence of death passed upon him, as one who had not been violent enough against the enemies of the republic, and it was supposed that he would be led forth to execution. It seems as though there must hav been a special providence that saved him from the guillotin. Some other poor wretch was dragged out and took his place, and Thomas Paine lived for a purpose still nobler than any he had accomplished. He had done much to giv freedom, political and social, to America; much to giv it to England, and much to giv it to France; but social and political freedom were impossible unless he could giv freedom to the human mind and to the human soul. That great work he accomplished by giving to the world that magnificent book, the "Age of Reason." When he found that in all probability he would be called out to go through that fatal ordeal of the guillotin, he set his mind to think, Why all this cruelty; this repression, this oppression, this slavery of man? Why? because he was held down by his fear, by his superstition, by his ignorance; and Paine said, "With my last effort, with the last word I can write and send to my fellow-man, I will break these chains from his soul." And then in the prison, without any Bible even to refer to, he wrote the first part of that book so immense in its influence, the "Age of Reason." You know that finally, after many appeals to the American minister, he was released; but it was only after a long delay, and after he had suffered very much. It was to the disgrace of the administration of the great Washington, that he allowed himself to be blinded to the necessity of immediately interfering for the release of Thomas Paine, when it was known in this country that he had been in prison. That one thing is like a spot on the sun in Washington's administration.

The federalists of that day, the tory influences of the time, prevented that application from being made, and from being successful far too long. But finally there came a change; Thomas Jefferson sat in the presidential chair, and Paine came to this country, as he ought to hav come, as the guest of a nation, in one of its own vessels of war. But the "Age of Reason" had come before him, and when he landed there was a tornado of abuse, of detraction and hatred, that sprang from the soul of every priest, ever priest-ridden man and woman, every tory and every federalist in the United States, and they determined that Thomas Paine from that time forward should be deprived of all influence where he had previously had it; should be disgraced and discarded, his services disowned, and if possible they would land him, as land him they did, in a dishonorable grave by the roadside. Yet, my friends, all efforts to degrade the true servants of humanity are sure to fail. Not a single year has passed over since they laid him in that grave, that some few hav not gathered together on the anniversary of this day to do honor to his memory, and to express their gratitude for the services which gave us the liberty we enjoy. And to-night, all over the country, from Maine away to the coast, anniversary meetings are being held, some larger than this, with the determination that the infamous disgrace of Americans, their treatment of the name and services of Thomas Paine, shall be removed; and removed it must and shall be. It must and shall be, because the republic is a sacred name to every lover of liberty on earth, and only in and by and through the republic can the humanity of the future arise to the dignity of self-government and liberty, The United States of America as, the corner-stone of the United States of the World, will never hereafter forget one who devoted his life to laying that stone. Not only as the knight-errant of liberty, and of republicanism, but as the knight-errant of humanity and of the highest human duty, the memory of Thomas Paine is beginning to be honored and worshiped in a sense far better than even he himself thought, or any great body of people living at his time even imagined. I mean to say that Paine was to a great extent a prophet, and that when he uttered this immortal word, "The world is my country; to do good my religion," he uttered words which involved far more than any which had ever been spoken before. He uttered the regenerating words which are to be the living soul and inspiring sentiment of the great republic of man in the future. He saw far, but he felt further. He felt that to make all mankind brethren in one country, and that country this world, was the great consummation that would separate him and the lovers of liberty, and the lovers of humanity, from those who had their mansions in the sky; who were serving not this world, whose country was not in this world but in some imaginary heavens presided over by an immense despot in the unknown clouds or skies above us. It was he who in that wonderful sentence first laid out the main duty of mankind to be inhabitants of this world; to regard this world as their home. Ordinarily people regarded this world as a vale of tears. They said:

"When I can read my title clear
To mansions in the skies,
I'll bid farewell to every tear,
And wipe my weeping eyes."

This sentiment was like the one that asked what it profited a man if he gained the whole world and lost his own soul. Never mind your soul; probably you havn't got any; and if you hav, it's of no account anyhow. The less account it is, the more fuss you make over it. The real thing is, to get your duty done in this world; the real thing is, not to think about your mansions in the skies at all, but what kind of liberty, what kind of government, what kind of welfare, you are having here on your earth. Never mind about the king of heaven, or about the king who sits on the throne of England or France. Banish them to America or somewhere, and let them earn an honest living. But you and I, now can we enjoy this sunlight and this earth, how can we do our duty to our fellows and make them happy, how can we make this world our country?—and by saying that he meant, How can we be inspired with that patriotism of humanity which makes all the world our country and continues the thought of that one country throughout generations and generations? That phrase, "The world is my country" —how broad the heart, how deep the soul, how vast the intellect that produced that thought, and made it the living voice of the whole world! Like unto it should we remember that second part, "To do good is my religion." What is our idea of goodness?—that is our religion. It means, what ought we to do? what has got to be done? And the church said, What has got to be done is to uphold these traditions that I lay down to you, and to mumble over the prayers. That is what the whole world has been taught by priestcraft and kingcraft, who in doing it made the people their slaves. Thomas Paine said, "Never mind your duty to the despot in the skies. Let him take care of himself. He ought to be able by this time." But he said, Are you to be without religion? No! Are you to be without an idea of duty? No! There are an abundance of things to do on this earth. What are they? The true religion is that you must do good to your fellows; and in order to do good you must, in the first place, be good.

The devotion to good, he said, is the sum and substance of all religion that is worth having. The rest may go to the skies or to the traditions of the past, to be seen no more of man. That was the mission of Thomas Paine in the world of religion. In patriotism, he was the Son of Man; in religion, truly he was the embodiment of human duty. Liv for others, was his religion; liv so that your life may he prompted by an idea of duty based upon the whole world as your country. How vast, how important, and, let me say, how perfect! The future of this world is really in the hands of the Liberals, and they know not the high calling unto which they are called by the progress of history and the necessities of mankind. We hav not yet been fully awakened to the duties of that emancipation which Paine gave us. We must enlarge our hearts, our thoughts, and our principles; we must band together under that inspiration of duty which will put us at once in the forefront and van of the world. Let no one ever say of you that you are pagans or heathens, or that you belong to the past in any way; but let them understand decidedly that you are not Christians because you belong to the future. In that view we never can remember this great man without being inspired by his high purposes and by his useful, victorious, heroic life. We are together to receive again this year that sacred inspiration, and to defend his name and memory; and now I hope we shall take one step that will do it permanently. It is well known that that little grave by the roadside does not really contain the bones of Paine; that the great Cobbett, the English reformer, thought it was necessary to remove them to Europe. Those bones went to England, but, like the bones of Voltaire, they seem to hav been utterly lost. It is said that they were kept for a long time, until, not knowing what to do with them, a convention of Liberals thought that it was best to hav those bones ground up, and they were ground up and mixed with porcelain and formed into trinkets, which were distributed among his admirers in England. Some think, however, that that was not done; that these bones are buried, and that persons are alive who can tell where they are. To recover them is one of the objects of this society. We shall bring them to this country and place them under the monument at New Rochelle. The title to the land on which this monument stands has been practically lost until recently the friends of Mr. Paine hav employed one of the ablest lawyers in Westchester county to look it up. He believes that the owner has been discovered, who he is willing to convey it to a permanent association. It is the object of the Thomas Paine Historical Society to place the name and fame of Thomas Paine where they belong; to secure a clear title to the plot of ground upon which his monument now stands, and to collect such relics as may hav been associated with him. Let us do this and redeem, if possible, the disgrace which America allowed to be passed upon herself when she refused an honorable burial to the remains of Thomas Paine.

A duet, by Mrs. McCune and Mr. Archer, then put the audience in a proper frame of mind to listen to the following poetic tribute to Thomas Paine by Mr. Putnam:

Crown him who crowned the world
With light from Reason's sphere,
Who made the path we tread
Free from the mists of fear;

Who touched the founts of Truth
With quick and fearless hand,
And lo! the morning came—
Two continents it spanned.

Forever at the front,
Unresting his great soul;
One mighty triumph won,
He sought another goal.

His spirit, like a flame,
Reached to the future's glow;
The best that was achieved
Still onward bade him go.

He was no age's slave,
To voice what cowards think;
Not from the least of truth
Nor throned lie did he shrink.

Hero and sage in one,
Not yet the pean sweet
Of his fair fame rolls on,
Where truth and justice meet.

Not yet the clouds depart—
The breath of error still
Pours its dark pall and hides
The beams it cannot kill.

But the blue sky shall burn
These shadows from its way;
Each glory man hath wrought
Shall blend in perfect day.

When sum of all is blazed
On Truth's triumphant crest;
When worth receives its due,
This life shall then be blest.

The long acclaim of joy,
Which liberty makes great
In human hearts, shall bear
His name to cloudless state.

Renown awaits on him
Amid those temples vast,
Where man shall worship free
His own enduring past.

In a eulogic speech, in which he likened him to Benjamin Franklin, Mr. Putnam introduced his Universological antagonist, Stephen Pearl Andrews.

Mr. Andrews prefaced his remarks by reading the letter of Mr. Willis, of Battle Creek, Mich., which we published last week, in regard to the noble work of Paine in relieving the soldiers at Valley Forge in the time of the Revolution. The letter was read with remarkable emphasis, clearness, and feeling, and produced a great impression upon the audience.

Mr. Andrews proceeded to say that in writings of his own, published from twenty-five to thirty years ago, which are still extant, he had, estimating the drift of things in the world, distinctly predicted that all civilized humanity would at an early day range itself in two great opposing Socialistic parties; one of which, distinctivly religious and sentimental, with instinctiv organizing ability, would be the party of the church; and the other, centering upon ideas and the pure reason, would be the party of progress and political and social reorganization—in a word, a great universal conservativ and and reactionary party, on the one hand, and a great liberal, scientific, and reconstructiv party on the other; and that then would come the great battle of Armageddon; after which, through universal science and universal philosophy, the final reconciliation and harmony would ensue, and that the new departure for the higher integration of mankind would then be definitivly inaugurated.

He had then said that in this coming conflict Protestantism would be virtually disintegrated; that those within its pale who lean to conservatism and high church views would be absorbed back into the Catholic church, while those who are imbued with the true principle of the right of private judgment would be pushed forward into practical unity with the great progressiv army of Liberals.

He had not, until very recently, seen any distinct and open recognition by other writers of this inevitable drift of the social forces operating in the world; but now, within a week, he had read an article from one of the great Protestant religious newspapers showing the urgent necessity that the Protestant churches should lay aside their prejudices against the Catholic and make common cause with the Catholic church against the growing powers of Infidelity. An able writer in the New York Sun, commenting upon that article, has recognized and recommended the same course as the necessary logical situation. Joseph Cook and A. Wilfred Hall hav been for several years engaged in toning up the courage of the clericals and theologians to study, grapple with, and refute or otherwise turn aside the damaging force of science as affecting dogma; and now again the pope, in his recent allocution with the American bishops assembled at Rome, urges strenuously on them to study science or the sciences, and thereby equip themselvs for the defense of religion in the great warfare which is now distinctivly inaugurated between these two departments of the social economy.

It has not been heretofore sufficiently clearly seen that there are at bottom two distinctiv and distinctly opposit principles in the make-up of every individual human character; and by consequence in the make-up of the character of society or of the collectivity of mankind, or of what is the same thing, the Grand Man. These are sentiment and reason, or, in other words, the heart and the head; or, again, socially, the church and the state. Neither of these can in the end ultimately dispense with the other; neither is ever wholly without the other; neither will ever destroy or expel the other. But in the early age of the individual, and in the early age of humanity, these two opposit forces exist in pronounced antagonism to each other, while they are destined later to become reconciled and cooperativ.

The sentimental side of our natures is first to be developed. Sentiment, under the name of religion, has dominated in the past, and dominates still; but it will not always dominate over human affairs. That sort of domination belongs to the childhood or non-age of humanity. A time comes in the life of the individual, and in the life of society, when there is a terminal conversion into opposits, a crisis age in the life of the man and in the life of the community, when he or it comes to "years of discretion" (if they ever do; i. e., if they are not balked of their destiny).

Mr. Wakeman has rightly said that Thomas Paine was a prophet. A mere utterance of the phrase, "Age of Reason," was and is a prophecy. The world in his day had not, the world in our day has not, attained to its age of reason, to its adult age, to its "years of discretion;" but it is approximating that crisis period. The symptoms of its ultimate manhood are appearing. Paine was one of the first, if not, indeed, the very first, to appeal for all humanity in its practical life to the dictates of the pure reason. It was as if a single fiber in the brain of the grand man had ripened into readiness to take on the new development; but the ripeness of that fiber gave out its contagion to its fellows; and at the same time the same conditions which had ripened it were strengthening and progressing, and being brought to bear upon other minds; and from his day to this the world has been rapidly preparing to come under the domination of the rational principle; to bring its passion, its feeling, its love, all the motor forces of the soul, under the guidance of that supreme faculty in man. The higher religion will be when the feeling-part of us, the heart, becomes devoted, consecrated to the execution of the behests of the head; and when the thinking-part of us becomes devoted to the service through guidance or governance, of the heart.

In the orderly, final, and harmonic constitution of humanity as the collectiv occupant of the planet, the new and distinctiv characteristic of that condition will be the paramount regency of the pure reason over the fierce, the foolish, and even the beneficent impulsions of the soul—the administrativ supremacy of the thinking head of humanity. We shall then hav reached the age of reason, and not earlier.

In all these assertions I stand closely allied with the principles of government and human administration enunciated by Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, and the philosophers of the first French revolution, the asserters of fundamental rights inherent in human nature, and of fundamental principles in the nature of things guiding the intellect, and of the intellect or reason as legitimately guiding and controling the whole character.

In all this, on the other hand, I stand opposed to an immense list of great names, even among progressivs or reformers; yes, even among the great lights of social science, as that science has developed hitherto. Swedenborg, Comte, and Spencer, differing in almost everything else, concur in affirming that not ideas, not thought, not reason, is the paramount faculty in man, but that feeling is so. Historically they are correct. The world has hitherto, as I hav said, been governed by its impulses; but such is not the normal type of human development. Reason is the ultimate and permanent regency of and over the human character, whether of the individual or the mass; and with the advent of a universal science and a universal philosophy we are at the precise turning-point from the domination of the mere sentiment to the domination of the pure reason.

Thomas Paine was prophetic. His political and religious principles were beyond his time. Circumstances favored the sudden acceptance in America of his political ideas before their popularity was prejudiced by association with his religious ideas, which were later in being published. The country was aroused and indignant against oppression. The people were in a mood for asserting their rights. Paine came at the nick of time, and with his powerful and magnetic pen and voice cast in the spark which ignited the magazine of their temporary convictions. They accepted and committed themselvs to his doctrins, and founded a nation upon his principles.

But all this was in advance of the real development of the people. When he went forward to announce the same appeal to reason and abstract right in the realm of religious sentiment the whole nation recoiled and turned into hatred and revolt against the teacher from whom they had learned their political gospel. But a great event had happened. A growing nation was committed from its birth to the formal and solemn announcement of the doctrin of inherent individual rights; and of an absolute nature of things more fundamental than traditional ideas or anything else. For a hundred years since that day we as a people hav been getting ourselvs educated into and indoctrinated with the ideas which we then announced and formulated in advance of any real understanding and acceptance of them. On the other hand, we often seem to be going backward, or to be recoiling from our principles, whereas we are simply coming short of having attained to their realization.

In fact, every part and parcel of the whole field of human affairs has to be separately fought over and conquered and annexed to the area of freedom. For twelve years forward from 1660 John Bunyan lay rotting in prison at Bedford, England, for the offense of failing to attend church and persisting in preaching himself without the authority of the church.

It was by the authority of the king, as the head of the church, that he was imprisoned. He was fighting our battle at that day for the freedom to preach by anybody who had a word to utter, as I am preaching here on this platform to-night. In that department of human affairs we hav come into the inheritance of freedom through the firmness, persistency, and supposed obstinacy of John Bunyan, and others like him. During this whole twelve years he was continually approached by the officers of the law, precisely as in the case of Ezra H. Heywood, who is fighting another of our battles at this day, with the proposition to dismiss the prosecution and release him to his family and friends if he would promis to abstain from committing the same offense. "His prison was one of the worst in the kingdom, well designated by himself as a 'den.' There were but two cells and one small court, all on a level with the river Ouse. Thirty persons would hav filled the place, but sixty were frequently shut up there day and night." "Deliverance at length drew nigh. In March, 1672, the king issued a declaration authorizing all Non-conformists, except the Papists, to meet for public worship and devotion in such places and under such ministers as should be licensed from time to time." Some delay took place, but on the 13th of September, 1672, an order was signed which set Bunyan free, and a license to preach was sent to him from the king himself.

So, in that department of human affairs, freedom has been vindicated for us. Nobody thinks here in America of prohibiting anyone from preaching. That one of the three learned professions which now least assumes to be a privileged order among is the clergy. The doctors are stealthily and persistently organizing themselvs into a monopoly, procuring legislation to that effect, for the cure of our bodies, now that the clericals hav abandoned the attempt to monopolize the cure of our souls; and the whole ground will hav to be fought over again for the rights of the people to select their own physicians,

The American principle will be vindicated ultimately upon the broadest basis of freedom.

Mr. Putnam then read the following list of names, which he submitted in nomination for the committee to take the necessary legal steps to incorporate the Paine Historical Association, and to perform such other acts as may be necessary in connection therewith: T. B. Wakeman, S. P. Andrews, E. M. Macdonald, Edw. W. Chamberlain, Louis F. Post, Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., Wilson Macdonald, Daniel E. Ryan, Dr. E. B. Foote, Sen., T. C. Leland, C. P. Somerby, S. P. Putnam, Capt. Geo. W. Lloyd, Miss H. M. Allen, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, and Wm. Secor. The committee was unanimously elected.

After two more songs by Miss Leona Leonard—the second made necessary by the first—the audience dispersed about 11 o'clock.

New England Freethinkers' Convention.

It was a notable gathering. After fifty years of strenuous effort the labors of the Investigator bore fruit in the organization of the many and varied elements of Liberalism into a working force. The choice moment had arrived for the crystallization of subtle ideas and potencies that had been floating in the air. It had been in the hearts and minds of the Liberals of New England for many years, no doubt, to hav such a mighty gathering.

Dr. Lamb, of Portland, was the first to giv utterance to this vague desire. His impetuous words did not for a moment seem to produce the desired result; but the leaven was at work, and now we behold the golden fruit. It was the energy and practical devotion of W. S. Bell which brought the cosmos out of the chaos. He rang the first notes, and the multitude came together, and from this time henceforth the New England Freethinkers' Convention is a fixed and brilliant verity—and, by the way, let me add that this verity depends also upon another Verity, namely, John Verity, who is one of our most indefatigable workers, full of courage and hope.

How fitting it was that this great convention should be called together by J. P. Mendum, who for fifty years has borne the banner of human progress. Marvelous, indeed, has been the advance of humanity since he began his labors. Half a century ago that noble martyr, Abner Kneeland, was suffering in a prison of Massachusetts simply for writing, "The Universalists believe in a God which I do not."

After J. P. Mendum, his veteran fellow-worker, "the old man eloquent," Horace Seaver, gave us a glowing outlook into the present and the future of brighter in Freethought.

Then Susan H. Wixon with gracious words depicted the power of Liberalism in creating and maintaining the best institutions of human society—for Liberalism is constructiv when it has a fair way—and showing how the home and the family will shine its onward effulgence.

In the afternoon there were two remarkable discourses. One was by Dr. Westbrook, formerly a Presbyterian minister, but now almost entirely out of the folds of Christianity. Still he is not quite down to the firm ground. He is lingering in the air, betwixt and between. He believes in Rationalistic Theism; that in some sense, which no fellow can find out, there is an over-soul—an infinit intelligence—a kind of God. Dr. Westbrook argued for his side of the question with a good deal of logic and ability. He showed, at any rate, that he was possessed of a fine spirit of Liberalism. He did not display any bigotry. I hav been there myself—in just his fix of mental faith, trying to believe in some sort of an infinit benevolence, in spite of the horrors as well as sunshine of nature; and as I hav had to find my sole comfort in science, so I think the good doctor will also. There is splendid material in him for an out-and-out Liberal one of these days.

Well, I wish I could giv Mr. Wakeman's reply, every word, just as it came burning from his lips. Alas! that wonderful outburst of argument and oratory livs only in the memory of those who heard it, and to whom it was indeed a rare and noble performance. It was logic on fire. Mr. Wakeman never seemed to be in better spirits. He was like an electric battery, and flashed forth thoughts with tumultuous vehemence. It was a rattling artillery of scientific truth. There was nothing left of the vague "over-soul" of Dr. Westbrook. It disappeared in the lightning-like thought of Wakeman. God was shown to be a most unnecessary hypothesis in the explanation of the world and its processes; it was, in fact, an intellectual nuisance—and in the end a moral nuisance—a stumbling-block in the way of pure and elevating conceptions of life and duty. Never was the "despot of the skies" so thoroughly assailed. He vanished into limbo, and in the magnificent closing words of Wakeman the glory and the beauty of this world were made manifest, the splendid hope of man was revealed—the glorious ideal republic whereby this planet shall far outshine in splendor the gates of the golden Jerusalem.

It is a most unfortunate thing that these winged words could not be caught down and preserved as they came glowing hot from the lips of Wakeman. His speech would hav made a fiery pamphlet for the propagandism of genuin truth. Now its bodying forth has passed away; its incarnation in a stream of eloquence has vanished; we shall not look upon its like again; no amount of will-power on the part of its author can ever recall to the printed page this exquisit gem of advanced thought and hope. Only in the spirit can it now remain, an enduring impulse in the hearts of those who heard, to be transmitted by the thousand agencies of personal contact and remembrance into the onward life of man.

In the evening we had a sparkling address from James Parton, on "Heathen Benevolence." The subject was admirably handled, and it was clearly shown that benevolence is not by any means a Christian virtue, but is one of the universal traits of humanity, nobly exhibited in Rome, Greece, China, and Japan. In all these countries we find institutions of benevolence as fine, as helpful, as merciful, and as well endowed as anything in Christendom. This instituted benevolence is the wreath of honor that the Christian is wont to put upon his religion when everything else has failed. The disciple urgently cries, "Christianity is the founder of all charitable institutions; before Christ there was no love." The keen and brilliant pen of Parton has forever demolished this claim, and now this once vaunted religion has not a wreath of honor left. Hereafter it must content to be regarded as a part of the barbaric past—on the whole, perhaps, a helpful impulse, but nó longer needful for the advance of the world.

On Monday morning we had a splendid exposition of Anarchy from Professor Appleton. Some, of course, to whom this great question is not familiar, did not seem to catch the drift of his ideas, and were disturbed by their apparently upsetting tendency. However, the truth is mighty and will prevail. All expressed their minds freely, and although there was quite a clash, it was the clash of ideas and fervid conviction, and the ensuing illumination was by no means disastrous. All, to my mind, were so many glowing sparks from the stupendous and many-sided whole of the truth.

In the afternoon we had a beautiful oration by Mr. Schell, of Albany, on Stephen Girard and his will; an address by S. P. Putnam, on "Thomas Paine and the French Revolution," and an enthusiastic discourse by Dr. Lamb, on the "Turning of the Tide."

In the evening Bell gave us a lucid and compact statement of that philosophy of liberty whereby "Prohibition is a failure"—and always will be, for it is fatally contrary to the fundamental ideas of freedom. He who would prohibit is a despot—although he may be a very kind-hearted despot; but he tries to do by force what must be done solely by human reason.

After Bell, we had one of Chainey's admirable discourses on "The Affirmations of Liberalism." He vindicated the glory and grandeur of this earthly life, and showed that Liberalism was set for its maintenance and upbuilding into all that is true and beautiful and good. Chainey has now established his immense parish, including Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Albany, and Troy. I hope that every Liberal in this wide circuit will be deeply interested in the movement, and make it, as it should be, a noble success.

I had to take the train on Monday night, and so I could not hear Horace Seaver on "Paine's Work in the American Revolution," or George Hill's essay on Bruno, or Verity on the "Immortality of the Soul," Elizur Wright on "Paine and Franklin," or Remsburg's eloquent defense and eulogy of the author-hero—all of which, I know, must hav added to the brilliancy of the convention.

A most successful convention it was—born in due time, and destined to be immortal. It shall not die, for the vigorous life of the world to come shall flow in it, and hope and aspiration, as well as truth, shall find in it through the advancing years the noblest instrumentality.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Paine Celebration at Linesville, Pa.

EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY FESTIVAL OF LIBERAL LEAGUE NO. 36.

Linesville, Pa., is an enterprising and thriving village of eleven hundred inhabitants, with four churches—Catholic, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Methodist—none of which is thriving. The Baptists manage to float, just keeping their heads above water. The rest are fast sinking. There are the last remains of a Universalist church, but its vitality has been absorbed by the Liberal League.

There is a semi-weekly paper published. Its weakness and imbecility are unexcelled, save by its editor.

This is a stronghold of Humanitarianism. The old antislavery apostles started the Liberal boom in 1836. Their descendants are members of the League, and comprise the most influential and wealthy families in this section. The League has a very neat and nicely furnished hall; but to accommodate the crowds from abroad engaged the Opera House, which has seating capacity for about six hundred.

The inaugural meeting on Saturday evening, Jan. 26th, was held at League Hall. Ex-Rev. Charles B. Reynolds, of Rochester, delivered a very interesting address on "Robert Burns," reciting quite a liberal and choice selection of the poet's best productions, delivering a brilliant eulogy to his genius, and inculcating the moral lesson, Love is preferable to Fame. The address was a new departure from the ordinary lecture, and was most enthusiastically received.

Sunday morning, at the Opera House, the meeting was called to order at 11 A.M., President Brooks in the chair. J. H. Burnham, Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, Judge McCormick, J. D. Mallonee, Dr. McCormick, the inimitable Prof. H. H. Hall, and the handsome and genial secretary of the League, G. W. Baldwin, graced the platform.

J. H. Burnham gave an eloquent and effectiv argument on "Religion, or no Religion," proving the church was not the friend, but actually the enemy of morality, for it taught that moral, noble, true, virtuous life counted for nought; faith in Christ's atoning blood alone could secure salvation.

Sunday evening, at 7 P.M., the house was filled with a deeply interested audience. Prof. H. H. Hall delivered a lecture on "The Glad Tidings of Great Joy." It abounded in sharp points, sound logic, and practical advice, and was a most delightful surprise to the friends of this eccentric child of song, fun, and satire. He said:

Priests claim that the birth and teachings of Christ were the glad tidings of great joy to all mankind, but reason teaches us to judge a system by its fruits, and while the church had extreme power the fruits of the Christian religion were bigotry, intolerance, persecution, poverty, ignorance, and crime. Most critics do not look to see if in the teachings of Christ can be found the authority for the high-handed usurpation and heartless tyranny of the church. They forget to read the 18th and 19th verses of the 16th chapter of Matthew and the 27th verse of the 19th chapter of Luke. And these critics do not go over the ground honestly and giv credit where credit belongs, but they eulogize our civilization and say, "Behold, this is the legitimate fruit of the glorious gospel of Christ." They utterly ignore the causes which hav been instrumental in bringing about our civilization. They do not tell us that before the colonization of America there was no asylum for liberty-loving man. If a man made a discovery which clashed with the dogmas of the church he could choose between three things, silence, recantation, or death. Priests never eulogize John Gutenberg. For his invention never conserved to the glory of God and his holy priesthood, but in the hands of certain ungodly men it has proved a powerful engine with which they hav disseminated their common sense ideas which hav utterly exploded the silly miracles and senseless rhetorical bombast of the biblical writers, and it has proved an effectiv weapon with which to strip the cheap clothing from many a sneaking wolf who was befouling the doves of his innocent flock. And they never eulogize Paine, Franklin, or Lincoln, the trinity of Freethought who hav done more to publish the glad tidings of great joy to all mankind than any other three, by inspiring men to love liberty, by making it possible for the Constitution to be formulated and adopted, and by abolishing slavery. Can orthodoxy show a trinity equally famous for the good done for mankind? If faith and works are a test I would humbly suggest that they choose as their representativs Anthony Comstock, Rev. Joseph Cook, and Rev. John Jasper. But what can we, as Liberals, do to help publish the glad tidings of great joy to all mankind? We can work for compulsory education; for universal education is the quickest, surest, and safest way to emancipate the people from the slavery of superstition and priestcraft. And we must not neglect the education of our children. We should not forget that the true aim of education is to make them independent and self-reliant men and women. We must interest our children in good reading; and see that what they read teaches natural morals. We must be pleasant ourselvs, make our homes pleasant, and we need hav no fears that our children will drift either into the streets, saloons, or Sunday-schools, and hav their minds poisoned with either obscenity or superstition; and when the spirit of true liberty shall fully illuminate the horizon of Freethought men will advance up to the perfection of universal political and mental liberty; and then shall we fully publish the glad tidings of great joy to all mankind, and not till then.

J. H. Burnham, of Michigan, next addressed the meeting on the "Despotic Influence of Climate on Man, his Habits, Nature, and Religion." Monday morning, January 28th, J. D. Mallonee, of Cleveland, Ohio, delivered a lecture on "The Materiality of the Soul." This gentleman is not a professional speaker, but a young man of very great promis and ability. His lecture gave evidence of careful thought and diligent study, and was a very able exposition and defense of Materialism.

This awoke quite a spirited and interesting debate, the conclusion arrived at being that both Spiritualists and Materialists desire to attain to the highest possible mental, moral, and physical development here and now, as the wisest and best preparation for whatever may be their future; and with mutual forbearance, mutual love and confidence, and mutual endeavor, advance the great principles laid down by him the anniversary of whose birth we are assembled to commemorate. Do justly, love mercy, and endeavor to make our fellow-creatures happy.

Ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, of Rochester, N. Y., delivered the oration on Thomas Paine. After narrating the incidents of his life, the speaker demanded:

Does a man with such a noble, useful life record—one to whom humanity at large, and more especially the United States, owes so much—one so highly esteemed by the founders of the republic—deserve to hav his name maligned, his memory blackened, and all his actions misrepresented?

Is it well to contradict Mr. Monroe and stain our national character with ingratitude to one who, all must admit, rendered such important aid in the very darkest hours of our nation's battle for existence; to one by all the chief men of the Revolution acknowledged the friend and able champion of human rights, simply because he published to the world his religious, as he had his political, convictions? Thomas Paine's "Common Sense" opened the eyes of those who read it to the right and duty of all men to be free and independent—to no longer bow in lowly reverence and yield abject submission to the king; showing that his claim to authority and tribute because he was the Lord's anointed was a fraud, a deception, contrary to truth, right, reason, and common sense. His "Age of Reason" opened the eyes of those who read it to the right and duty of all men to be free and independent, mentally as well as politically; showing that they need no longer bow in lowly reverence and yield abject submission to the priest; and that his claim to authority and tithes because he was the Lord's ordained was equally a fraud, a deception, contrary to truth, right, reason, and common sense, as the claims of the king.

The exactions of the priesthood hav been onerous and heavy. They hav never been a producing class in any sense of the word, but hav always lived and flourished upon the toils and labors of others. They hav exacted tithes, claiming the first fruits of the harvests and the choicest of the flocks; the fat of the land, as well as the fattest chickens, must be reserved for them. Thomas Paine labored to save us from their exactions and rapacity.

Costly temples and parsonages without number hav been erected for their service and occupation. The money to build and sustain them is extorted or cajoled from their dupes, or swindled by fairs, festivals, grab-bags, and donation parties from worldlings.

There is talent and wealth enough expended in support of churches to educate all the young in the truths of science, and provide happy homes for all the aged and infirm. Paine labored to save this misapplication of talent, wealth, and energy.

Church property to the value of over $400,000,000 goes free, while the poor widow's little poverty-stricken home is sold to pay for the sidewalk built along the extensiv front of the costly church. The humble little frame house of the laboring man, so long toiled for, earning which exhausted health and strength, leaving the man and his family of helpless children dependent on the poor wife's and mother's earnings, is sold to pay taxes, while the extravagant and wealthy church, together with $1500 worth of property for each and every pious preacher, is exempt. Thomas Paine labored to save the poor from this gross inequality of taxation.

Christ taught vengeance of those who differed with him: "But those mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me" (Luke xix, 27). "And to you who are troubled rest with us. When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thes. i, 7, 8).

Thomas Paine labored to save the lifeeven of his enemies—the most persistent wrong-doer. He declared, "My hatred and abhorrence of absolute monarchy are sufficiently known. But my compassion for the unfortunate, whether friend or enemy, is equally lively and sincere." For which of these teachings, for saving from which of these wrongs, tyrannies, and injustice, should Thomas Paine be denounced? In the language of that brave and noble co-sufferer in calumny and vindictiv hatred of the church, D. M. Bennett, the founder of that best of Liberal educators, THE TRUTH SEEKER, "it was writing the 'Age of Reason' which brought down upon the devoted head of Thomas Paine the anathema of a hireling priesthood in this country and in Europe. They answered his clear, forcible arguments, his sound reasoning, and his telling truths with slander and abuse. It was the only way they could answer him. Up to this day not one of his arguments has been proved defectiv; not one of his positions has been shown to be mistaken; not one of his assertions hav been proved to be false."

Let us emulate the virtues of Thomas Paine. Like him, let us be lovers of our fellow-men. Like him, let us be willing to spend our time, our strength, our lives, in promulgating the good of those around us. Like him, let us be fearless in avowing our honest sentiments and convictions. Under all circumstances and conditions let us aim to discharge our duty to ourselvs and to our fellow-beings, doing all in our power to promote the happiness of all around us, and so best secure our own. If, in the progress and evolution of the human mind, the light of science and truth leads us farther along in the road of progression than Paine traveled during his lifetime, let us go cheerfully where truth leads us. Let us strive to know all we can of the truths of nature and the laws of the universe; and, above all, ever do justly, love mercy, and endeavor to make our fellow-creatures happy.

The ball at the Opera House was really a grand, gay, and jovial gathering, nearly one hundred couples participating. The banquet at League Hall was evidence of the thorough education and skill of the Liberal ladies in the culinary art, only equaled in their liberality and zeal for the promotion of the happiness of their fellow-creatures by the masculin members of Liberal League No. 36.

G. W. Baldwin delivered a glowing eulogy on the noble and self-sacrificing Liberal, Stephen Girard, showing how all his life he evinced a love of humanity, as he labored in behalf of his fellow-creatures, unequaled by any Christian saint of whom we hav record.

Monday evening.—Dr. McCormick delivered a lecture, "Why are Spirits Not Visible?" [The lecture has been published.—REP.] J. H. Burnham gave an address on the question, "Did a World of Rational Beings Ever Hav an Infancy?"

Tuesday morning.—Ex.-Rev. C. B. Reynolds preached a sermon on, "God is Love," and told how he became an Infidel. Judge McCormick spoke on "Liberal Spiritualism," claiming that the church taught, and its members claimed that fear of hell kept them from the commission of evil and wickedness. We, as Liberals, should be tolerant toward them. They judged Liberals by themselvs. With them fear of hell-fire kept them virtuous. Why need we wonder they are afraid Liberals will commit dreadful crimes because they hav no fear of hell to restrain them?

Speeches at Milwaukee, Wis.

From the Milwaukee Sentinel of Jan. 30th.

Turn Hall Vorwærts, on Third street, was well filled last evening, on the occasion of the anniversary celebration in honor of Thomas Paine. Those who joined in commemorating the Deist's birth comprised members of all the Turn societies, the Liberal League, Freie Gemeinde, and Socialists. The meeting was opened by Comptroller H. Smith, who read the names of honorary officers elected for the evening, as follows; president, Robert Schilling; vice-presidents, Emil Wallber, Jac. Kehrein, Otto Knie, F. Sebastian, Peter Barth, A. Keye, H. Zweck, Mrs. Ella E. Stewart, James Ormsby, Mrs. M. Caslin; secretary, John Ulrich.

The exercises opened with an overture by Prof. Hensler's orchestra, followed by a chorus from the song section of the Freie Gemeinde. President Schilling then introduced Mrs. Juliet Severance, who delivered an oration in English.

The speaker introduced her remarks by saying that she did not propose to giv an elaborate biography of Thomas Paine. He was born in England in the year 1737, and in early childhood began to doubt the truthfulness of the Christian religion. In his work, "The Age of Reason," he givs his early feeling on the subject, arguing that a religion which could so impress a child with its repulsiv features was not of divine origin. Mrs. Severance then read specimens of poetry and prose written by Thomas Paine. She said he was one of the most sacrificing patriots of the Revolution, and but for the fact that he assailed the church his memory would be held as sacred as that of Washington. He has been assaulted in the most disgraceful manner by the church, notwithstanding that he was not an Atheist, but a Deist. They could not answer his doctrins and propositions, and so they blackened his character. Paine wrote that he believed in one god, and that he hoped for a future existence. Various lessons are to be learned from his life. The church is as aggressiv to-day as it was a century ago. Theological conventions are held without number, and their efforts are directed to embody God and Jesus into the Constitution. The fact that the magnificent churches in the land are not taxed is in direct violation of the Constitution. Freethinkers are being imprisoned to-day for daring to express something else than strict orthodox sentiment. This government should be perfectly free in this respect. As it is now, it is principally a government of money, by money, and for money. Lawyers, bankers, and millionaires are not fit to be sent to the national halls of legislation. The wealth is continually flowing into the hands of the few. For every millionaire there must be a thousand paupers. Every rich man is a robber. [Applause.] In this connection Mrs. Severance read a poem entitled, "The One and Ninety-nine."

This government should be really of the people, by the people, and for the people, and not one of man, by man, and for man. Mrs. Severance made a strong appeal for the enfranchisement of woman. She showed that wherever men and women congregate it is for the improvement of both. I ask, said she, for my son as well as for my daughter, that this government be made equal for all. [Applause.] Just so long as the memory of Thomas Paine is revered, just so long will the principle of perfect equality liv; nor will it die, but prevail despite antagonism and persecution. [Applause.]

The orchestra played another piece, and the song section of the Milwaukee Turn society sang a chorus. A recitation in German by Miss Anna Hogrefe was well received. Her selection was entitled, "The Song of Freedom." "The Patriot's Grave," by a quartet, with organ music, was finely rendered by Mr. and Mrs. McCaslin, Mrs. Anderson, and Mr. Ramsdale.

Maximilian Grossman was then introduced as the German speaker of the evening. He said that when he first came to America, in 1876, he heard the name of Thomas Paine, whose anniversary was being celebrated in Philadelphia. He did not know who this man was. But few Americans were able to giv information other than that he was one of the foremost patriots of the revolution. An investigation at a library developed the fact that but few histories spoke of him deservedly. And why? Did Thomas Paine ever write a line in favor of tyranny? Was he ever corrupt, or did he betray public trusts? No; he dared worse. He presumed to hold a mirror before the Christian religion. It has always been the greatest offense of man to set himself against the established faith of centuries. The love of religion has murdered more, cruelly, in all countries and climes, than all the justice and crime of the world. We do presume to inflict our beliefs and theories on others, but we base our principles on the broad basis of toleration, [Applause.] Paine first espoused and gave to America reason as the fundamental principle. He showed the discrepancies of the alleged revelations of Tory writ, and was assailed by the clergy with the most unscrupulous and belying charges. His religious criticism was not so severe, nor his philosophy so deep as that of others who had gone before. But he was sincere and honest in his opinion. In England he risked his liberty, in France his head, and in America his reputation. His true greatness consisted in these very acts. He did not suppress his convictions with a view of securing a great and lasting popularity. He did not flatter the American people that they were perfectly free when they were still in the childhood of religion. His pamphlet entitled "Common Sense" stirred all America to the very core of its sensibilities. What he wrote to inflame the patriotic feelings of the colonies enabled Washington to conquer. The speaker derisivly referred to the gay militia soldier of to-day, who, he said, is a travesty on the republic. [Applause.] Paine was not a leader of masses. His greatest weapon was the pen; and honor to him who accomplished so much with what he did not fear to say. [Applause.]

Music by the band, and a chorus rendered by the Socialistic glee club, concluded the exercises.

A vote of thanks was tendered to Prof. Hensler, who, in the last moment, had agreed to take the place of the delinquent Bach. The president called attention to tho fact that a joint movement of Americans and Germans in Liberal thought has been effected, and that all are welcome to the regular meetings of the Liberal League, which meets every Sunday afternoon in Fraternity Hall, No. 216 Grand avenue. The assemblage then dispersed.

Speeches and Banquet at Pittsburgh, Pa.

From the Pittsburgh Times of Jan. 30th.

The one hundred and forty-seventh anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine was celebrated last evening by the Liberal League at Lafayette Hall. The large auditorium was tastefully decorated. Suspended from the large chandelier in the center of the hall were four large streamers of laurel, extending to the corners of the room. The two galleries were also festooned with laurel. The stage on either side was beautified with tropical plants, tastefully arranged. On the wall in the rear of the stage was hung a large American flag. Occupying a prominent position on the stage was a large oil painting of the hero whose birth the League last night celebrated. The main hall was well filled, over six hundred persons being present. Almost half of the audience was composed of ladies.

The exercises were opened with an overture by Staley's orchestra, after which the chairman, Mr. J. E. Emerson, of Beaver Falls, made a brief address, announcing that Mrs. Judge Krekel, of Kansas City, Mo., who was to hav delivered an oration on "Heroic Thomas Paine," could not be present on account of sickness. He then introduced Mr. J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw, Mich., as the orator of the evening, who held the close attention of the large audience for three-quarters of an hour. The speaker was frequently interrupted by enthusiastic applause. He said that the meeting was to do justice to the memory of Thomas Paine. The liberties we enjoy to-day are due to him. Fifty years ago we did not hav the liberty we now enjoy and dared not celebrate the anniversary of Thomas Paine's birth. Had it not been for what this man has done we would not be where we are to-day. The Pittsburgh Liberal League would not hav been in existence. Look at Europe, how the people there are chained down. No one has done more for the freedom of the people of this country than Thomas Paine. His name is familiar to every patriot under the stars and stripes. There are but three classes of men that ever appear in history. The first class is the agitator or inventor, and then come the organizer, and the administrator. All of these were the characteristics of Thomas Paine. He could agitate, organize, and administer. But few men possess such talent. When he followed the army of George Washington he was able to meet the demands of the hour as few persons could, through the closest study of the work before him. The time may come when the name of God or Christ will appear in the Constitution. If the time comes when the ballot is not sufficient to support the rights of the people, then it may be that blood will be required to secure liberty, and a great revolution will be the result. Mr. Burnham then read an editorial in an evening paper on Thomas Paine, and commented severely on the writer, saying he had been greatly misled. Thomas Paine drank no more toddy than any of the clergymen that abuse him, but next Sunday some will tell the same lies about him that they hav told for years. In a brief survey of the life of Thomas Paine justice has not been done. To-day there is not a man who will sit down and read carefully Thomas Paine's works who, upon rising, will not feel better for it—and yet his book is called an accursed work. Do not let your thoughts of Thomas Paine's works be disturbed because of these slanderous words that are uttered against his memory.

The speaker closed his remarks by paying a beautiful tribute to the memory of Thomas Paine.

Upon the conclusion of the oration Mr. Emerson presented the Liberal League with a copy of Oahspe, the new Bible in the words of Jehovah and his angel embassadors, a sacred history of dominions of the higher and lower heavens on the earth for the past 24,000 years, in behalf of Mrs. T. A. Cooper, of Allegheny. The book was received by Mr. Burnham in a fitting speech.

Prof. Wm. Seymour, of Philadelphia, recited a poetical ode on Thomas Paine, which was received with storms of applause. He concluded in a short address eulogizing Thomas Paine. He pronounced him one of the greatest men the world has ever known. George Washington, the father of this country, bowed down before him in honor for what he had done in the great battle for freedom.

The chairman, Mr. Emerson, then read a telegram from the Liberal League at Altoona, as follows:

"League in session celebrating the one hundred and forty-seventh anniversary of Thomas Paine's birth. Mr. James Moore is speaking on the subject, 'Truth crushed to earth will rise again.'"

Mr. Louis F. Falck rendered a cornet solo, followed by a vocal solo by Miss Allie Emerson, of Beaver Falls. The young lady possesses an excellent soprano voice, and is destined to become one of the leading singers in this vicinity. She is young, and has not appeared often in public. Her effort last evening was appreciated, as was evidenced by the storm of applause, and she was compelled to respond to an encore. A zithern solo by Edward Eyth was the feature of the musical part of the program. A recitation, "The Maid of Midian," by Mr. George Dovey, was well received. A trombone solo, "Coming Through the Rye," was admirably rendered by Prof. John Thoma. Mr. Samuel Ambreson sang a baritone solo from the "Pirates of Penzance," which was followed by a zithern solo, a march entitled "The Liberal League," by Edward Eyth. Miss Allie Emerson again delighted the audience with a beautiful solo. A cornet solo by Mr. L. F. Falck concluded the program. While the audience passed down to the banquet hall the orchestra played a number of selections from the opera, "The Bohemian Girl."

An elegant supper had been prepared, and about 500 sat down at the tables. The following toasts were offered and responded to: "Thomas Paine," by J. E. Emerson; "The Press," by Prof. Wm. Seymour; "Heroes of Freethought," by J. H. Burnham; "Religious Liberty," by Thomas Grundy; "Man," by Mrs. J. E. Emerson. Responding to the last toast, Mrs. Emerson said: He is a grand creature—in his own estimation. He rules the world and his home—when his wife doesn't rule for him. He carries a high hand—and sometimes a heavy one. Yet we love him, be he wicked or good, snappish or tender, provident or selfish, smart or dull—we love him—and are careful not to show it.

For, you see, should the dear fellow know it,
He would at once most certainly "blow" it;
As to vex and perplex a cute woman's plan,
Is the unhappy fate of the average man.

He is a good fellow sometimes—most always, I may say. He is willing to let us hav our own way—when he can't help himself—all the more readily if we can wheedle him into believing it is his way instead of ours. He is perfectly willing to let us sigh for him, rave for him; he takes it kindly if we smile for him, slave for him; but, above all, he is willing to let us cook for him and save for him.

He has a place in the world which a woman could not well fill—as a friend, a husband, or father. As a true friend, he never goes back on an old maid, or another man's wife; as a fond husband, he will turn the griddle-cakes and carry the wash-water when there is a red-headed girl in the kitchen; as a loving father, he will spare the birch and shake the child.

With all his faults—they are many; with all his virtues—they are more!—here's to him!

At Brentwood, Long Island.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In accordance with a custom dating back to the first year of the settlement of this place, the friends of Thomas Paine met on the 29th ult. to commemorate his birth.

Papers eulogistic of his character, and commendatory of his great services to mental and political freedom, were read by Chas. A. Codman and Hugh Byron Brown, followed by oral testimony from others to the great service rendered to them by the writings of Paine in their early struggles for emancipation from superstition.

The exercises were enlightened by singing Paine's hymn to "Liberty," and by the reading of selections from Mackaye's poems, suitable to the occasion.

The dominant thought of the meeting was that the treatment of the author-hero of the Revolution by the people of the country he did so much to free is shameful in the extreme, and without a parallel in history. And while it is true that the theological writings of Paine had long ceased to be of value to the most advanced minds of the age, yet his services at a critical period in history in helping to free the human mind from mental thraldom deserve the eternal gratitude of mankind. CHAPTER VIII.

BABY BYE.

Cupples exploited his new duties quite enthusiastically. He felt of some importance to the world and to future generations. He dreamed of what might be. He became quite an adept in the art of taking care of a baby, and knew how to still its loudest cries. Though he had never sung before, he now composed some original melodies, while walking with the baby, that quite charmed his infantile audience. He softened his phraseology; omitted some of its thunder edges, and made it quite unoffending to ears polite. He learned the baby-language; and made some really impressive additions to it. He became patient, wise, and tender, and day by day the waif out of the darkness of night, that seemed so troublesome at first, grew to be a wonder and a joy. Every motion seemed a revelation of beauty It was indeed what all babies are, when we love them because we care for them—the very smile of God, and the breath and music of heaven.

The weeks flew by, and Cupples was busy and delighted. But one morning he awoke and found no baby in the crib.

Cupples rubbed his eyes. What was the matter? Where was the baby? Had it fallen out of the crib? Was it under the bed? No. He went into the kitchen, back-room, down the cellar; he even looked into the ash-barrel. No baby was to be seen. He awoke Mrs. Cupples. She joined in the search with a blank face. They examined the house from top to bottom. The neighbors were aroused. They had heard nothing of it. All became interested in the strange affair. It was evident that the baby had been stolen. But by whom? Who cared enough for it to steal it? The mother? But why should she not claim it openly and thank her child's benefactor? There was no need of such cruel robbery.

It was an oppressive mystery. There was in it a sense of infinite loss and terror. Was the baby suffering? What revenge or malice was to be gratified?

Cupples was like an insane person. He flew from place to place with eager and fruitless inquiry. His face was blanched with agony. The empty crib pierced him like a dagger's point. Its fairy occupant was gone into the darkness of the night. It had come like a star, but it had vanished like a sun, and the heavens were black.

"If I only knew it was happy and safe I could stand it," said Cupples. "But it may be dying. It may be in the hands of villains. This mystery strangles me. It's like a dog at my throat; like poison in my heart."

Mrs. Cupples was equally stricken, she had come to lose the baby and would not part with it for untold wealth.

"I must do something," said Cupples. "I'm like a ship in a storm. I can't shape my course. I'm blind and weak."

The neighbors spmpathized with him, but could only help curse the mysterious thief.

CHAPTER IX.

SHERIFF M'GUFFUM.

Cupples hurried to his bosom friend, Sheriff McGuffum.

"I must find her," said he. "Give me all the help you can."

"Have you any clue?" asked the sheriff.

"Haven't the slightest idea about it. I woke up this morning and found it gone. When, where, or how, is beyond my knowing."

"I should think you'd be glad to get rid of it," said the sheriff.

"I'm not," replied Cupples. "It takes the very heart out of me to have it gone. I feel all used up. My God! what may become of the little innocent thing?"

"Well, the first thing, Cupples, is a description," said the sheriff. "We must find out just how it looks, and then hunt it up. What's the color of its eyes?"

Cupples thought a whole minute and then said.

"I can't fix 'em to save me. Kind of black, seems to me. Bright as dollars anvway, and flashing right into one like diamonds. Call 'em blue. Yes; they were blue like the skies. I remember now."

"And the nose?"

"Flat and not much of it. I thought she hadn't any, at first. But it kept a-comin' out."

"And the mouth?"

"Little, and twisted into all sorts of shapes; but sweet as honey."

"And the hands?"

"Always on the move, and I can't just exactly describe 'em."

"And the feet?"

"Ditto, Guffum — and, dear me! the way they would fly!"

"Hight?"

"Dunno," said Cupples, scratching his head; "'bout a foot, I guess."

"Hair?"

"Hair? I swan! I don't believe she had any. Bald-headed, by Jove!—like the American eagle. Put that down; it's a good mark."

"Any other mark about it?"

"Can't think of any. That's all I can tell about it."

"Well, I shouldn't wonder if I could help you on that description, it is so accurate," said the sheriff. "It's reported to me that a strange baby came into a house not far from here last night. It corresponds very nearly with the description you've given; and it strikes me that it's the very identical one. Let's go and see."

Cupples jumped up with alacrity. His face was full of hope at once. A strange baby, and so like the darling he had lost. Of course it must be the object of his search.

They went to the negro quarter of the town, and knocked at a neat little tenement. A colored woman came to the door.

"Walk in, massas," said she, with an exquisit courtesy and a smile that threw an ivory light all over the new-comers.

McGuffum walked in and said:

"I want to see the baby."

Cupples followed eagerly.

"Oh, yes!" cried the woman; "it's sweet as a picter."

"It must be the one," said Cupples, "for that's just the way my baby looked."

They went to the cradle, and the woman turned down the coverlid, and there was a baby, sleeping, for all the world very much like Cupples's—only it was black.

"Thunder!" said Cupples; "it is a nigger, and black as the ace of spades; and mine was as white as snow."

"Oh," said the sheriff, "you didn't say anything about that. Otherwise it looks very much like the baby you described, and the coincidence was so remarkable that I thought it might be yours."

Sheriff McGuffum was very fond of practical jokes, and this was one of them, and it pleased him vastly.

If Cupples had been a fighting man, no doubt he would have hit the sheriff; but, like all meager men in the presence of those of larger growth, he was a member of the Peace Society. It wouldn't have done, however, for a small boy to play such a trick. Some "colliding" would have followed.

Cupples was a Hoosier Democrat from immemorial years; and to have it thought for a moment that his baby was anything like a nigger's made his blood boil. No wonder his expletivs were numerous and energetic.

"Well," said the sheriff, after Cupples had unpacked his heart, "we are disappointed so far; but I'll take hold and do the best I can. I'll have every policeman on the look-out, and if there's any possible chance the baby shall be found."

The Oath Question.

[During Mr. Charles Watts's recent tour in America he visited Colonel Ingersoll. Among other topics of conversation was the Oath Question. In reply to certain interrogatories, the Colonel gave the following answers, which he afterwards wrote out for the Secular Review.]

Question. I suppose that your attention has been called to the excitement in England over the Oath Question, and you hav probably wondered that so much should hav been made of so little?

Answer. Yes; I hav read a few articles upon the subject, including one by Cardinal Newman. It is wonderful that so many people imagin that there is something miraculous in the oath. They seem to regard it as a kind of verbal fetich—a charm, an "open sesame" to be pronounced at the door of truth, a spell, a kind of moral thumbscrew, by means of which falsehood itself is compelled to turn informer.

The oath has outlived its brother, "the wager of battle." Both were born of the idea that God would interfere for the right and for the truth. Trial by fire and by water had the same origin. It was once believed that the man in the wrong could not kill the man in the right; but, experience having shown that he usually did, the belief gradually fell into disrepute. So it was once thought that a perjurer could not swallow a piece of sacramental bread; but, the fear that made the swallowing difficult having passed away, the appeal to the corsned was abolished. It was found that a brazen or a desperate man could eat himself out of the greatest difficulty with perfect ease, satisfying the law and his own hunger at the same time.

The oath is a relic of barbarous theology, of the belief that a personal God interferes in the affairs of men; that some God protects innocence and guards the right. The experience of the world has sadly demonstrated the folly of that belief. The testimony of a witness ought to be believed, not because it is given under the solemnities of an oath, but because it is reasonable. If unreasonable, it ought to be thrown aside. The question ought not to be, "Has this been sworn to?" but, "Is this true?" The moment evidence is tested by the standard of reason, the oath becomes a useless ceremony. Let the man who givs false evidence be punished as the law-making power may prescribe. He should be punished because he commits a crime against society, and he should be punished in this world.

All honest men will t the truth if they can; therefore, oaths will hav no ffect upon them. Dishonest men will not tell the truth unless the truth happens to suit their purpose; therefore, oaths will hav no effect upon them. We punish them, not for swearing to a lie, but for telling it; and we can make the punishment for telling the falsehood just as severe as we wish. If they are to be punished in another world, the probability is that the punishment there will be for having told the falsehood here. After all, a lie is made no worse by an oath, and the truth is made no better.

Q. You object, then, to the oath. Is your objection based on any religious grounds, or on any prejudice against the ceremony because of its religious origin; or what is your objection?

A. I care nothing about the origin of the ceremony. The objection to the oath is this: It furnishes a falsehood with a letter of credit. It supplies the wolf with sheep's clothing, and covers the hands of Jacob with hair. It blows out the light, and, in the darkness, Leah is taken for Rachel. It puts upon each witness a kind of theological gown. This gown hides the moral rags of the depraved wretch as well as the virtues of the honest man. The oath is a mask that falsehood puts on, and for a moment is mistaken for truth. It givs to dishonesty the advantage of solemnity.

The tendency of the oath is to put all testimony on an equality. The obscure rascal and the man of sterling character both "swear," and jurors, who attribute a miraculous quality to the oath, forget the real difference in the men, and giv about the same weight to the evidence of each, because both were "sworn." A scoundrel is delighted with the opportunity of going through a ceremony that givs importance and dignity to his story, that clothes him for the moment with respectability, loans him the appearance of conscience, and givs the ring of true coin to the base metal. To him the oath is a shield. He is in partnership, for a moment, with God, and people who hav no confidence in the witness credit the firm.

Q. Of course you know that religionists insist that people are more likely to tell the truth when "sworn," and that to take away the oath is to destroy the foundation of testimony?

A. If the use of the oath is defended on the ground that religious people need a stimulus to tell the truth, then I am compelled to say that religious people hav been so badly educated that they mistake the nature of the crime. They should be taught that to defeat justice by falsehood is the real offense. Besides, fear is not the natural foundation of virtue. Even with religious people fear cannot always last. Ananias and Sapphira hav been dead so long, and since their time so many people hav sworn falsely without affecting their health, that the fear of sudden divine vengeance no longer pales the cheek of the perjurer. If the vengeance is not sudden, then, according to the church, the criminal will hav plenty of time to repent; so that the oath no longer affects even the fearful. Would it not be better for the church to teach that telling the falsehood is the real crime, and that taking the oath neither adds to nor takes from its enormity? Would it not be better to teach that he who does wrong must suffer the consequences, whether God forgivs him or not?

He who tries to injure another may or may not succeed; but he cannot, by any possibility, fail to injure himself. Men should be taught that there is no difference between truth-telling and truth-swearing. Nothing is more vicious than the idea that any ceremony, or form of words—hand-lifting or book-kissing—can add, even in the slightest degree, to the perpetual obligation every human being is under to speak the truth.

The truth, plainly told, naturally commends itself to the intelligent. Every fact is a genuin link in the infinit chain, and will agree perfectly with every other fact. A fact asks to be inspected, asks to be understood. It needs no oath, no ceremony, no supernatural aid. It is independent of all the gods. A falsehood goes in partnership with theology, and depends on the partner for success.

To show how little influence for good has been attributed to the oath, it is only necessary to say that for centuries, in the Christian world, no person was allowed to testify who had the slightest pecuniary interest in the result of a suit. The expectation of a farthing in this world was supposed to outweigh the fear of God's wrath in the next. All the pangs, pains, and penalties of perdition were considered as nothing when compared with the pounds, shillings, and pence in this world.

Q. You know that in nearly all deliberativ bodies —in parliaments and congresses—an oath or affirmation is required to support what is called the constitution; and that all officers are required to swear or affirm that they will discharge their duties: do these oaths and affirmations, in your judgment, do any good?

A. Men hav sought to make nations and institutions immortal by oath. Subjects hav sworn to obey kings, and kings hav sworn to protect subjects; and yet the subjects hav sometimes beheaded a king, and the king has very often plundered the subjects. The oaths enabled them to deceive each other. Every absurdity in religion, and all tyrannical institutions, hav been patched, buttressed, and reinforced by oaths; and yet the history of the world shows the utter futility of putting in the coffin of an oath the political and religious aspirations of the race.

Revolutions and reformations care little for "So help me, God." Oaths hav riveted shackles and sanctified abuses. People swear to support a constitution, and they will keep the oath so long as the constitution supports them. In 1776 the Colonists cared nothing for the fact that they had sworn to support the British crown. All the oaths to defend the Constitution of the United States did not prevent the civil war. We hav at last learned that states may be kept together, for a little time, by force; permanently, only by mutual interests. We hav found that the Delilah of superstition cannot bind with oaths the secular Samson.

Why should a member of Parliament or of Congress swear to maintain the Constitution? If he is a dishonest man, the oath will hav no effect; if he is an honest patriot, it will hav no effect. In both cases it is equally useless. If a member fails to support the Constitution the probability is that his constituents will treat him as he does the Constitution. In this country, after all the members of Congress hav sworn or affirmed to defend the Constitution, each political party charges the other with a deliberate endeavor to destroy that "sacred instrument." Possibly the political oath was invented to prevent the free and natural development of a nation. Kings and nobles and priests wished to retain the property they had filched and clutched, and for that purpose they compelled the real owners to swear that they would support and defend the law under color of which the theft and robbery had been accomplished.

So, in the church, creeds hav been protected by oaths. Priests and laymen solemnly swore that they would, under no circumstances, resort to reason; that they would overcome facts by faith, and strike down demonstration with the "sword of the spirit." Professors of the theological seminary at Andover, Massachusetts, swear to defend certain dogmas, and to attack others. They swear sacredly to keep and guard the ignorance they hav. With them, philosophy leads to perjury, and reason is the road to crime. While theological professors are not likely to make an intellectual discovery, still it is unwise, by taking an oath, to render that certain which was only improbable.

If all witnesses sworn to tell the truth did so, if all members of Parliament and of Congress, on taking the oath, became intelligent, patriotic, and honest, I should be in favor of retaining the ceremony; but we find that men who hav taken the same oath advocate opposit ideas, and entertain different opinions, as to the meaning of constitutions and laws. The oath adds nothing to their intelligence—does not even tend to increase their patriotism, and certainly does not make the dishonest honest.

Q. Are not persons allowed to testify in the United States, whether they believe in future rewards and punishments or not?

A. In this country, in most of the states, witnesses are allowed to testify whether they believe in perdition and paradise or not. In some states they are allowed to testify even if they deny the existence of God. We hav found that religious belief does not compel people to tell the truth, and that an utter denial of every Christian creed does not even tend to make them dishonest. You see, a religious belief does not affect the senses. Justice should not shut any door that leads to truth. No one will pretend that, because you do not believe in hell, your sight is impaired, or your hearing dulled, or your memory rendered less retentiv. A witness in a court is called upon to tell what he has seen, what he has heard, what he remembers, not what he believes about gods and devils and hells and heavens. A witness substantiates, not a faith, but a fact. In order to ascertain whether a witness will tell the truth, you might, with equal propriety, examin him as to his ideas about music, painting, or architecture, as theology. A man may hav no ear for music, and yet remember what he hears. He may care nothing about painting, and yet be able to tell what he sees. So he may deny every creed, and yet be able tell the facts as he remembers them.

Thomas Jefferson was wise enough to so frame the constitution of Virginia that no person could be deprived of any civil right on account of his religious or irreligious belief. Through the influence of men like Paine, Franklin, and Jefferson, it was provided in the federal constitution that officers elected under its authority could swear or affirm. This was the natural result of the separation of church and state.

Q. I see that your presidents and governors issue their proclamations calling on the people to assemble in their churches and offer thanks to God. How does this happen in a government where state and church are not united?

A. Jefferson, when president, refused to issue what is known as the "Thansgiving Proclamation," on the ground that the federal government had no right to interfere in religious matters; that the people owed no religious duties to the government; that the government derived its powers, not from priests or gods, but from the people, and was responsible alone to the source of its power.

The truth is, the framers of our Constitution intended that the government should be secular, in the broadest and best sense; and yet there are thousands and thousands of religious people in this country who are greatly scandalized because there is no recognition of God in the federal Constitution; and for several years a great many ministers hav been endeavoring to hav the Constitution amended so as to recognize the existence of God and the divinity of Christ. A man by the name of Pollock was once superintendent of the mint at Philadelphia. He was almost insane about having God in the Constitution. Failing in that, he got the inscription on our money, "In God we Trust." As our silver dollar is now, in fact, worth only eighty-five cents, it is claimed that the inscription means that we trust in God for the other fifteen cents.

There is a constant effort on the part of many Christians to hav their religion in some way recognized by law. Proclamations are now issued calling upon the people to giv thanks, and directing attention to the fact that, while God has scourged or neglected other nations, he has been remarkably attentiv to the wants and wishes of the United States. Governors of states issue these documents written in a tone of pious insincerity. The year may or may not hav been prosperous, yet the degree of thankfulness called for is always precisely the same.

A few years ago the governor of Iowa issued an exceedingly rhetorical proclamation, in which the people were requested to thank God for the unparalleled blessings he had showered upon them. A private citizen, fearing that the Lord might be misled by official correspondence, issued his proclamation, in which he recounted with great particularity the hardships of the preceding year. He insisted that the weather had been of the poorest quality; that the crops had generally failed; that the spring came late, and the frost early; that the people were in debt; that the farms were mortgaged; that the merchants were bankrupt; and that everything was in the worst possible condition. He concluded by sincerely hoping that the Lord would pay no attention to the proclamation of the governor, but would, if he had any doubt on the subject, come down and examin the state for himself.

These proclamations hav always appeared to me absurdly egotistical. Why should God treat us any better than he does the rest of his children? Why should he send pestilence and famin to China, and health and plenty to us? Why giv us corn, and Egypt cholera? All these proclamations grow out of egotism and selfishness, of ignorance and superstition, and are based upon the idea that God is a capricious monster; that he loves flattery; that he can be coaxed and cajoled.

The conclusion of the whole matter with me is this: For truth in courts we must depend upon the trained intelligence of judges, the right of cross-examination, the honesty and common sense of jurors, and upon an enlightened public opinion. As for members of Congress, we will trust to the wisdom and patriotism, not only of the members, but of their constituents. In religion we will giv to all the luxury of absolute liberty.

The alchemists did not succeed in finding any stone the touch of which transmuted baser things to gold; and priests hav not invented yet an oath with power to force from falsehood's desperate lips the pearl of truth.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Two Kinds of Spiritualists.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I find in your issue of Jan. 5th an extract from a reported lecture of Henry Kiddle, of your city. The language is this: "It is true, and I think sad as true, that there are persons preaching Atheism as the offshoot, or identical with, modern Spiritualism. Recently a prominent Spiritualistic lecturer enunciated the Atheistic principle that the universe is a self-existing automatic entity, which is very far from, as I hav found, the doctrin taught through the best mediums and inspirational speakers. On the contrary, the spirit utterances, through these, recognized God as a self-conscious person, having a personal relation to his intelligent, self-conscious creatures—that is, a parental relation."

Now, as a Spiritualist, and a medium, I wish to say that there are emphatically two classes of Spiritualists, both basing their positions upon the reports of spirits. One class—the class to which Mr. Kiddle evidently belongs—may be called the religious Spiritualists, who naturally attract to themselvs those invisible persons, spirits, who are developed in a like direction. The communications obtained from this source are to the effect that they believe in a something operating in the universe, which they call God. They do not state that they hav any direct knowledge of him, it, or her, but feel assured that such is the case. There are those on the earth-plane who make similar statements, and I do not see as these affimations, from either spirits or mortals, prove anything; the more especially as another class of Spiritualists, who also are in communication with those who hav "passed over," state that they know nothing whatever about this God. The spirits with whom they converse are equally ignorant on the subject, claiming that the state in which they now exist is apparently an evolution or development of this, and that there is no "conscious person" manifesting there any more than upon this plane. Those Spiritualists who hold to this view of the case should, it seems to me, be designated as Agnostic Spiritualists; they do not deny God, but simply know nothing about it.

For myself, I regret exceedingly that this question, which has for centuries caused bitterness and bloodshed, should creep into the ranks of Spiritualists to antagonize them and array them against each other. We should recognize the fact that diversity in organization will produce, necessarily, diversity of opinion; that spirits are only persons, translated to another plane of existence, whose opinions, as presented through mediums, should be carefully weighed, criticised, and received with the same deference and consideration which we accord to persons on this plane when speaking upon subjects with which they may be supposed to be familiar.

Musings by the Way.

I.

Was there a God who in six days of time
Created all this universe sublime?
And only sixty centuries hav been,
And endless space was ever void till then?—
A God who in his image formed a man,
One sex alone—a quite defectiv plan;
And then to rectify this great mistake,
Caused him to fall in sleep, his rib to take,
And from it form a woman, that this vale
Of tears, might not of population fail?
Did he a garden make to put them in,
And put temptation there to make them sin?
And did he then decree that in their fall
The race of man be lost and ruined all?
And did a snake converse with Mother Eve,
And this bad fellow's lies did she believe,
And eat the fruit and damn the race of man,
And death bring to the world, and spoil God's plan?
And from this garden did God drive them out,
Outcasts from him to roam the world about?
Above the clouds did he a heaven place,
And people it with an angelic race,
Who could at will fly down to earth below,
On mortals their attention to bestow?
And did God's sons come down from heaven above,
And with earth's fairest daughters fall in love?
And were there born, such marriages to crown,
Those "mighty men of old, men of renown?"
Did men then liv nine hundred years or more,
Though in these days we scarce can reach fourscore?
Did God conclude to drown his children all,
And thus depopulate this earthly ball—
Except one family that he liked best,
Housed safe within the ark, and drowned the rest?
Were heaven's windows opened at this flood,
While waters fell to drown all flesh and blood?
Did old Elijah to this heaven ascend,
And fiery horse and chariot him attend?
Did he and Moses from this heaven come down,
Transfiguration's marvelous scene to crown?
This heaven hav saints seen open many a time,
And gazed with rapture on the scene sublime?
Angels come down from out the heavenly host,
And doves to represent the Holy Ghost?
Did Jesus' body to this heaven ascend,
While God the laws of nature did suspend?
Did God with Abraham a bargain make,
That he a certain patch of earth should take,
And on it raise his "seed," that there should be
"God's chosen people," by divine decree,
Whom he would love, while others he would hate,
Nor could they mitigate or change their fate?
Did he wish these to murder and to kill
The Canaanites, and make the sun stand still
For Joshua, who, ere his sword would sheathe,
Would leave no Canaanite alive to breathe?
Would slay the father, mother, girl, and boy,
And o'er their sufferings gloat in fiendish joy?
Did God approve all this? Did he command
The horrid work of this atrocious band?
To some the evidence may be clear enough;
No Rational can e'er believe such stuff.
A God like this dwells in imagination—
A superstition, an hallucination.

"This Chaplain Business."

No less than twenty-seven preachers were applicants for the position of chaplain of the house. They must hav thought that the Democratic Congress was sadly in need of praying for.—Brenham Banner.

It is said Christ taught his followers to do their praying in private, and it certainly appears more consistent; but then there is no fat salary attached to private praying. This chaplain business is a burlesque on religion, and an imposition on tax-payers, which should be abolished and will be some day.—Sunday Gazetteer.

New Tendencies and Forces.

Speaking of the Materialistic philosophy, Huxley once said that it presupposes the universe to be the work of two blind children, law and force. Not being fully certain that these children may not hav a parent somewhere, Mr. Huxley is an Agnostic. Mr. Huxley, however, has never yet met the parent, and considers the probability to be great that he never will. He knows of nothing behind or beyond the phenomena of nature.

Contrast for a moment this reverent position with that of the dogmatic band who are endeavoring to subvert our government by thrusting a God in our Magna Charta. They assume that civil government is of God, though what they base their assumption on is not clear, except it be the letter of Paul to the Romans. The Christ of the New Testament taught no such doctrin. "My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, my servants then would fight," he is reputed to hav said. It is true his servants hav belied his words, and hav not only fought with carnal weapons, but hav surpassed every other class in destructivness to human life. But Jesus himself took no step to connect his cause with the state. He asked no aid from the civil power; he provided for no soldiers to enforce his commands.

Why, then, cannot the God-in-the-Constitutionists keep their hands off from our government? God has had nothing to do with a republican form of government. He never has ruled but one people, and he alternately starved and stuffed them; kept them in a desert or at war with their neighbors. A slight study of the history of his rule will convince the most ardent Christian that he is unfit to govern a tribe of savages. His rule was a despotism worse than the popular conception of anarchy.

The function of the state is not to foster a belief in the supernatural, to dignify a myth by personifying it, or to lend the solemn sanction of governmental authority to the speculations of a class who thrive on human credulity. Our government is instituted to protect life, liberty, and property. It has been called a necessary evil, and to a certain extent it is. The best government is that which governs least. Ours is limited to material things and tangible acts. Its powers do not extend to the domain of ethics. With morality or immorality it has nothing to do, except the immorality be manifested in acts. The government has no power to do otherwise than protect all people equally. Following the recognition of Christianity, in logical sequence, would come favors toward that religion, and especially toward its authorized expounders, the ministers. We should then hav the "benefit of the clergy," in which ecclesiastical courts usurp the functions of our civil courts, shielding their own criminals, and denouncing heretics. It is safe to say that every minister guilty of heresy would be punished, while those guilty of crimes against morality would be covered with the church mantle that religion might not be disgraced.

It is a significant fact that the same senator who is now such a persistent introducer of bills calculated to destroy Mormonism and scatter the Mormons is the same one who introduced the proposed God-in-the-Constitution amendment. Giv his church party the power, and religious persecution would at once be inaugurated. And who so blind to the lessons of history as to believe that the boundary line of Utah would be the limit within which the fires would be kindled or the stake driven, or that the despised Mormons would be the only ones stripped of their legal rights, their property, and perhaps their lives?

The tendency of our politics at present is towards centralization. This tendency is directed by the money power, to giv them protection against the laborers when the time comes—as come it will unless averted by wise measures—that they shall rise in violence, as at Pittsburgh but a few years ago. Centralization is also the hope of the governmental Socialists, who regard the government as some extraneous force, of the nature of a gigantic relief society. The tendency is also encouraged by the Catholic church, which sees in authority backed by troops its brightest chance to seize the reins of power. The Protestants believe in just enough centralization to put their God in the Constitution, and get their church recognized as the only original and simon-pure religious organization. But the stronger the government the weaker the people. The more the people giv away, of course the less they hav. It will be a sorry day for them when, even in so good a cause as marital virtue, they undertake to suppress a sect. Like an avalanche, once started, no one can tell where it will stop. If a Mormon has sinned against the laws of the country, not all the power of all the churches in the world should be able to shield him from just punishment. But justice should be meted out to the man, not to the Mormon.

The doctrin of a parental government, as laid down by those who would hav the government undertake everything, and the doctrin of a strong central aristocratic government, as desired by the plutocracy of wealth, are alike and equally dangerous. We must recognize that so far in its evolution human nature is fallible and selfish. It is only when it shall hav become entirely unselfish that such enormous power can be safely put into the hands of a few. For instance. The government conducts the post-office, so far as the transmission of ordinary mail-matter is concerned, in an admirable manner, and, we will grant, cheaper than private enterprise could do it. But a Christian sneak and self-seeking hypocrit goes to Washington, and, appealing to the religious sentiments of our law-makers, has enacted, in the seeming interest of morality only, a law broad enough to cover the literature of those who dissent from the prevailing religious belief, and broad enough to cover the classics, the works of antiquity, and even his own sacred book. Being the only one to enforce the law, the latter is exempted, the former seized, and the post-office, while being an institution for the benefit of all the people, becomes also an instrument for the suppression of the sentiments of the few. That is one danger. Another is that the post-office is a big machine for keeping the incumbent party in power. It has, perhaps, fifty thousand places of profit and power. Every place has a vote. It is a big leverage to work on. In one column our Socialistic friend Swinton is advocating a governmental telegraph, with, probably, seventy-five thousand employes, and in the other he tells his readers that the Republican party ought to go. Suppose he gets his telegraph first. No one knows better than he how those seventy-five thousand places will be filled. And no one better than he ought to know that with another seventy-five thousand votes the Republican party can never be made to go. He and his co-philosophers do not adapt the means to the end. Instead of adding to the power of our rulers, the people should take away about two-thirds of what they hav. The duties of the state and federal governments should be kept strictly separate. The one should be limited by the other, and both by the people. There should be no intermixture, and the power should be taken from the state, as it is now from the United States, to enact Sunday laws, sumptuary laws, or any laws which may limit the freedom of moral people, or to appropriate money for any religious purpose whatever. Too much legislation is the crying evil and curse of our country. Elastic as our constitutions, both state and national, are, our legislators hav stretched them to a point where a breakage is imminent. One lawyer can draft a law that ten cannot construe; and for a hundred years this kind of law-making has been going on.

These, then, are the dangerous forces in our politics: the God-in-the-Constitutionists, who are but religious persecutors in disguise; the tendency toward a strong government, desired by the gigantic corporations and land sharks; and the itching for a paternal government, which should giv relief to all, like a monstrous poorhouse, ere the people are competent to manage it or fitted to liv under it. In the place of these there should be inculcated the broadest and equal liberty for all religions or no religions—every man and woman being his or her own pope and minister—the governmental function limited in this direction to the physical supervision of the sects. Instead of a strong government, we should hav as little state interference as is compatible with the peace and good order and equal protection of all citizens in society. In place of a paternal government, there should be a constitutional limitation of land-ownership, honest supervision of corporations—this alone would relieve labor of two-thirds of its burdens, and secure to it its rights as the producer of values—the whole to be supplemented with a general education that shall prepare the people for a better system of society than the present cut-throat method of living, which has been aptly described as "every man for himself, and the devil take the hindmost." There ought not to be any hindmost.

Wendell Phillips Dead.

Wendell Phillips, the great antislavery leader and orator, passed away on the evening of Saturday, February 2d, after a painful illness of a week's duration. The particulars we get from the Sun. His well-known figure was last seen upon the street on Friday, the 25th ult., when he spoke of his failing strength, but did not complain of positiv illness. His address a month ago at the unveiling of the Harriet Martineau statue proved a severe tax upon his physical and mental powers, and he told his friends that his platform days were over.

The first premonition of approaching illness came on Saturday last, when he felt symptoms of heart trouble, such as he had once or twice before experienced. His disease, angina pectoris, had caused the death of his father and two brothers, and he felt that in the end he, too, must succumb to it.

On Sunday he suffered several severe paroxysms, and from that time until his death physicians were in almost constant attendance. He suffered terribly, the pain being intermittent and very severe. Several days ago he told his physicians that he should never recover, but everything was done to encourage him. Not until almost the last did the physicians giv up all hope of his rallying, and even on this last afternoon it was thought he might liv for some days.

The dying man was chiefly grieved to know that he must, after all, leave his much-beloved wife. Mrs. Phillips has been a helpless invalid these many years—in fact, since before their marriage—and many times it has been thought her days were numbered, but in the afternoon she watched at the bedside of her dying husband, whose tender devotion has been the chief feature of his later life.

At about 4 o'clock Mr. Phillips felt somewhat easier, and he attempted to raise himself slightly in bed. The exertion was too great, and a severe paroxysm utterly prostrated him. The violent features of the attack were overcome, but he could not rally. He realized that he was dying, and said so. Conscious to the very last, he recognized his wife and other members of the family at the bedside, and spoke to them. His last words, spoken about half an hour before his death, were about a matter of personal comfort. Then he dropped peacefully away, apparently to sleep. The end came at 6:15.

Like a majority of the old Abolitionist workers, Mr. Phillips was a Liberal. While not as radical as Elizur Wright, Parker Pillsbury, Amy Post, Lucy Colman, and other glorious spirits of antislavery times, he was still so advanced as to be without the pale of the church—the condition, we may remark, of nearly all the great humanitarians of our age. A glowing tribute to Harriet Martineau, the Atheist, was his last public work.

After the liberation of the negro slaves Mr. Phillips struck the liberating hammer against the fetters encircling the limbs of white labor. Greenbackism almost expired during the revival of business following the alleged resumption of specie payments, but Wendell Phillips never forsook the standard, and, could he hav renewed his youth, would hav endeavored to use the present dull times and general dissatisfaction prevailing to carry out the financial reforms of his party. He received 20,000 votes as the candidate of his party for governor of Massachusetts in 1870.

As an orator Mr. Phillips won the appellation of "the silver-tongued." In the hight of the antislavery movement, when the abolition orators were more often rotten-egged than applauded by the Christians of the North, his eloquent voice commanded attention and respect. Yet he spiced his addresses with bitter personalities, and excoriated without stint the churches and business interests that hindered the magnificent reform in which his heart and soul were wrapped. He belabored the foe of the slave wherever he found him, and thus excursions behind the altar were with him very frequent. The churches at that time hated him intensely, but they hav since softened towards him, preparatory to claiming him as a Christian, as the serpent covers its victim with slime before swallowing it. "Mr. Phillips's bitterest speeches were made during the war. From the first he saw that the war was the opportunity for the slave, and he kept urging the North to more activ measures. He was impatient with Mr. Lincoln, and in one of his speeches in Cooper Institute declared that Mr. Lincoln was an 'old turtle.' He made thrilling speeches in favor of arming, educating, and enfranchising the blacks, and was always predicting that they would seize the opportunity to free themselvs at the sacrifice of their masters. He was a warm advocate of the emancipation proclamations of both Fremont and Lincoln, and the fruition of his hopes was found in the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment."

On the Chinese question Mr. Phillips favored the restriction of Chinese immigration as a means of protection to American workmen. He said: "They who seek to flood us artificially with barbarian labor are dragging down the American home to the level of the houseless street herds of China. If the workingmen hav not combined to prevent this, it is time that they should. When rich men conspire, poor men should combine."

Mr. Phillips was born November 29, 1811. Boston had the honor of his life-long residence. At a special meeting of the New England Freethinkers' Association held in Paine Memorial Building on the 4th, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved: That in the death of Wendell Phillips we deplore the loss to the world of an earnest friend of humanity regardless of color, race, creed, or sex; and we extend our sympathies to his bereaved relativs and friends.

GEO. N. HILL, Rec. Sec.

Beginning the Work.

The House of Representativs has begun the work of retrieving the mistake of previous congresses in dealing with the railroads. On January 30th twenty-one millions of acres were declared forfeited. This is the first time since the government began to giv land to corporations that the failure of a railroad to fulfil its contract has entailed a forfeiture. Of these twenty-one millions, sixteen were taken from the notorious Texas Pacific, and five millions from corporations in the Southern states, granted before the war. The roads to which they were given exist only on paper.

This is a good beginning. Let the work of saving the people's property go on.

Joining the Church Again.

In his opening speech at the New England Freethinkers' Convention on the 27th ult., Horace Seaver, the editor of the Investigator, among other things said—we quote the whole paragraph from the Investigator:

"He thought that the Lord should send a thunderbolt from heaven to annihilate those who tortured men for expressing their honest opinions. And why are men not burnt at the stake now? he asked. The only reason is because Liberalism, or Freethought, had risen on the world like an angel of light. Let us hope that, under the Freethinkers, these fires will never be relighted. Liberalism has had its martyrs as well as the church. Their blood has been the seed of the Freethought movement. Eventually the age of faith will be swept away by the age of reason. Let us not forget our martyr in New York, D. M. Bennett, whose early death was caused through imprisonment. [Applause.] Mr. Seaver then spoke of Abner Kneeland, the early Freethinker, who was sentenced to sixty days' imprisonment in Boston for simply saying that he did not believe in the God that the Universalists did. The Freethought movement had struggled through many years, through sunshine and storm—mostly storm—but it had survived and grown strong."

In its "Editorial Notes," the Index of January 31st has this paragraph. It is signed "W. J. P." Wm. J. Potter is the senior editor of that sheet. This is the only signed Note in the column, and we infer from this that the office editor, Mr. B. F. Underwood, not having graduated from the clerical ranks, was averse to fathering the foul paragraph, which reads:

"The Freethought Convention at Paine Hall, in this city, is holding its closing sessions as we go to press. It has fulfilled, we judge, the reasonable expectations of its projectors. The attendance on Sunday was reported as very good. But why did Mr. Seaver blot his otherwise good speech by speaking of Mr. D. M. Bennett as a Freethought martyr? Even if, as Mr. Seaver affirmed, Mr. Bennett's death was hastened by his imprisonment, he was imprisoned not for his Freethought opinions, but on a charge of circulating obscene literature. To count him, therefore, among the martyrs of Liberalism is to stab the Liberal cause.

"W. J. P."

We are, perhaps, as well aware of what Mr. Bennett was imprisoned for as anyone living. We know very well that the charge was "mailing obscene literature." But why was this charge made? Simply and only because in these times a charge of blasphemy could not be maintained. But that the pamphlet upon which Mr. Bennett was convicted is obscene has never been shown by any competent jury. Mr. Bennett had as bitter enemies as ever fell to the lot of mortal to possess. He found in Francis E. Abbot, the former editor of the Index, a most persistent misrepresenter and intolerant foe. Yet, badly as Mr. Abbot hated him, he publicly said in the Index that Mr. Bennett was cruelly wronged, and the book not obscene. James Parton said the same. So did O. B. Frothingham. So did Elizur Wright, Parker Pillsbury, Robert G. Ingersoll, and thousands of others, among them the attorney-general of the United States. The petition for his release set forth the facts in the case, and that petition bore the signatures of two hundred thousand people. Our older readers know all this; it is a part of the history of Freethought in America.

What ex-Reverend W. J. Potter is pleased to consider Mr. Bennett's shame is considered by all good men who know the circumstances to hav been his glory. He was—there is no doubt of it, and we honor him for his courage in not shrinking from the issue—imprisoned on the charge of mailing obscene literature. But when Mr. W. J. Potter says that D. M. Bennett ever sold or circulated any obscene book (except, perhaps, a Bible which he may hav procured for a customer), Mr. W. J. Potter lies.

Editorial Notes.

FREETHINKERS living in Florida are requested to communicate with W. P. Stubbs, M. D., Orange Springs, Marion Co., with a view to forming an auxiliary Liberal League.

IN an argument before the Committee on Internal Affairs relativ to the liquor traffic, on the 29th ult., a Brooklyn assemblyman said, "There were worse men in the clergyman business than in the liquor business."

MRS. CYNTHIA LEONARD deserves, and we are sure she has, the thanks of the Liberals of this city for procuring the services of the young gentlemen and ladies who with songs and music entertained the audience at the Paine anniversary. It was a pleasing innovation upon the custom hitherto prevailing in this city, and we hope will be continued at every successiv festival.

A MOST excellent way to celebrate Paine's birthday in places where the number of Liberals is not sufficient to fill a public hall is the one adopted by Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Martin, of Cairo, Ill. They sent out cards for the evening of the 29th, and treated their guests to something a little unusual for receptions. The exercises consisted of music, essays, remarks, and a supper. And we dare affirm that the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Martin learned something concerning Paine and Freethought new to them. The invitations to this affair were exceedingly well executed. Art and music should be employed by Freethinkers more than they are.

WE hav received from Mr. L. W. Zuuer, photographer, of Salamanca, N. Y., a grouped picture of many of those who attended the Salamanca Convention. In the foregrouud we recognize the manly form of the president of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, T. L. Brown, and the benignant features of F. A. Larkin, author of "Ancient Man in America." Mr. Green, and others of our acquaintances, were either too modest to appear, or very successfully disguised themselvs. To those who attended the picture will serve as a pleasant memento of the occasion; to those who did not attend, but want to see some of those who did, it will furnish the opportunity. Mr. Zuuer sells them for one dollar.

ON January 25th two orders were, on motion of T. D. Stow, of Fall River, adopted by the Massachusetts House of Representativs. One is addressed to the joint Committee on Taxation, requiring it to "consider the expediency of repealing all laws which make any distinction or discrimination in the taxation of real property." The other requires that the Committee on the Judiciary shall "consider the expediency of repealing all laws which, on account of differences of belief and action in matters of religion and conscience, militate, in any manner or degree, against equality in the rights of persons." It is to be hoped the committees having these bills in charge will report them favorably, but it is almost too much to expect. The Freethinkers of Boston, however, will work hard to secure justice.

SEXTON BASS, a colored man, died the other day in Hackensack, New Jersey. A grave was purchased for him by his friends. When the cemetery authorities learned that he was of African decent, they refused to permit his burial. The Hackensack Cemetery Company, whose officers were guilty of this flagrant injustice, is a religious corporation. Its property is exempted from taxation because of its religion. This poor negro had paid money to protect this property. Yet he couldn't get six feet of ground to lie in because of the miserable prejudices of these Christians against one whom they believed to be a child of the God they worshiped. It seems to be necessary that a law shall be enacted to prevent a repetition of this crime against humanity, and Governor Abbett has recommended the New Jersey legislature to pass one.

IN this week's TRUTH SEEKER will be found Mr. Andrews's concluding paper. While not a very direct reply to Mr. Putnam's Materialistic solution of the universal mysteries, it is a scientific statement which, if allowed to stand, will upset all that gentleman's reasoning. Many of our readers hav expressed themselvs as deeply interested in the Universological teachings of the Pantarch, while many more tell us that they often find themselvs wondering what in the world he is driving at. These latter will, no doubt, find their wonderment increasing as they peruse this last paper—if they do peruse it; while the former will, we fancy, be put to their trumps to keep their interest up. We hav sat at the feet of the Great Universal Preacher just a little, and been laid across the knee of one of his pupils a good many times, but we must confess that up to date we are not a Universologist. This, Mr. Andrews will say, is because we do not understand him. It may be so; but the impression steals over us that he has done a wise thing in leaving this present paper till the last.

MR. W. M. SALTER, the lecturer of the Ethical Society of Chicago, addressed Mr. Adler's audience at Chickering Hall, this city, Sunday before last, on "Obstacles to the Spread of Liberalism." Why is the Liberal movement making so little headway? he began by asking. Is anything else making headway? he further demanded. Certainly not the churches, was his reply to the second question; and then he gave figures from the last census to show that while the population of this city had increased 225 per cent in a stated period, the increase of Protestant church membership had been only 125 per cent. The falling off in the progress of the churches, he said, was due to the spread of Liberal ideas, and in one sense Liberalism was the only thing making any progress in these days. But, he said, I fear the word "Liberalism," as it is generally used, means simply dissatisfaction with the old creeds. In this country I fear we are not in the face of conditions calculated to produce enthusiasm or organization. There is nothing like persecution, nothing that compels us to band together for self-protection. There is a deficiency, too, in that striving for some high and definit object that awakens enthusiasm. The progress of Liberal ideas is marked by the gradual crumbling away of the old forms and beliefs, and that goes on of itself. The average Liberal perhaps thinks it is only necessary for all the world to be emancipated like him and nothing more need be done. But when I look at the countless ages yet to come, I think our task has only begun; we hav only unlearned a few errors. I am not one of those who think a Liberal movement should hav nothing to do with politics. The art of politics must hav ideas unless it is to degenerate into the trick of getting and keeping office. These ideas must in the future be supplied by Liberal thought. I had rather hav a political system with the old churches to rebuke abuses now and again than a state ruled only by the almighty dollar. All Liberal movements hav heretofore given too little attention to the inner, private life of man. After all, the question, "How shall I liv?" is the most important one of all. The great stronghold of the churches has been their moral teaching. They are the best guides we yet hav, and I would not hav them swept away, except by a higher system of moral teaching. Let the young men take up the task of reforming themselvs; let Liberals determin that they will acknowledge nothing to be good that is not for the common good; let the world unite in the cultivation of industry, honesty, and purity; let Liberalism come to mean all that, and then a new seed of progress will hav been cast into the future. The task for Liberals, the secret of the advancement of Liberalism, is the effort to found a new era in the moral life of man. There is a kernel of truth in Mr. Salter's remarks, as reported by the Herald, but we fear his public utterances suffer from the impetuosity of youth. He should be more patient. With laws everywhere discriminating against them, with one of their editors in an English prison, Liberals cannot be blamed for not immediately causing the millennium. And they may not be censured too freely if they do not make unseemly haste to adopt the methods of a gentleman who sees in the Christian church the best guide we yet hav to morality. It is a direct accusation of that Liberalism Mr. Salter assumes to expound, that morality based only upon Christianity is unsound, defectiv, and cannot stand. At least, that is a count in the indictment we are prepared to maintain.

Universology, and a Criticism of the Criticisms of Mr. Putnam.—Concluded.

THE FIVE (OR SEVEN) SENSES UNIVERSOLOGICALLY TREATED OF.*

1. The objectiv basis of all knowledge is the Five Senses. It has not, perhaps, been duly considered how fundamental the knowledge of the Senses themselvs must, therefore, be, as the basis of Science. All Ultimate Classification takes its origin from them, and has in it, instinctivly and analogically, the same kinds and number of discriminations of phenomena which the Senses differentiate for themselvs, in their several specialized functional activities. That is to say, there are just as many fundamental classes of phenomena (or appearances) in the universe of objectiv being—with an equal number of corresponding fundamental sciences—as there are physical senses, or avenues to the mind; so that five fundamental groups of appearances and five corresponding fundamental sciences correspond in turn with the five senses, which are our mental instruments for the (co)gnition of those specific groups of phenomena. This statement, if new, is not the less important and guiding in the whole range of scientific investigation.

2. The question first in order, and having a sort of supreme importance in this behalf, relates, then, to the origin, in the nature of things, of the Five Senses themselvs. Why are they five rather than some other number (if they are really five; and if not, how many?), and upon what facts in the universal constitution of being do they rest? or from what facts of that order are they derived? In other words, how do the Five Senses stand analogically related to the fundamental possibilities of Being, the sum of which possibilities is the subject-matter of Ontology (the Science of Being)?

3. The relation in question will be found to be this: Ontology yields, as Kant has shown, under the head of "Quality," which is what the Senses cognize, Three Fundamental Categories (or kinds of appearance, or presentment, for our consideration), which he calls, 1. Negation; 2. Reality, and 3. Limitation; or, in folks-language, we may say, 1. Nothing (vacancy); 2. Somewhat or Something, and 3. The Line or Limit between them; or the place where they meet. It is then found, by the universological method of investigation, what consists greatly in comparing different realms of study, as here, for instance, metaphysical ideas and the Senses, that this remote metaphysical distribution (into Negation, Reality, and Limitation), and the three Fundamental Senses (of the Five, or more) are radically identical, by Analogy, or what is the same thing, by an underlying Law of Unity in the nature of things. The careful attention of the student-reader is bespoken to the following statements:

4. I. SENSE OF HEARING (Vo·,io—vaw-ee-o). The Nothing realm, or Vacuity, or Vacuum of General Nature, is the realm of Being consigned to the Sense of Hearing, as the Something realm, Plenetude or Plenum, is that which is assigned to the Sense of Touch, and, as the Limitary, linear-ray-like intermediary realm between the vacuity and the plenum is that which is assigned to the Sense of Sight. Taste and Smell are then derivativ or resultant, and will be considered later. These statements may at first blush seem fanciful, but the student-reader will hav to accompany me but a short way to feel himself standing upon the solid ground of scientific verification.

5. The universal void, total space itself,† cannot, it is true, be practically adhered to (though good in absolute theory) as the realm of the sense of hearing. We must admit of the idea of the circumvalation of some given portion of space, by a surface-like limit, so as to produce a cell-like, cist-like, or shell or skin-like inclosure, of which the human Ear is itself the final and most highly modified type. The fundamental typical idea, then, around which the Sense of Hearing and its organ, the Ear, are organized, is that of a Negatoid Vacual Receptaculum, which means, in folks-language, an inclosed or partially inclosed portion of Nothing, or mere space, and therefore vessel-like or dish-like in character. But here again we cannot keep to the idea of an absolute vacuum. Things otherwise vacant admit the air. A shell relativly empty is not only filled by air, but this air is in motion, is therefore spontaneously reverberativ (or beating about within the shell); hence generating Sound, and being thus the primal type of an Ear. The sound of such relativ emptiness is called a hollow sound. A stony, earthen, or more solid vessel givs back a more distinct "sonorous" or "ringing" sound—a better developed variety of sound. The ear is accordingly planted in the petrous (or stony) portion of the temporal bones—the hardest, bony (stony) part of the body, which is also the most negativ or nothing-like and least vital portion.

II. SENSE OF TOUCH (Va,io—vah-ee-o). The content, contents, or Plenum of the great general Nothing (space), that which is contained within or embraced by it, is (in the main, or most prominently) Solid Matter, the general type of which in Nature at large is the celestial Orb or Orbs—suns, planets, stars—and, next to them, the more specialized objects, Minerals, Vegetables, and Animals; in a word, palpable things. This (in its smaller rather than its larger features, simply because more accessible for us) is the Realm of Nature which is assigned to the Sense of Touch. Palpable means touchable. In folks-language, we might simply say here, therefore: Whatsoever can be touched, or could be so, if we could reach and handle or clasp it. Technically, we may say, Entical (or thing-y) Reality, or Thingdom.

III. SENSE OF SIGHT (Vo,io—Vo-ee-o). In fine, the Limitary Realm related to Light and the Eye is intermediate between the Vacuum-like Space-and-Air (the virtual Nothing), on the one hand, and the Solidity-like Contents, or Thingdom, on the other hand. It is variously represented, as we will see; but peculiarly and specially embodied in the Rays or Radiancy of the Sun and Stars (in this connection representing the Something-Element) and projected through Space, the air and the minor objects upon which it falls (the Nothing Element); by which it is absorbed or reflected, refracted, and cast about, between, as it were, the affirmativ and the negativ realms. This radiancy-realm, permeating the clearness or intervening Specialized vacuum, and permeated by it, manifesting itself especially as Light, is, then, the Realm of Being which is consigned to the Sense of Sight. This Specialized, Intermediate, Half-nothing-like, Limitary sphere—Light and its accompanying sense of Vision—thus reverts, in character, somewhat to that of Sound and the Sense of Hearing — Hearing and Vision (Vo·,io and Vo,io) having much in common, being both abstractoid or thin-like, as contrasted with Touch and its realm (Va,io), which is concretoid or thick-like. It will take a good while for the student-reader to realize to himself the immense scope of these generalizations, as affecting all the sciences.

6. Confining our attention, for the moment, to these three senses (Taste and Smell must be postponed), it is first to be observed that each of them has, 1. An outer or Matter-like development (Objectiv, or predominantly of the body), as the external Hearing, Touch, and Sight, coupled with the ear, the Body-at-large, and the Eye; and, 2. An Inner or Mind-like development (Subjectiv or Mental); being, then, three corresponding Psychological Departments of the Mind itself. We instinctivly and familiarly speak of the Intellect as the "Mind's Eye." What I am now saying is: First, That this mode of speaking is Scientifically justified; and, Secondly, That we hav, in a precisely similar manner a Mind's Ear; a Mind's Index Finger, Hand, Skin, or, in a word, the psychological organ of Touch (and so of Taste and Smell, likewise). We shall be greatly aided in this class of investigation from the side of Etymology, the unconscious testimony of the meaning of words. Let us recur to and reconsider the three senses in question, in the same order as before, and a little more in detail.

I. The Sense of Hearing.—The fundamental idea here in respect to form is that of the free surface or skin of a globular or round solid figure, which, however, like the skin of a grape with the pulp expelled, may be partially open. The first modifying idea is that of a partial in-filling of the cavity by a thin substance, like the air reverberating in the shell; but we may then go further and suppose any small, thin, trivial objects in the place of mere air. The typical idea so modified is, then, that of vacuum, vacancy, or, at least, partial vacancy, as a receptacle (an empty, or partially empty, vessel), as a dried skin or shell,* with some minor or small solid objects shaking about in it—say a dried pod with peas within it, a sleigh-bell, or a child's rattle, producing sound. The ear is structurally a conch, as is also the trumpet by which the powers of the voice and of the ear are extended. The typical minor portion of the ear is the Cochlea, a word also meaning shell, which it resembles; schall, allied with English, shell, is the German word for sound; and schallen means to sound, to giv forth noise. To sound, in English, means not only to giv forth waves of resonance, but also to sink or to go to the bottom of a cavity. A beauty is flattered by telling her that her ears are transparent shells. Such are some of the indicia of the nature of the primal idea of Sound, Hearing, or the External Ear-dom (Us,vo·i,o—Oos-vaw-ee-o).

7. The Internal Eardom, or Mind's Ear (Ni,vo·,io—Nee-vaw-ee-o), means, by the extension of the same analogy by which we speak of the Mind's Eye, Mental RECEPTIVITY (Submissivness, Docility, Educability, Obedience, Fidelity). It is, figurativly, the making of the mind into a hollow place or Receptacle. The popular perception of this analogy is indicated by the existence of such expressions as, "To hear is to obey;" "Lend us your ears," etc. "To get up on one's ear" is to stiffen the ear; to rise in revolt; to reverse the natural function of favoring attention indicated by listening. Dr. Joseph Rodes Buchanan, the distinguished anthropologist, says rightly, therefore, that "the auditory region [of the brain, the Mind's Ear] is the commanding center of conscious life for education, from which we are to go forward in the brain to the region of pure thought," the Intellect proper, the Mind's Eye (Moral Education, p. 88).

II. The Sense of Touch.—Passing to the Sense of Touch, the type-thought underlying it is, as we hav seen, the solid, entical, or thing-like reality. The governing instance of this, in turn, is the solid round object (gathered in around the one center)—the orb, globe, ball, lump, clod, bunch, the pulp of the grape filling the grape-skin, etc.; specifically the solid globe or globule (or little globe). This form embraces the greatest amount of substance, with the least amount of embracing (limitary or form-like) surface. It is the "plus-substance-minus-form" object; and so, in preponderance, typical of substance; and so allied with chemistry and chemical ideas; Chemistry (or Hylology) being the Science of Substance. Here enter, therefore, such ideas as bolus, pill, pillule, papillus (little ball-like elevation), etc.; which, again, ally the sense of touch, through the papillæ of the skin and tongue, with the ball-idea; and so with the mind's body at large; as when we speak of the solidity of a sound mind, of weight of character, etc.

III. The Sense of Sight.—Arriving, again, at the type-thought, or fact in the nature of things, underlying the existence, development, and scope of the Sense of Sight, this, I hav shown, is, fundamentally, Limitation, the governing instance of which is the Line, thread (Fr. fil), or edge (also Fr. fil) of a cutting instrument; the typical agent in Division, and, hence, in the production and exhibition of limits, boundary or Limitation.

8. The governing instance of "cut" or "di-vision" is cut through the center (as of a globe or ball); which is, then, of necessity, the "cut-in-two." This "cut-in-two" yields, then, hemispheres (two in number); and, also of necessity, two planile (or plain) sur-faces or faces, which are op-posed to and re-flect each other, through the clear or clear-ed space (or relativ nothingness) between them. We also say "device" (varied from "divide"), for mental discrimination.

9. Having assimilated Intellect, or the whole group of Intelligence, or of mind's-eye-facts-or-phenomena, with the external eye or vision (and its group of facts or phenomena), we may now take the two along together into somewhat more of detail, and, especially, through the evolutionary succession of ideas derived from the cut of the ball into opposed and mutually reflecting halves, or plane-faced portions of the ball. The cut itself also gathers the idea of substance to itself, and becomes ideally, and, in fine, really, a distinctiv intermediate independent thing—in a word, a limit, as mere idea, or as a corresponding actual object. The center-cut is, first, a mid-rift, that is, a middle cut, split, break, rift, or division. A most remarkable series of ideas, words, and things, all accurately corresponding with or repeating each other, then ensues. Midriff, a contracted form of mid-rift, taken for a middle section or membrane, is then the English word for the Greek derivativ diaphragm, which is the thin broad muscular membrane which divides internally the chest-contents (the heart and lungs) from the contents of the abdomen—the pectoral floor and the abdominal roof—in all senses peculiarly the divider of the body (in the horizontal direction). Dia-phragm is from two Greek words meaning "through-break," the same idea. Another more primitiv Greek word, phren (in the plural phren-es) meant also, originally, the same thing, the midriff or diaphragm.

10. But, to "di-vide," the idea taken in its mental application,* is to discriminate, or distinguish. The mind (itself the "mean-(e)d" or "middler") and peculiarly the Intellect (inter-lig-t, the "tie-together-between," is, first and chiefly, a discriminator or divider; and then, in a secondary way, a holder-together of the parts separated (mental analysis and synthesis). So also, by the analogy, the brain or brains, the instrument of the mind, is involved; whence, curiously, phren (and phrenes), originally the midriff, came to mean, also, and predominantly, the brain or brains; and so, at length, Phren-ology was appropriately taken as the name of the science of mind, as manifested through the physical conformation of the brain.

11. Again, the Sense of Vision (or Sight) is also first and foremost a divider, or discriminator, as is most strikingly recorded in the etymology of the two closely related—in fact, identical—words, vis-ion and di-vis-ion. They simply relate to each other as the two phrases, "cutting" and "cutting-in-two;" and since every cutting is, of necessity, in the last analysis, a cutting in two, both are at bottom the same. The root is vid (allied with fid, yielding fis-sure), all going back to duo, "two," for divo, which broke into two branches, di- or dis- (equivalent to "two") and vid, meaning the same. Di-vis-ion, or to di-vid-e, is therefore two-two-ing; while vis-ion is simply two-ing. The reduplications (doublings up) of root-words were very common, near the origin of languages, as known to every etymologist.

* The senses are here treated of popularly, as to their namings. The more precise discriminations of the physiologists will be attended to later.

† If it be objected, as it may be, that Space is not mere Nothing, still it is that nothing-like factor of existence which is relativly nothing, as compared with objects contained in space.

† The fabled cave of Eolus (the god of the winds) was simply a huge shell, with its aerial reverberations.

12. Still again: the Eye, the instrument of vision, records the same history of ideas and phonic changes, in its etymology, as mind, brain, and vision. The English word Eye, German Auge, and Latin oc-culus, all go back, for their origin, to the Hindoo-European root-word Ak, meaning to be sharp, the dividing idea; and thence, to see (Lat. Vid, ere). Oc-culus (whence English Oc-cular) means the little divider or opener. The counterparting idea of closing in upon, and holding, is represented by the scope of the vision or of the eye, like the English scoop. So also the opening and shutting of the eye (day-like, clear, and night-like, dark,) repeat these two ideas.

13. The second phase of this wonderful and important evolution is the letting in of a specialized portion of the general nothing-like or pure-space world, between the several halves or parts; the letting in, in other words, of an area or volume of clearness (from obstruction or thing-al matters); and clearness is lucidity, or the first appearance and condition of Light. The term applies equally well to cosmic light or to the corresponding mental condition. Vision is the sense which cognizes, therefore, not di-vision or limitation only; but, in the second place, clearness, absence of entical reality, and hence the quasi-nothing (or partial nothing) which so intervenes or comes between the parts. And it is the same also with its mental counterpart—the Intellect.

14. The third phase of the same phenomenon is the face-d character of each or either of the two hemispheres of the sundered sphere. By the cut, a plane, or level and smooth surface (or two such surfaces) is revealed; and this (plain or) plane surface is a face, or faceet, or phase. The Latin word for face is species, and a derivativ from it is speculum, meaning a little face or facet. Hence arise the English words, species, specialization, speciality, etc. The Eye is the specializing sense, as Touch, or Feeling, is the generalizing one. (Spec-tare means, in Latin, "to look," "to use the eye," whence come spectacle, spectacular, etc., as relating to the eye and its uses.) The face of a hemisphere (and so of any object, a cleared spot down to a mere speck) is the type-fact, and its conception the type-thought, of species and specialty, of spectacle and spectacular effects; as the whole orb or sphere is so of generality and genus, and of extension and resistance. So, also, the intellect is the specializing department of the mind; while feeling (or mind-touch) is less definit and more general.

15. The fourth phase of this same phenomenon is Reflexion, the standing-over-against-each-other of the two hemispheres (or objects), and their mutual casting back, to each other, of their respectiv phases, which are ideally like filmy masks or casts shed from their opposed and so-related faces or fronts. This throwing-forth-against and throwing-back of the arrow or ray, as in the game of shuttle-cock, is the "Incidence" and "Reflexion" of Optics; or in relation with the eye as a speculum (or its assistant glasses, called spectacles). We hav also the analog of the latter part of the compound process in that eminent intellectual function called (mental) Reflexion.

16. Crystallization.—At this point enters in nature the immense and mysterious fact of crystallization. If the cutting in two parts be repeated three times upon the same globe (at right angles) there result from the successiv cuts eight cubes (partially complete) as the governing and most regular cut-up of the one globe. It is thus that the cube is generated; and it is the supreme type of plane, face-like, and rectilinear form—equal, in that realm, to the globe among curve-faced bodies. It then holds the same relation to the Eye and to Sight which the globe (glomus, or roundish bunch,) holds to the whole body (or the body at large) and to the Sense of Feeling. The cube is the typical or governing form in the world of crystals. The crystal is a sort of solidified light. It is in all ways closely allied with Light and the Eye, as also with Limitation, Division, and Reflexion, through its axes, edges, and facets or specula, and through its light-reflecting and light-refracting properties. The right line is the typical limitation-thing; and the crystal, and among crystalline forms, the cube is the focus of straight-line-ism in Nature. The word crystal signifies, etymologically, "cross-stand-ing," with reference to the adjustment of its axes. The crystalline lense is as pre-eminently characteristic of the Eye, as the Cochlea (or space) is of the Ear.

17. Again, the incidence and the reflexion of light upon and from the speculum-like surface proceed in single straight-line directions, one and the other way: and here is the origin of the Ray; although, in respect to rays, the plane surface is again usually convexed, and so reverts to the globular form. Each single ray is, however, itself a single straight line. The word "ray" is from the Latin radius, meaning "a spoke;" and is thus allied with the idea of the hub of a wheel, and its surface, as the source of the rays (such as the sun or its surface for the light ray). But the ray thrown out against and into the opposing object is still more similar to an arrow than it is to a spoke. So in Greek it is called actin, which means an "arrow." The light ray, as shot out, falls upon the eye. The incline at which it falls is called the angle of incidence (on-falling), and that at which it is thrown back (if it is thrown back) is called the angle of reflexion. But the arrow-like ray may be not thrown back. It may pierce, penetrate, enter. In that case the eye—say now, rather, the sentient mind back of the eye—takes-in-through the luminous impression which the ray makes. This, then, is the mental art called per-ception (per—"through;" and cap-ere—"to take"). Perception is thus the primary or least rootlet of intelligence (the mind's-eye-activity). Those who communicate intelligence are arrow-shooters into the mind. Those who receive the intelligence take it in through (per-ceive it).

18. Finally, arrows (those of thought, in the mind's light, as well), having penetrated, stick and hold. So, really and ideally, they inter-tie or bind together the within and the without. They are the ties of mutual intelligence, the means of intercommunication and enlightenment. Or we may go back for the idea of inter-tie to the crossing and mutual junction at center of the axes of the crystal. Inter-tying is, then and thus, etymologically, the meaning of the words intel-lig-ence and intel-lect (Lat. inter, intel—between; and lig-are—to tie or bind).*

19. The prolific Sense of Vision, therefore, and its mental analog, the intellect, sum up or ideally combine the following items: Limitation, Division, Clearness, Crystallization, Cube speculum, and Plane and Right-Line Configuration; Species, Specialty; Reflexion; Radiation, with Incidence-and-Reflexion; Intertie or Inter-lig-ence (and Con-vincement); and Demonstration (Index-pointing, also arrow-like), etc.

20. The following table now sums up the leading morphic-types (representativ forms or shapes) of the three Senses, Hearing, Touch, and Sight. Read from the bottom upwards, as they form an ascending scale.

3. Cube (facet, speck, spec-ulum, spectacular object).
2. Globe (globe, paillus, or little lump).
1. Globe-case (skin, sack, or shell; bag, basket, cask, or other container).

21. There remain the two accessory senses, Smell and Taste. Of these brevity requires nothing more be said here than that their Fundamental Form Analogs are, 1. The row or series of balls, for Smell; and the cone for Taste. The following table will exhibit the five senses with their five Fundamental or Typical Form Analogs. Read again from below upward.

Much, of course, remains to be explained; but the purpose here is merely introductory to the subject.

Mr. Putnam will please notify us if he finds any lack of attention to the sense-side of knowledge, or any lack of an adequate copiousness of particulars.

Stephen Pearl Andrews.

* Other etymologies are given; but this is accepted by high authorities, and accords with the analogies. Con-vince-ment is from Lat. con, with, and vinc-ere, to bind.

Letters from Friends.

Burlington, Kan., Jan. 11, 284.

Mr. Editor: I indorse with voice and pen the advice of Brother Reynolds, for all the branches of Liberalism to unite and contend for a government of and for the people. It is useless to contend about a future existence (which I desire). Let us all be Agnostics, for we do not know, except the Spiritualists; they claim they know, and I think they are honest, and hope they are correct. I repeat, let us unite against our common enemy, king and priestcraft.

Chris. Brown.

St. Catherine's, Ont., Jan. 14, 1884.

Mr. Editor: My mind not being occupied with business just now, I purposed making a few remarks upon a subject which I hav investigated more or less for some thirty years past, and upon which much has been written pro and con, viz., the philosophy of Spiritualism; but on casting my eye over the pages of the gospel according to The Truth Seeker, last copy, I find friend Bruce has anticipated me and given what I intended to say, as far as he has gone, quite as well as or better than I could say it myself. Howbeit, if he has no objection, I will take the stand as an eye-witness of what he has said, and pen a few remarks by way of an addendum to his.

I can fully indorse what he has said upon the subject, and a thousand times more, which I presume he could do also. As he has truly said, spiritual manifestations must be witnessed to be believed. When I commenced the investigation of them I believed them to be the most insignificant humbug ever yet sprung upon humanity, and I fully believed that I could do a big share towards exposing it. I therefore laid plans methodically for so doing, and secured a book in which to keep an account of everything that might transpire, pro and con, in the matter, which I still hav for reference. But to shorten—for it would require hundreds of pages to giv my experience in full in the matter—I commenced my seances, and at one sitting I would get something I thought would be favorable to the exposition; then at the next sitting something would occur against it. Thus I proceeded from day to day, week to week, and month to month, but instead of gaining on my exposition any, I rapidly receded from it, and finally was obliged to admit that it came from the source purported, viz., spiritual; for when I would ask, "From whence come these intelligent manifestations?" the answer invariably would be, "From spirits."

I would then ask myself, If not from that source, what can be the object of the influence invariably saying so? But methinks I hear some one saying, "Oh, you are one of the soft kind that will believe anything that turns up." I deny that assertion, for you will seldom find one—although I say it—who has a more positiv organization than myself. I require proof positiv, so far as possible, for everything.

The philosophy of Spiritualism is a beautiful philosophy for contemplation, but if there is no truth in it I hav nothing to fall back upon but Atheism, which is a most forbidding and disconsolate philosophy,

But I prefer my position to friend Winter's, who presumes to deal altogether in assertions minus any investigation, and those of his ilk, for if I am right I can enjoy another world after casting off this worn-out material shell of mine, if there is one, the belief of which I am much inclined to entertain; and if my theory is false, I shall then be on a par with those who profess to believe in an eternal sleep hereafter. I believe that the life principle exists in everything organized for it, and that we are possessed of it in so far as is commensurate with our organizations, and that it cannot be blotted out of existence. Therefore it must hav some place of existence after our organizations pass out of sight here.

Some who pretend to discredit immortality inconsistently say that this life principle is not annihilated, but passes off into something else. What is that but immortality? I ask. I lay much stress upon dreams and poetic effusions for proof of our being possessed of immortal spirits which can and do manifest themselvs after leaving this casket of ours, for in the production of what we call dreams I cannot account for them in any other way than that they are produced by foreign influence when the brain is in a proper condition to be used for that purpose. I am fully satisfied that my brain when in its normal state has no power to produce the most unimaginable vagaries passing through it from time to time when in a partial state of sleep; and on examination and inquiry of themselvs I find that poets cannot sit down and write a bit of real poetry at their leisure, as they could prose; they say that some influence takes possession of them for the time being and dictates to them what to write, and then departs.

I even entertain a belief, from experience and observation, that the majority of lunacy is produced by unearthly demons getting possession of the brain when in a diseased state and holding it for their own use and enjoyment. If not, from whence come all the vagaries unimaginable produced by lunatics, when incapable of producing anything of the kind when in their normal state. Antics they will perform beyond human imagination.

Mr. Bruce speaks of Professor Sunderland in his article. I hav kept trace of him in his career up to the present time, and hav thought some of his philosophizing in its variety rather good, but he has, like all others, his peculiarities, and one is to be odd and disagree with others. He has that trait very prominent, and I sometimes think he would disagree with himself rather than not exhibit it. Notwithstanding, I like him, for he is a man of investigation, and advances many good ideas in his philosophizing worthy of heed.

In conclusion of this rather random inditement I will say that, although I hav freely investigated the spiritual phenomena, I hav no sympathy whatever with the rites and ceremonies of the churches, nor never had; they are entirely too farcical for me, and hav been the means of destroying too many human lives to meet my approbation. Truth is what I seek for in the various manifestations of nature. What is the greatest development of truth? Spiritualism, methinks; and nothing shall check its mighty current, which in time must sweep all error before it, and divest the masses of mankind from the galling shackles of religious superstitions which hav for ages cursed the world. And what has Christianity exhibited and manifested in all the ages? Nothing but the impoverishment, enslavement, and annihilation of humanity for the benefit of a supposed divinity.

C. B. Thompson.

MOUND CITY, MINN., Jan. 18, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me a little space in which to define Mr. Henry Hyatt's "moral rights." He, or any other person, has a moral right to do anything that will not injure himself nor another being.

He also seems to wish to know how to become pure-hearted. I can tell him what has never failed to work in that direction. Let him love humanity to such an extent that he will be willing to interpose when he sees mankind being degraded, ruined, destroyed, by rum or any other instrumentality.

I hav been writing prescriptions for twenty-six years, and this one has never failed. He rather more than hints that I am not a Liberal. Mr. Editor, I will leave you to judge. I hav chosen the Liberal band of this country to be my friends—to be my succor and defense against the machinations of priestcraft and superstition. The time may come when I shall expect them to fight for me; and when that day does come, "by the eternal!" I will fight for them.

On all questions of free thought, free speech, free mails, and liberty of conscience generally, I am a Liberal. But when dealing with the accursed liquor traffic—the evil of evils—an evil whose sole prerogativ seems to be to create imbecility and misery and devastation and death and hell on earth—an evil which seems to take delight in heaping untold and unspeakable suffering upon the heads of defenseless women and shivering, starving babes—ye gods! in the face of this climbing devil, must I be Liberal and go slow? Not if I can help it, Mr. Editor; and I do not believe that the true Liberals of the country demand it. I will simply call Mr. Paddington's attention to my truism: No man has a right to do wrong.

Yours, for humanity, A. W. SHUCK, M.D.

BRADFORD, PA., Jan. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed two dollars, which you will place to my credit for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I commenced to read it when its noble founder started around the world. We all read it here, and regard it as the best Freethought paper published.

It is surprising how Freethought conventions and lectures are changing people's ideas of theology and old Bible myths. Watts and Chainey lectured here in November to a large house, and it had a good effect.

Wakeman's lecture on evolution has been printed in most of the leading papers, and Bible scholars are beginning to think his ideas of all that is much more reasonable than that contained in Genesis.

We will giv Remsburg a chance in February to tell us about "False Claims," and, Mr. Editor, the Freethinkers of Bradford intend having a convention this summer, and we want to make it the best and the largest ever held in the world. The Liberals of southern and eastern Pennsylvania will join us this year, and then we will visit their sections the next year. We shall extend our invitation to all the world, and remind the Freethinkers of New York state that their success is somewhat due to the patronage they hav received from Pennsylvania.

We shall make a special effort to get the great champion of Freethought, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, to address our convention.

And now, Mr. Editor, if this does not find the waste-basket, I'll expect to hear from Liberals all over the United States, and we want to know who is willing to come to the oil country and see the highest bridge in the world, and make our convention a grand success. Truly yours, C. J. CURTIS.

NEWPORT, ME., Jan. 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Because my every waking hour is devoted to doing good, I hav some friendly criticisms on several subjects.

First, I hav been pained to know that the most valuable paper in the world has not had a word to say in condemnation of the foul murder of Patrick O'Donnell by the most infamous government the sun ever shines on—the English government, or, what would be more proper to call them, a conclave of assassins. Certainly the killing of the miserable Carey was a righteous act, and every just person must hav rejoiced when they heard of his death. But while I rejoiced to hear of his death, I should hav been far happier to hav heard that a bullet or some dynamite had reached the miserable soul of Gladstone and a score or more of lords and dukes, and especially do I want to hear that a righteous bullet reaches the heart of that scoundrel, Judge Denman. But there is one other murderer more infamous, more detestable, more guilty than all the rest, and that wretch is the murderous hangman. If there is one wretch on earth that is to be more execrated, more detested, more shunned than another, that is the villain called a hangman. And if any man or woman would take the hand of such a foul murderer, that man or woman deserves the execration of all decent people. There is a great deal of infamous work done in this world, but none that can compare in real infamy to that of a hangman. And while we can hav no love for the religion of the Irish, it cannot be disputed that for true benevolence in helping their oppressed countrymen there is no people on earth that can begin to compare with the Irish. They hav only to make known their wants, and the money comes pouring in from all quarters.

My second criticism is on some remarks of J. Van Amburg on the Oneida Community, calling it a "gigantic brothel." Whatever may be the religion of John H. Noyes or the Community, it is, as long as they do not interfere with the rest of the world, no one's business. But I know, for I hav seen with my own eyes, that up to this time there has never been any community of men and women that hav begun to approach a true system of human brotherhood equal to the Oneida Community. And to call such an institution "a gigantic brothel" is wicked blasphemy. What are we striving for in the world? Is it not for splendid homes? Is it not good clothes, good, healthy food, good cooking on scientific principles? Is it not beautiful buildings, elegantly furnished with everything that makes life desirable? All these, and far more than I can describe on paper, is to be found in the Oneida Community. There I saw about three hundred people, men and women, and, apparently, a happier lot of people I never saw. Of the one hundred and fifty women, every one but one wore a beautiful reform dress, and all but that one presented that truly beautiful sight, short hair. Not one with the disgusting sight, a coil of hair on the back of the head. Of all the nicely cooked food that I hav seen, the food on the splendid tables at the Oneida Community was the best. The buildings at the Community are real palaces. There I saw one hundred and twenty cows, and all the milk, butter, and cream used in the family. My worst wish to sin-sick humanity is that on this earth they hav at least a million Oneida Communities. There would be no strikes, no hard times, no disgraceful pauper-houses, no insane asylums where they tan human skins, no jails, no prisons, no war, no slavery, but one grand brotherhood throughout the world. The experiment at the Oneida Community may not be perfect, but it is a grand step toward human brotherhood. Let some one do better than they hav, or let them cease to slander a splendid home of human brotherhood.

My third criticism is on a paragraph on the first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 22d, containing a fling of the New York World about Victoria Woodhull. To the editor of that hireling, Jay Gould, I would say that with all the faults of Victoria C. Woodhull, her name will be remembered to be blessed, while his will rot in oblivion. No doubt there are some sad things in her life, but a grander gospel was never preached on this earth than was preached by Victoria C. Woodhull.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

IN THE NORTH MICHIGAN WILDERNESS, Jan. 14, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Alone in the wilderness, literally, treading the wine-press or mill of life alone, I address you, both seeking truth and trying to let my light shine.

I am alone, I said, but there is a small settlement, say a score of families, within from one to eight miles around. A roaring revival is under way among the people—meetings held in a large schoolhouse, and the preachers, illiterate men of narrow views and intensely emotional natures—and under their tuition the forty or fifty individuals, men, women, and children, old and young, who attend the meetings, are gloriously and uproariously drunk, spiritually or mentally intoxicated. In fact, the phenomenon I see going on here is, if looked upon with a candid and earnest desire to learn truth, a most interesting one—the old-fashioned Methodist revival.

Now, perhaps something can be learned from this spectacle that will enable us to unravel some of the string puzzles of theology. I notice the most ignorant, heartless, stupid, and dishonest are the first to be gathered into the fold, and loudest and most boisterous, besides being most anxious to compass sea and land to make proselytes. Understand, I am not questioning the motivs or manhood of any man. They are certainly as sincere, and even more so, than many an honest, clear-brained man. It is the revival phenomenon I wish to understand.

Within a very few weeks, or months at most, these unfortunates will evolve back again, and join the "beggarly elements," as they did last year after the same spiritual spree. We notice that there is a something—call it what you will—in the New Testament not found in any other system of so-called religion, that appeals with peculiar force to the most ignorant and selfish, and that there is a wonderful dividing or scattering power in this influence, never seen in other systems of worship. For some reason (I believe not understood in the world outside of this wilderness, up to the present time) one of the smallest books ever printed has effected Christendom in the past sixteen hundred years as fire cast upon the earth, as a most fruitful cause of division—"father against son, mother against daughter," three against two, and two against three, and the "bringing of the sword" with intensified hatred, bitterness, intolerance, and war (as its author promised), never witnessed before in history.

Now, as I see these religious topers, all embracing like brothers with Brother This and Brother That, Sister This and Sister That, and sincerely promising everlasting love, peace, and fraternity, shaking hands and kissing while making up old differences, and burying the hatchet of past wars, and then within a few days a slight ripple passing over the sea of their subdued passions; when I see them fall apart in fiery anger, and fly at each other's throats like unchained tigers, and divide again into separate knots and creeds, each with their favorit preacher (an ignorant mossback in every instance), do I not see the history of Christianity under a microscope? And seeing this, how can I stop here? Is it not probable that he who spoke the words, "I come not to bring peace, but a sword, and to cause division" and contention, and to intensify every devil in man's nature, knew what he was doing or saying? Let me ask you, and all the true seekers after truth, Is it not certain that unless there had been some greater cause of division and war dropped down amongst men than was ever known before, this vast ignorant multitude (the common herd all over Christendom) would still to-day be solidly united in one or two separate masses, under leaders differing from the masses of ignorant, cruel, and superstitious people only in mental caliber, and that the son of man to-day would still be crucified between the two thieves, or ground between two millstones, as he was from earliest times down to Galileo's day, and still later?

Do you suppose that you would be allowed to publish the grand old TRUTH SEEKER with no division between the poor, blind unfortunates who fill up the churches of Christian countries? Or that I, alone in this howling wilderness and pandemonium of religious rowdyism, could escape being "snatched baldheaded" for my known heresy before this letter is finished? No indeed; and we certainly hav far greater cause to be thankful for Christ's fire cast on earth and to look with reverence upon our deliverer than any Christian than ever lived on earth. So far from intolerance do I feel toward these nondescripts (they filled my cabin one night not long ago, a throng of them, with truly deafening prayers for my conversion) I actually pity them as I would a whisky-toper for allowing a disordered imagination to sweep them off their feet. But is it not interesting food for thought when we look over the face of history, and see the New Testament appealing to the strongest selfish instinct in man's nature (the desire to be saved from endless pain), and after bearing its legitimate fruits of fiercest hatred of man toward man, affecting society as a lump of soda dropped into a vessel of vinegar, starting every atom to fighting against every other atom, and this phenomenon continuing with gradually intensified bitterness until after ages of "variance between those of every household" in civilized lands; at last, the division being completed, and the powers of persecution effectually shaken off, in the last half of the nineteenth century, surely is it not a little marvelous that just as man was permitted to use his inherent powers of mind unmolested, he should start suddenly to his feet, and within less than half a century make a greater advance in all things pertaining to thought and action than he had before made in all past history of his kind? And is it not passing strange that the words, "A new commandment, Love one another," etc., after they had brought a tempest of human hatred, lasting for ages, should at last, after the fire cast on earth had burnt out, bring in the "son of man, with all power given into his hands?"

When I see the modern pioneer placing dynamite under a score or more of immense forest trees, and then with perfect faith saying to that sycamore tree, "Be thou plucked up and cast hence," and then see the truly awful power of his faith, as one tree after another leaps out of the ground in succession, with their roots and portions of their trunks shattered into match-timbers, with the report of Mount Sinai's thunder, the son of man literally doing greater works than "these ye see me do," without the slightest physical effort; when I see this miracle of the human reason, as but one sample in modern faith, and compare it with this atom of history, a revival of religion, and see positivly that the power which shattered the chains of superstition (or mainly instrumental in the shattering or dividing) can be traced almost directly to the book containing the story of a workingman who never did a useless work or spoke a useless word of ceremony—all business, and nothing but business—it almost drives me to go forth out of the wilderness and ram down the throats of theologians that their hour has come and their work is done.

I hav positiv proof that part of the miracles of the New Testament were told at first as a burlesque upon the miracles recorded in the old book, and others told (not written) as parables, to illustrate man's inherent powers then, and till this century, lying dormant in his nature, awaiting the time when the "rock of the sepulcher" should be removed. And shortly theologians must answer the question, Is it probable that God (nature), after giving man inherent powers to make earth a paradise, feed the hungry, heal the sick, cast out devils (ignorance), and "do greater works than these," as we now see and know he has given to man, that he would then require man to let these powers lie dormant, and while holding them in a state of suspended animation, get down on his knees and ask with vocal sounds his God to do the miracle (feed and heal him when sick and hungry, giv him wisdom, etc.) for him, and thus encourage him to commit suicide by never using the faculties given him by his creator?

As I hear these dependants upon miracles making the forest hideous with their groanings, howlings, and squallings, asking God to do for them that which they must do for themselvs (learn truth, mercy, and love, and get bread), or be perpetually sunk in moral idiocy, and make a failure of life's mission, and see them utterly dehumanized, and inebriated by the old system of enlightening man, it is desperate hard work to restrain myself; but I dare not attempt a word; "my time is not yet come" for removing stumbling-blocks from before "my sheep." But the question must yet be pressed home, with a thousand still more pertinent, and theology must answer it or swallow it. The former is impossible, the latter—make your own comments. G. H. BARLOW.

The Liberal Club.

The 325th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club was held at the usual time and place. In the absence of the treasurer the reporter, being a member in good standing, was elevated to the position of doorkeeper. With the exception of incurring the wrath of an irascible old gentleman for charging one of his friends full price for admission, he conceives he discharged his duties in an efficient manner. He could not help observing the fact that many men of affluent appearance, taking advantage of free admission for ladies and Presbyterians, paid only for themselvs, though accompanied by the partners of their joys. The price of admission is five cents; therefore it must tend to elevate a lord of creation in the estimation of the weaker vessel to understand that such is his regard for her that he is willing to make a deadhead of her. As Artemus Ward would put it, "this is rote sarcasticul."

The chairman invited the attention of those present to the illustrious names which were on the program. He challenged competition as to excellence. The speaker of the evening was Mrs. Celia B. Whitehead, of Bloomfield, N. J., her subject being, "What I Know About Dress Reform." The lady was clothed in a loose-fitting dress of brown silk, trimmed at the bottom with fluting, and reaching somewhat below the supposititious knee. The dress evidently did not inclose corsets. Mrs. Whitehead explained that this was not an ideal dress. The perfect dress for woman would hav no skirts. Everyone, said the speaker, recognized the evil of tight lacing. It needed no charts nor arguments to convince people that compressing the waist threw the interior organs out of their natural position. The difficulty was to convince women that they were lacing too tightly. They would draw in their waist and thrust their hand underneath the corset to prove that it was not tight. The only way to disabuse their minds of this idea was to loosen their stays and see how soon they would expand. A sister of the speaker had tried the experiment, and had come to the conclusion that a woman would expand as long as there was any room. Women wear much smaller shoes than men of corresponding weight. This is obviously unnatural, because persons of the same weight should be allowed an equal amount of standing-room, irrespectiv of sex. The popular female dress deprives the wearer of that freedom of limb which is enjoyed by man; and the questions which Mrs. Whitehead would like to hav answered were, How shall women be convinced that they lace too tightly? and, Why should woman be deprived of the free use of her legs? "Legs" was the word used by the speaker.

The lecture was delivered in an easy, conversational style, and was replete with wit and wisdom. Mrs. Whitehead does not profess to be a Freethinker in matters of religion, and acknowledged that she was at a loss to know how to appeal to a body of persons who were not Christians. She believed, however, that Freethinkers were lovers of mankind, and that she could with confidence appeal to them as the friends of humanity. At this appropriate tribute the hall rang with applause.

Dr. Atkinson, taking the floor, said that the lecture was one of the most eloquent he had ever heard. He was a physician, and had practiced for several years. There was a great deal of humbug about the practice of medicin. "If I was God Almighty," said Dr. Atkinson, "I would stop that mighty quick." Mr. Seering interrupted to inquire why the doctor did not answer the lady's question about the freedom of the limbs. Dr. Atkinson said it was not in conformity with the autonomy of the body.

The Great Universal Preacher, following, attributed woman's slavish submission to fashion to her lack of individuality. She should be independent in all things; odd in some things, if she wished, and should take pains to be so, and glory in it. He recounted his experience in walking the streets with a woman dressed in a reform manner. There were two couples of them. They were mobbed, and the other gentleman broke his cane over somebody's head. He, the speaker, was broken up, and did not know how to contend against such a demonstration, so he sneaked out of it, and had felt like a sneak ever since. Now a woman could walk through the city in almost any style of dress without attracting undue attention. This was because somebody, going before, had set the example.

Madam Delescluze held that the line of beauty was a curved line. The average reform costume hid the curves of the female form, and was therefore unartistic. Men were as much to blame for the present defects of female dress as were women themselvs. "Every philosopher," affirmed Madam Delescluze, "is a slave of beauty. Bring before him a beauty in graceful dress and Minerva in a Bloomer costume, and he would choose the beauty nearly every time." Any form of women's clothes that pleased the men would find speedy favor with the women. Madam Delescluze is a most charming speaker.

Several others followed. Dr. Weeks made a brief speech, in which he maintained that no man who was a man had any respect for the woman with a mud-wasp waist. Mr. Whitehead, the husband of the speaker of the evening, said that Mrs. Whitehead had begun lecturing him on this subject years ago. He did not wish it to be understood that they were orthodox. He belonged to no church and subscribed to no creed. When a man put his name to a creed it indicated that he was willing to stop thinking. The speaker was not willing to do that. Mr. Seering believed that men did not understand the lines of beauty in women, and he instanced the proportions of the Venus de Milo. Dress had in all ages adapted itself to the necessities of the wearer, and this accounted for the dissidence between male and female apparel. Mrs. Hall apologized for not interesting herself in the dress reform movement by saying that she had a greater work to do for the salvation of humanity, but refrained from stating the nature of that work. It is supposed to be of an industrial and social nature. If she were once to apply her mind to the problem she could devise fifty patterns for woman's dress which would be both graceful and hygienic. It was detrimental to the brain to pinch the toes.

Mrs. Whitehead, in conclusion, thanked the club for its courteous attention, and said that she had learned much from the discussion. Men would be converted to admiration for reformed dress whenever the women were converted to wearing it. If the philosopher would choose the beauty instead of Minerva, then, after all, Minerva might hav the best of it.

Mr. Wakeman did not hav an opportunity to express his opinion, though it is well known that he makes no bones of saying that beauty unadorned is adorned the most.

The program for the rest of the month is, on the 8th, a lecture by Chas. F. Wingate, C. E.; 15th, Brick Pomeroy; 22d, Courtlandt Palmer; 29th, Lillie Devereaux Blake. This program, added to the fact that there are five Fridays and only twenty-nine days in this month, makes it the most remarkable February of the century.

Other People's Books.

We hav just found time to read Dio Lewis's Monthly for January, and find that it contains many interesting and sensible articles. Mr. Lewis's talk on prohibitory liquor laws, barring its too frequent sops to Christianity—which read a little like prayer-meeting cant—is just, discriminating, and sensible. The writer's work for temperance is too well known to subject him to the wolfish cry of renegade, and in view of the dubious results of fanatical legislation his recommendations should receive consideration by those who are sincerely deploring the immense amount of misery resulting from the use of alcoholic beverages. Dr. Lazarus's "Observations in Natural History" and Felix Oswald's "Lessons of Instinct" are papers which would interest, we think, the most of our readers. Mr. Beecher's old stenographer narrates his attempts to report the celebrated preacher's sermons for the columns of the Banner of Light, which paper, it seems, was the first to perform that service. Thomas Shearman, the "tearful Tommy" of Brooklyn notoriety, explains the "Greatness of Small Things," in which, with commendable forbearance, he makes no allusion to himself—something he might hav done to sustain his title. There are several other essays and stories, none dry, and all instructiv. Price, 25 cts. Orders may be sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOR MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS. A Manual of Hygiene for Women and the Household. Illustrated. By Mrs. E. G. Cook, M. D. 12mo, extra cloth, $1.50. New York; Fowler & Wells, publishers. For sale at this office.

This is a sensible, motherly, sisterly book, written in a clear, plain, yet delicate style. It treats of topics on which hinge more of the world's woe than it has an idea of, because so much of silent suffering finds no voice except the sigh, no record except in pale cheeks and broken constitutions.

The work opens with a chapter on the importance of physical culture, which is followed by chapters on the bones and muscles, the brain and nervous system, the structure and care of the skin, hygiene and ventilation, intemperance, a chapter devoted to bread and butter, in which there is a careful analysis of the processes of digestion, this matter being made plain and practical. A large portion of the book is devoted to the subject of displacements and other diseases to which women are subject. The feeding of children, the rights of children, the question of education, etc., are all discussed, and the work is fully illustrated by a number of fine engravings. It is a handsome volume of over 300 pages.

What Other People Say about Our Books.

THE PROBLEM OF THE UNIVERSE AND ITS SOLUTION; with some Criticisms of Universology. By S. P. Putnam. New York: THE TRUTH SEEKER, 33 Clinton Place. Price 20 cents.

Mr. Putnam is always entertaining, whether behind a pen or before an audience. In this pamphlet of thirty-nine pages he shows us the position of a true Agnostic. Time was when the reading of such books would not be encouraged by the literary people of a community, large or small. But a change has come, and the mind, unlocked from its prison-house, comes out to inquire, to learn, and to digest all that comes to it through the eyes or ears. A statement is not accepted because it is printed in a popular book or spoken by what is called the "voice of authority." The intelligent mind listens attentivly and without prejudice to all evidence, and each individual forms his own conclusions; and it is remarkable in some instances how much at variance they will be, with precisely the same data from which to make deductions. The difficult ground to find is the first safe resting-place for the foot of the investigator. For instance: Mr. Putnam has planted his foot firmly in a geological crevice, so to speak, and his opponent (Mr. Andrews) thinks he has found places for both of his feet—one in the earth and the other in the heavens; and there is a large class of readers who are waiting to see who will climb the highest.

Mr. Putnam, in his preface, has dedicated his little work to the eloquent secularist, Mr. Charles Watts, the well-known editor of the Secular Review, of London. And, moreover, it may be said of this preface that it is an epitome of what follows in Mr. Putnam's review of Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews. In it he says: "The main object of this essay—which has sprung out of a discussion of 'What is Science?'—is to insist upon the unquestionable existence of the outside world. This," said Mr. Putnam, "must be the starting-point not only of knowledge but of enduring impulse. The reforms of the future must be based upon a recognition of the grandeur of physical existence; of the fact that we are bound by its eternal laws and are a part of its life. 'Matter' and 'force' are the terms with which we must deal in our search for truth and in our application of all that we attain."

A couple of master spirits hav locked their mental horns in this discussion. Mr. Putnam is a representativ Agnostic, and Mr. Andrews has grown to a mental altitude which may enable him to bring the light of the cosmical world, as well as the mere illumination of terrestrial science, to bear in solving the mighty problem which is engaging the attention of these two remarkable men and their many interested readers. We shall doubtless hav Mr. Andrews very soon beaming from between two tinted covers in reply to Mr. Putnam.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

THE CRIMES OF PREACHERS.—Referring to the misdeeds of our fellow-men is not pleasant; we would avoid it, but the persistent course of ministers, from their pulpits, assailing Spiritualism and Spiritualists as they do, virtually compels us to reply as we do, by pointing the to world their own sad delinquencies. Spiritualism—modern, we mean—is of recent origin, and drawing into its fold such multitudes from all classes of society—unfortunately for itself, a good many ministers of the Christian church, demoralized by its teachings and practices—that it could not well be expected that it would be pure from the start with such a conglomerate mass composing it. However much as Spiritualism may fail in this respect—that is, in not bettering the condition of the world more than it has in thirty-four years, we rejoice that it is not so bad by half as was the Christian church in the early days of St. Paul, when he wrote such scathing words as he did to the Corinthian and other churches, charging them with promoting fornication and almost every crime known to men, among them. So it is in the Christian church to-day; after eighteen hundred years the church is little better, or the world either, for its existence. For the advancement that has been made no credit is due to Christianity, for it has bitterly opposed every reformatory movement, as it now does that latest and best, giving the greatest promis to the world, Modern Spiritualism. Reader, if Lincoln's confidential companion, friend, political adviser, and law partner, "dear good Billy!" has arrived at such conclusions, is it not worth while to investigate this subject? "Crimes of Preachers" is issued and enlarged yearly. The third edition contains one hundred pages and 870 names of priests and preachers. —Spiritual Offering.

Breaking the Meeting.

[Among the Friends it is the custom to close the meetings by shaking hands, and no meeting is considered properly ended unless this ceremony has been attended to.]

The old-fashioned meeting-house, painted gray,
Was reached by a path from the "king's highway."
The windows were high, and the walls were plain,
Whitewashed, but otherwise guiltless of stain.
Hard were the seats where the worshipers sat,
The men on this side and women on that.
They were sweet-faced women, and hardy men,
And to see them once you'd know them again;
To justice and truth they were firm as a rock,
For they came of the straightest Quaker stock;
But the tender mercy that never dies,
Honestly beamed from their beautiful eyes.
On the platform in front the elders sat,
In brown Quaker coat and broad-brimmed hat,
And Elias Warner and Thomas Brown
Headed the meeting in Bonnyrood town.
For an hour, or more, they all sat and thought,
For no one spoke when the spirit moved not;
On his cane Elias rested his chin,
In communion with the spirit within,
While Thomas sat quiet with head bowed down,
At peace with the world and with Thomas Brown.

At length the good Friends began to ponder
Why, in the name of wisdom and wonder,
Thomas and Elias did not shake the hand,
To break up the meeting and thus disband;
For not one Friend would think of retreating
Till that shake hands by the heads of the meeting.
The sisters grew restless, fidgety, too,
Though keeping sweet patience ever in view;
And the brothers, too, began to worry,
Though scorning the thought of haste or hurry.

You might hav heard drop a pin on the floor,
'Twas so still, when there came an awful snore
From under a grave-looking, broad-brimmed hat,
Where the heads of Bonnyrood meeting sat!
Elias, whose eyes o'er the flock did keep
Most solemn watch, was now fast asleep!
When Thomas Brown heard that terrible sound,
He carefully snuffed, and then looked around!
Yet he meekly waited for Patience' sake,
Until from his nap Elias should wake.
But Elias slumbered with mighty power,
And snored as calmly as at midnight hour;
At last a fly that was sauntering by,
Crept across his nose and along his eye;
Then into his nostril it buzzed about,
Till Elias woke with almost a shout,
When, the long-expectant faces viewing,
He guessed the trouble that had been brewing,
And, as if for the mishap to atone,
Reached out to Thomas who sat like a stone!

In the stillness not a worshipper stirred,
When another terrible snore was heard!
For, while guarding Elias's slumber deep,
Thomas Brown himself had dropped off asleep!
The old Friends scowled, and the young Friends were mad,
And shuffled their feet and whispered, "Too bad!"
Jonathan Grey told Israel Keller
To prod the sleeper with cane or umbrella;
But Israel would rather die than do
Such a graceless act, and in meeting, too!
Isaac A. Connor took a pinch of snuff
And said to Job Ray, "Thee looks tired enough!"
And Ruth White whispered to Roxana Brow,
"That meat will burn—I smell it now!"
Phebe Ann Smith sat and trotted her feet,
Uneasily moving about in her seat.
Loud and louder grew the snore of Thomas,
Like fog horn over a land of promis.

The Friends were getting rather excited,
Especially those to dinner invited,
For Thomas might sleep a good hour or more,
And that unwavering, terrific snore
Might win Elias to slumber again,
And thus, until sundown, might he remain.
Elias, hungry, as well as the rest,
Meekly considered 'twas all for the best;
Yet, seemed once to debate, whether or no,
He should gently scrouge Thomas with his elbow.
But he turned his thoughts to Jacob's ladder,
While the friends around grew madder and madder,
Though not for the world would they hav it known
That temper came in when patience had flown.

Suddenly Thomas laughed out in his sleep,
As if insult on injury he would heap;
He exclaimed in a tone, laughing, yet sly,
"Now, Hannah, why doesn't thee cut that pie?"
Then wide he opened his great blue eyes,
And looked wildly around in much surprise.
With a groan he grasped Elias's hand,
As a sign that the meeting might disband.
Elias Warner sat still as a mouse,
While Thomas sailed out of the meeting-house.
The young friends laughed, and coughed, and wiggled,
And the old friends smiled, and almost giggled,
While inwardly thinking it might be wise,
On a new basis to reorganize,
That wide-awake men, with kindly greeting,
Might sit at the head of Bonnyrood meeting.

What Little Benny Did.

Benny was a pretty little fellow of barely five years, a darling little boy whom to know was to love. One time his dear mother was obliged to go away from home on some important business, leaving Benny in charge of his papa and the other members of the family. He had never been a strong and robust child, and his mother had been very indulgent toward him, so that his first separation from his "first best friend," seemed a very severe blow to the delicate, sensitiv boy. It was the first real grief of his little life, and it seemed as if his poor baby heart would break as he felt the loneliness of home without a mother. He loved his papa and all his other relativs, but for his dear mamma he had, in a deep degree, that fond and peculiar attachment which exists only between a child and its mother.

All day long, as the weary hours, one by one, sped away, he mourned her absence, and every now and then he would giv vent to his sorrow in tears and sobs. As the night came on, and cast its sable mantle over hill and valley, Benny felt more lonely than ever, and to add to his gloom, the whole sky became overcast with clouds. The moon was hidden from his eyes, and he could see no bright and twinkling stars, as he sat and waited for his papa to come home from his place of business.

Presently he heard the well-known step, and his heart gave a great bound of delight. "Papa has come!" he said, and he ran with nimble feet to meet him. But he could only talk of mamma, and tell how lonely he had been all day.

Oh, how he wanted to see "mamma, dear mamma!" and would she come soon, and how glad he would be to see her sweet face again. All his thoughts went out to the absent one, and presently he was weeping for her again.

His papa soothed and quieted him, and told him many little stories, holding him on his knee, and caressing his little hands and face. He said, "We will not talk of mamma gone, but of mamma coming home," and of all the new things mamma would bring to him.

"Benny will hav a handsome new suit, and a pair of boots! Just think of it! a pair of boots for little Benny!"

"With legs to come way up to my knees?" inquired the little fellow, "like papa's?"

"Yes, great long legs reaching to Benny's little knees! And a new cap, too! Won't papa's boy look very nice, and won't he go clattering up and down stairs in his big boots, just like any other man?"

Benny grew calm, anticipating the good things in store for him when mamma should come home, and finally a new silver quarter of a dollar made him very proud and happy, for he had never had so much money before at one time, in all his little life. And then when his papa promised he should sleep in his bed with him, instead of in his little crib, he was delighted as much as he possibly could be, in the absence of the one being he loved best on earth.

Once quieted, he soon became sleepy, and, being undressed, was tucked snugly in his papa's bed, his little fingers still clutching tightly the silver coin. And it was very fortunate, too, that he persisted in holding on to his new silver quarter, as the sequel will plainly show; for about the middle of the night, as Benny lay cuddled in his papa's arms, both fast asleep, and all the household was wrapped in quiet slumber, stealthy footsteps went softly prowling from room to room, until, finally, their owner stood in the room, and close to the bed where lay little Benny asleep in his papa's arms.

Then, without a single moment's warning, a dark lantern flashed a glaring and blinding stream of light into their sleep-bound faces. They both awoke instantly, and looked up to see a villainous-looking face, peering down upon them, and in his hand the midnight invader held a sharp and glistening dagger.

"I want your money!" said the robber, curtly. "Giv it to me!"

Little Benny and his father both comprehended the situation at the same time, and before the father could speak, Benny, with his great, wondering eyes, full of childlike innocence and purity, looked the bold bad man squarely in the face, and, extending his little hand with the new silver quarter of a dollar laid in the palm, said lispingly: "Papa hasn't dot no money! I dot it! Here, take it; you may hav it; but, you mustn't hurt my papa!" putting his arm around his papa's neck, and looking pleadingly into the robber's face.

The man gazed upon the innocent and confiding child, whose eyes expressed the confidence that he had complied with the full demand of the thief. The man's hands trembled as he looked into those loving eyes, and a sense of weakness possessed his whole body. In broken accents he said hoarsely, yet tenderly, "No, darling, I will not take your money, nor hurt you, either;" and, pushing aside the baby hand of little Benny, he departed as rapidly as possible, brushing the tears from his eyes as he went.

In relating the latter part of this story to a reporter in a prison cell, some years after, this man said further: "The memory of that one scene will go with me to the grave. Had I obeyed the voice that then spoke to me through that innocent and lovely child, I would not now be lying here in a prison cell, surrounded with filth and vermin. I believe it was the last call I had to return to the path of honor and manhood. And whatever of crime I failed to do since then was in consequence of a reflection awakened on that eventful night when I attempted to rob Mr. Stone, and his little son, Benny."

What a lesson is here to heed the prompting of the better nature, to turn away from evil, and walk uprightly in the paths of truth and right, "whose ways are ways of pleasant ness, and all whose paths are peace!" P.

FOR GIRLS.

SPECIAL PHYSIOLOGY;

OR, SUPPLEMENT

To the Study of General Physiology.

ILLUSTRATED.

By Mrs. E. R. SHEPHERD.

12mo, Extra Cloth. Price, $1.00.

We have here a work, the need of which has long been felt by all intelligent women, and especially the mothers; conveying to the girls that special knowledge which, for proper reasons, must be omitted altogether from the general and school physiologies. Written in a careful and entirely unobjectionable manner, it is so plain and practical as to be easily understood, and its perusal is sure to leave an impression of the importance of the work on the minds of the readers It discusses the Physiology of Women; The proper relation of Dress to Comfort and to Health; The Age of Puberty; Menstruation; Some of the Diseases of Women, their causes and prevention; Something about Marriage and Motherhood, and many other topics of importance.

The special attention of mothers is called to this work, with the hope that they will read it, and convey to their daughters or girls in their charge the information given; or, better still, after reading, place the book in the hands of girls for whom it was written. A special descriptive and personal circular to mothers will be sent on application.

"Jennie June" (Mrs. J. C. CROLY, Editor of Demorest's Magazine), says:

"I have read 'For Girls' with care, and feel personally obliged to the author for writing a book that is very much needed, and that mothers not only can, but ought to place in the hands of their daughters. Mrs. Shepherd has executed a difficult task with judgment and discretion. She has said many things which mothers find it difficult to say to their daughters, unless forced by some act or circumstances, which, alas, may prove their warning comes too late. 'For Girls' is free from the vices of most works of its kind; it is neither preachy nor didactic. It talks freely and familiarly with those it is written to benefit, and some of its counsels would be as well heeded by our boys, as our girls."

Dr. DIO LEWIS, the well-known writer on Physiology and Health Topics, says:

"It is a long time since I have read any work on the subject of human health with as much interest as your recent publication, 'For Girls,' by Mrs. Shepherd.

"I have written at the conclusion of more than one chapter such words as, 'The best presentation of the theme extant.' I trust you are employing the most energetic measures to place it in the hands of our American girls. A philanthropic person could spend $10,000 in no wiser way than to place it in your hands for the distribution of this inestimable little book."

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

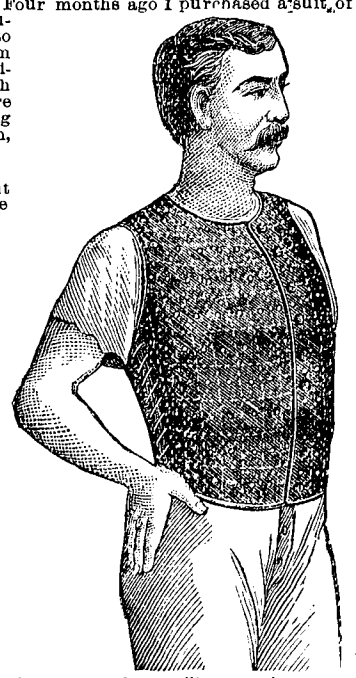
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselves. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

Gems of Thought.

ALL persons who hav come to the age of maturity should remember that a responsibility of much weight rests upon them. Their example before the young should be such as to incline them to good actions, and not to wrong. Good parents insure good children, discretion on the part of the young; while the more imprudence and impropriety seen by the young, the more they will be attracted to the wrong. —D. M. Bennett.

THERE is one influence in human life which, while it lasts, is acknowledged by all to be "Lord and King." I allude not to love, but to sea-sickness. While we are suffering from that malady, it is no matter to us what has happened to us, or what is about to happen. We may be on our wedding-tour, or catching at our last chance of life in a voyage to Madeira. We may hav our pocketbook full of circular notes obtained in a legitimate way from our own banker, to be spent in pleasure, or we may be answering an advertisment in person which holds forth our only hopes of livelihood. We may be Calvinistically cock-sure of future felicity, or hav the greatest doubts upon that subject. It matters not one dump to us while in the throes of that marine malady.—James Payn's From Exile.

BUDDHA.

Whoe'er hath wept one tear, or borne one pain
(The master said, and entered into rest),
Not fearing wrath, nor meaning to be blest,
Simply for love, howbeit wrought in vain,
Of one poor soul, his brother, being old,
Or sick, or lost through satisfied desire,
Stands in God's vestibule, and hears his choir
Make merry music on their harps of gold.

What is it but the deed of Very Love,
To teach sad eyes to smile, mute lips to move?
And he that for a score of centuries
Hath lived, and calls a continent his own,
Giving world-weary souls heaven's best surprise,
Halts only at the threshold of the throne.

—The Spectator.

TO oppose the torrent of scholastic religion by such feeble maxims as these, that "it is impossible for the same thing to be and not to be," that "the whole is greater than a part," that "two and three make five," is pretending to stop the ocean with a bulrush. Will you set up proper reason against sacred mystery? No punishment is great enough for your impiety. And the same fires which were kindled for heretics will serve also for the destruction of philosophers.—Hume's Essays.

IT is written: "Many shall run to and fro and knowledge shall be increased." Surely the plain rule is, Let each considerate person hav his way, and see what it will lead to. For not this man and that man, but all men, make up mankind. How often hav we seen some such adventurous, and perhaps much-censured individual wanderer light on some outlying, neglected, yet vitally momentous province, the hidden treasures of which he first discovered and kept proclaiming till the general eye and effort were directed thither and the conquest was completed; thereby in these his so seemingly aimless rambles planting new standards, founding new habitable colonies, in the immeasureable circumambient realm of nothingness and night. Wise man was he who counseled that speculation should hav free course and look fearlessly toward all the thirty-two points of the compass, whithersoever and howsoever it listed.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

SHALL we say that miracles are an evidence of inspiration in the person who performs them? And must we accept as infallible every combination of ideas which may exist in his mind? If we look at this question abstractedly, it is not easy to perceive the necessary connection between superhuman power and superhuman wisdom. . . . And, when we look more closely to the fact, did not the minds of the apostles retain some errors long after they had been gifted with supernatural power? Did they not believe in demons occupying the bodies of men and swine? Did they not expect Christ to assume a worldly sway? Did not their master strongly rebuke the moral virtue and feelings of two of them, who who were for calling down fire from heaven on an offending village? It is often said that where a man's asseveration of his infallibility is combined with the support of miracles, his inspiration is satisfactorily proved; and this statement is made on the assumption that God would never confer supernatural power on one who could be guilty of a falsehood. What, then, are we to say respecting Judas and Peter, both of whom had been furnished with the gifts of miracle, and who employed them during a mission planned by Christ, and of whom, nevertheless, one became the traitor of the garden, and the other uttered against the Lord three falsehoods in one hour?—Martineau.

CICERO and Seneca, as also Juvenal, maintain that there is no boy or old woman so ridiculous as to believe the tenets in their accounts of a future state. Why, then, does Lucretius so highly exalt his master for freeing us from these terrors? Perhaps the generality of mankind were then in the disposition of Cephalus in Plato, who, while he was young and healthful, could ridicule these stories; but, as soon as he became old and infirm, began to entertain apprehensions of their truth. This we may observe not to be unusual even at present.—Hume's Natural History of Religion.

IN the Epistles and the Acts we find simply the assertion of the fact of the resurrection of Jesus and evidence to the universal conviction. In the Gospels we read the several traditions accepted to the nature and surroundings of that event. Now, here commences our serious embarrassment, and the embarrassment consists in this, that the new witnesses called — possibly very incompetent ones— make it impossible to reach any clear or definit conclusion as to the what or the how. That is to say, we cannot frame any theory whatever as to the resurrection, which is not distinctly negatived by one or other of the evangelical accounts. If the occurrence were to rest only on the gospel narrativs, rational belief would be almost out of the question. If the belief in the early church had been based upon these accounts (which it was not), that belief would carry with it only the faintest authority.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

"IN this issue," said an exchange, "is an article headed, 'What will the coming girl wear?'" We rather think, however, she won't wear anything—when she comes.

THE traveling showmen are exhibiting three skeletons of Guiteau—his skeleton when he was a boy, his skeleton before he shot Garfield, and his skeleton after he was hanged.

"MISS GIMPS," said a lady to another during a recent call, "why don't you join the Daughters of Temperance?" "'Cause." "'Cause why?" "Why—why—" was the blushing reply, "I intend joining one of the sons next month."

"YOUR son is drowned," said an excited messenger to an Arkansaw deacon. "Drowned, eh? That's strange, for I never thought that a male member of my family would take to water. However, George was never inclined toward the church."

A MAN in a sleeping-car went through a terrible accident, in which the car rolled down an embankment, without waking. It was noted, however, that as the car struck the bottom he murmured, "Don't, Jane, don't; I'll get up and start the fire directly."

TEACHER: "Who reigned after Saul?" Scholar: "David." "Who came after David?" "Solomon." "Who came after Solomon?" "The queen of Sheba," answered the pale young man on the back bench, and the teacher turned to Corinthians, and looked solemn.

A CHINAMAN got into a horse-car one very cold day recently, and, seating himself beside an Irish woman, remarked, "Belly cold." She turned upon him with a look of scorn and contempt, and said, "Tuck your shirt into your pants, ye hathen, yer, and then yer belly'll not be cold."

A BROOKLYN girl frightened her lover entirely out of his matrimonial notions by working and presenting him with the motto, "I Need Thee Every Hour." He says he would be willing to giv her the greater portion of his time, but that his health demanded an hour or two out of doors every day for exercise.

MR. SILVERCAMP (who is looking over some scriptural frieze for his new house): "Who are these?" Artist: "The twelve apostles." Mr. Silvercamp: "Hasn't Vanderbilt got the twelve apostles in his house?" Artist: "Yes, sir." Mr. Silvercamp: "Now, look here, Mr. Painter, Vanderbilt hain't going to get ahead of me for a cent. You put fourteen apostles in mine."

A FUNNY young man asked his love the other day, "What's the difference between me and a female sheep?" and when his love gave it up, the funny young man said, "Why, just the same difference there is between ewe and me." To which she replied:

"O Pat, my lad, now don't feel bad,
I've married Barney Xue;
And we've a boy to giv you joy;
I've named the child for you."

"PLEASE, sir," said the bell-boy to a Texas hotel clerk, "No. 40 says there ain't no towels in his room." "Tell him to use one of the window curtains." "He says, too, there ain't no pillers." "Tell him to put his coat and vest under his head." "And he wants a pitcher of water." "Suffering Cyrus! But he's the worst kicker I ever struck in my life! Carry him up the horse pail!" "He wants to know if he can hav a light." "Here, confound him! Giv him this lantern, and ask him if he wants the earth, and if he will hav it fried on only one side or turned over."

"I WOULDN'T think of asking for help if I hadn't lost my arm in the war," he added, as he leaned against the wall and gazed into vacancy as if calling up an old battle scene. "I see," mused the pedestrian. "Was it an accident in a saw-mill or on some railroad? I always come down with a quarter for such accidents." The other seemed to struggle with his feelings before replying: "Well, it was in a saw-mill, if you must know, but I hav been followed by hard luck. I lost my all by fire in Buffalo." "At what date and on what street?" The chap scratched his ear and rubbed the chilblain on his heel, but couldn't say, "I am not in a hurry," quietly observed the pedestrian. "Take your time to think and giv me all possible particulars." "See here," said the one-armed, "don't you believe my wife robbed me and ran away?" "No, sir—no, sir! What could you hav had of any value? And, indeed, how did you come by a wife?" "I asked you for a little assistance." "Certainly. Now please state your grounds." "I want to get to Chicago." "Nonsense! You intend to stay right here! That's no excuse." "Well, I'm hungry. I havn't tasted food for two days." "Bosh! Let me feel of your pulse. The pulse indicates the condition of the stomach. Hold out your hand." "Say!" said the vag, in a desperate way, "maybe you don't believe I'm dead broke?" "Oh, yes, I do." "And that I'm most dead for a drink of whisky?" "Ah! Here's ten cents! Go and buy your fluid! Next time you want anything toe the mark and speak the truth. You'll find a saloon around the corner."

Notes and Clippings.

A SAN FRANCISCO tugboat, fitted up by religious subscriptions as a floating bethel, has been tempted by the high rates offered to giv up the towing of souls and go regularly in for towing vessels.

LUCY STONE relates the following anecdote of the late Wendell Phillips: "I remember when the world's Antislavery Convention was held in London in 1840. Mr. Phillips was sent as a delegate, accompanied by two ladies. On arriving at London the ladies were not admitted to the convention, and consequently Mr. Phillips refused to go in. Those in attendance at the convention did everything in their power to induce him to change his mind, but he remained firm and did not go in."

THE "Ohio idea" is a rather curious one on some things. Governor Hoadly is being petitioned to pardon a young man who was sent to the penitentiary for robbing a prominent Freethinker, on the ground that the man he robbed was "a wicked and perverse Infidel." If the governor pardons this thief on such grounds, Col. Ingersoll will steer way round that state on his journeyings from the East to the West. But why, asks Peck's Sun, is it any less wrong and wicked to rob an Infidel than a Christian?

THE Pall Mall Gazette says: "The number of the younger clergy who not only take a real interest in social questions, but are developing very radical opinions with regard to them, are beginning to cause serious anxiety among churchmen of the old school. The question how far socialism may justly and wisely be carried is the question of the hour, and those who object to clergymen discussing and expressing their real opinions upon it, are trying to make dummies of the men who of all others ought to be guides of the people."

A BILL before the legislature of Maryland provides for the erection of a monument at St. Mary's City to mark the spot where Lord Baltimore's colonists are supposed to hav made the treaty with the Indians in March, 1634, for the site of the town. The preamble recites that Maryland was then founded on the principle of religious liberty, and that it was the first adoption of that principle in the history of mankind, and has ever since been practiced and adhered to by the people of the state through every change of their government.

SOME years ago, at a conference of Presbyterian ministers, a respected but simple-minded brother "rose to a personal explanation." His first beloved consort, he set forth, had died triumphant, and in due time he had courted and won the affections of another lady, and they were married. During all this time he had solemnly supposed her to be "of like faith and order" as himself. "I never thought," he said, with tears in his voice, "to ask her if she were a Presbyterian, and what, brethren, was my amazement and horror to learn, after we were married, that she was a Spitzenberg." Shade of Swedenborg!

AT a recent school board examination in England some extraordinary answers were given to the examiners by the children. One innocent was asked to giv a biography of the Patriarch Abraham, and replied: "Abraham was the father of Lot, and had two wives. One was called Ishmale, and the other Hagur; he kept one at home, and turned the other into the desert, where she became a pillow of salt by day, and a pillow of fire by night." Another juvenile said: "Moses was an Egiptshan. He lived in a ark made of bull-rushes, and he kept a golden calf and he worshiped braizen snakes, and et nothing but kwales and manna for forty years. He was cot by the hair of the hed while riding under the bough of a tree, and he was killed by his son Absolom as he was a-hanging from the bough. His end was pease." Another, questioned in natural history, replied: "The hog has five toes on his four feet, and four toes on his hind feet, the cow has no toes, and cannot bark."

IT is the notion of Mr. Thomas W. Brooks, of Lansingburgh, N. Y., that the jig of time is about up. Referring to the recent phenomena observable in the evening sky, he writes to the New York Times: "I think the real solution to the enigma is to be found only in the word of the Lord. Let us reverently listen when God speaks: 'And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God. . . . I will show wonders in heaven above.' 'Woe unto us, for the day goeth away, for the shadows of the evening are stretched out.'" It is a tolerably cold day when some religious crank is not found to apply a scriptural explanation to mysteries which no other fellow can solve.

THE other day a priest in Kerry, says the St. James Gazette, went to his bishop. "I want you," he said, "to giv me a general dispensing power for cases of perjury." "For perjury?" said his lordship. "What do the people want with that?" "Faith," answered the good father, "they can't get on without it. For, first of all, the Moonlighters come to them and swear them that they must say they didn't know who they were; and then there's the Arrears act, and they hav to take the oath they're not worth a farthing; and you know in the Land Court they can't get a reduction till they say they can't pay their rent. In fact, my lord, the poor people hav to perjure themselvs at every turn."

THE Tribune last Sunday printed an eminently proper editorial on the subject of labor organizations. The theory of it, that strikers must not commit overt acts in order to enforce their demands, all law-abiding people will agree with. But, regardless of the Tribune's theory, it has a very remarkable method of dealing with trades unions. For instance, Foreman Thompson, on behalf of the Tribune Company, signed an agreement with Typographical Union No. 6 to pay union prices for composition. That contract it broke, discharged all the union men, and filled its composing-room with "rats." Viewed in the best light at present thrown upon this proceeding, it appears to hav been a piece of deliberate rascality. Though the Tribune professes to be published for the "best people," it looks as if it were managed by about the worst ones.

THIS is the story that the Rev. J. Hyatt Smith, ex-Congressman, told in his first sermon as pastor of the East Congregational church, in Tompkins ave., Brooklyn: "There is in this town a friend of mine who had both feet shot away in the late war. As he lay on his straw pallet a woman approached him with a bundle. The sufferer hoped she would speak to him and giv of the oranges which he thought must assuredly be in the bundle, to slake his thirst. She bent over him and asked this question, 'Are you prepared to die?'—asked this of him who lay there hoping to bring back to Brooklyn so much of himself as had not been hacked and cut away. When she had asked this question she slowly untied her bundle. It contained tracts. She was distributing tracts. And that was not all. Corporal Tanner, the sufferer, ended: 'When I looked upon the tract it was on the sin of dancing. I feebly called her back and told her that I was converted, for I never would dance again.'"

MONCURE D. CONWAY, the well-known English Rationalistic preacher, writes the following from Australia to the Philadelphia Times: "It may be that Christianity has not been well represented here. A few men of fine culture hav attempted to preach in this region, but hav not remained very long. There are many ignorant and disputatious preachers of all denominations, but it is rare to hear even members of their congregations speak with warmth or satisfaction of their ministrations. Under these circumstances a curious religious situation has arisen. The humanly religious sentiment appears to be concentrating itself in a sort of famished hunger after some new and fresh assurance of a future life. This may partly account for the wide prevalence of Spiritualism in the colonies. In Sydney it has formed a sort of alliance with Freethought. Two theaters in that city are crowded every Sunday night with unchurched and non-Christian audiences, tickets being bought at the door. When Proctor, the astronomer, was lecturing in the colonies, there was a battle about this. Sir Henry Parkes, then in power, forbade his Sunday evening lecture with 'tickets as usual.' A vast crowd assembled in front of the closed theater, and the astronomer addressed them, asking them to disperse peaceably. This they did, but the incident was followed by an agitation in which the Sunday lecturers succeeded. One of these is Dr. Hughes, an Oxonian, who is a simple secularist. The other is Charles Bright, who is a Freethinker and Spiritualist. Mrs. Bright, who was Mrs. Pillars, widow of a Unitarian preacher, has also begun to lecture in the theater. All of these are able lecturers, and there are about three thousand people who every Sunday night attend lectures in the two theaters. Orchestral music is added at Dr. Hughes's lecture, and also at a similar one in the Opera House at Melbourne every Sunday evening. Theosophy of Mr. Sinnet's school also begins to find adherents here in the colonies."

As we expected, Mr. Bradlaugh has again been voted out of Parliament. Mr. Henry Labouchere, member for Northampton, and Mr. Thomas Burt, member for Morpeth, accompanied Mr. Bradlaugh to the table in the House of Commons on Monday, the 11th inst. There Mr. Bradlaugh administered the oath to himself, and placed a signed paper on the table, bowing as he did so to the speaker. The latter informed Mr. Bradlaugh that he had not conformed to the rules, and ordered him to withdraw until his conduct had been considered by the House. Mr. Bradlaugh at that withdrew under the peers' gallery. Mr. Gladstone made no motion, whereupon Sir Stafford Northcote moved that Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the oath. Carried, 280 to 167. A motion by Sir Stafford Northcote that Mr. Bradlaugh be excluded from the precincts of the House was carried—228 to 120. When the tellers came to the table to report the result, Viscount Crichton announced that Mr. Bradlaugh had voted against the motion. Mr. T. M. Healy, member for Monaghan, thereupon moved that Mr. Bradlaugh's vote be cancelled. Mr. Healy accused the government of being in collusion with Mr. Bradlaugh. The motion was carried by a vote of 258 to 161, Mr. Bradlaugh voting with the minority. Mr. Bradlaugh's next move was to apply for and receive the "Chiltern Hundreds," which he did on the 12th. This is equivalent to a resignation of his seat in the House of Commons. No office having emolument attached can be conferred by the Crown on a member without his thereby vacating his seat, and it is only by obtaining office that a member can rid himself of the duties which any body of constituents may impose upon him, even against his will. The Crown, therefore, for the convenience of the House, is generally willing to confer on any member "the Stewardship of her Majesty's Chiltern Hundreds, the Stewardship of the Manor of Poynings, of East Hendred and Northstead, or the Escheatorship of Munster," sinecures which he continues to hold till some other member solicits a similar accommodation. In the House of Commons the same day Labouchere moved that a new writ be issued for an election in Northampton to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Bradlaugh. Lord Randolph Churchill moved an adjournment of the debate on this motion, in order to prevent the House from being placed in an unpleasant position in case Mr. Bradlaugh should be re-elected. The motion was rejected by a vote of 203 to 145, and, after some discussion, the writ was issued. By his action in the House of Commons Mr. Bradlaugh has rendered himself liable to an aggregate penalty of £1,500. He has gone to Northampton, and will probably be re-elected. At this distance it is not easy to see just what he will gain by this procedure, but as he is one of the best lawyers in England, as well as a man of indomitable will, undoubtedly he has a well-defined purpose which will be turned to the advantage of the Secular party.

A CASE to test the legal standing of Mormons in Georgia has come up in that state. Two years ago a man named Echols was converted to Mormonism, went to Colorado, and became a preacher. He now returns, demands the allegiance of his wife, and has sued out a writ of habeas corpus for his child. The writ is resisted on the ground that Mormonism renders the father unfit to hav the guardianship of the child. The case excites considerable comment.

Chapter X.

THE MYSTERY DARKENS.

A letter was handed Cupples at the supper-table. He seldom had one, and its receipt was quite an event.

He opened and read it. For a moment he was like a stone, and for another the air was blue with curses. Even Mrs. Cupples was amazed.

The letter ran as follows:

Mr. Cupples:

My Friend: I left my baby at your house. I did not know whose house it was until afterwards—I was in such a hurry. I am glad you like the baby. I may never see it again. I ran away from my master because he was cruel to me and my baby. I am afraid he will catch me again. But don't let the baby go. Amy Bolton.

Now, a "nigger" was something that Cupples actually disdained. Its touch was contamination. Of course, he would let one black his boots and brush his coat; but if one should happen to shake hands with him he would feel that he must wash seven times to get rid of the uncleanness. The thought that he had been waiting upon a "nigger" baby, kissing it and hugging it, and showing it off to friends and neighbors, and boasting of its heavenly beauty, was astounding and hideous.

"Only think of it, Mariar," said Cupples, when he was calm enough to speak plain English. "Only think of it! I've carried it in my bosom like my own flesh and blood—a nigger!"—with a fresh volley.

"That pretty little thing a nigger? It can't be," exclaimed Mrs. Cupples. "Why, it was white as snow."

"I know it," said Cupples. "It would hav deceived the very elect. But it's a nigger. Its mother was running away when she left it here. Oh, the wretch!"

"Well, it's gone, and we can thank our stars for that," said his wife.

"To think," cried Cupples, "that I should hav hugged and kissed it so—and it smelt fresh as a rose, too. Dear me! I wish I could spit it out. Burn the clothes and chop up the cradle for kindling-wood."

He rushed to McGuffum and told him the sad story.

"Don't hunt after it. It's all right. I shan't be troubled about it after this. But to think that I should have paid so much attention to a nigger. It's a fraud that ought to be punished. Why didn't she pin a note to it, saying, 'This is a nigger?' How else would I a-known it—so white and pretty, and without a smell on it, and not a crinkle in its hair?—though, come to think of it, it was bald-headed and it couldn't crinkle. Why didn't she put a wig on? Nothing to tell it by!"

Sheriff McGuffum condoled:

"Well, Cupples, we'll give you absolution. I think the President himself would hav been taken in. It was a perfect imitation, and no mistake, of a white baby. Indeed, I've seen white babies blacker 'n that, and worse smelling, by all odds. But white's white, and black's black. The baby's a nigger by birth, and is black if we could only find it out. But it's your treat, Cupples, and I'm ready."

It was all out in an hour, and there was "multitudinous laughter" at the unfortunate Cupples. The gossips were happy, and remarks various.

Said Billy Stubbs:

"Hung by the heavens with black."

Said the Rev. Hapgood:

"Can the Ethiopian change his skin?" and at the prayer-meeting he gave out the hymn, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

Said Dr. Dobson:

"One part nigger, ninety-nine parts white. Nigger all-conquering. Great are the mysteries of genealogy!"

Cupples slept that night like a log. Forty glasses of lager bier settled his perturbed feelings.

Chapter XI.

CHANGE OF BASE.

Cupples went to work the next day with a headache and a "stiff upper lip." The sheeny tin received many a resounding blow. He made things fly at times. It wouldn't do to talk with him; his replies were short and sharp. He ate his dinner in silence, inwardly cursing, no doubt, the baby who had befooled him, won his affections under false pretenses; showing off as an angel of light when it was only an imp of darkness. Not only the human heart, but the human skin, is deceitful above all things, thought Cupples.

The afternoon wore slowly away. He dealt no more resounding blows; they came slowly and feebly. He didn't answer a single question, even by a look. At supper-time he put his tools carefully away, and hung his apron up, instead of throwing it upon the floor as usual.

He hurried home, made a hasty meal in portentous quiet, and then roared out:

"Mariar, I'm going after that baby. I'm bound to have it!"

"I'm glad of it," burst in Mrs. Cupples, with "tears in her voice," and flung herself ponderously upon his bosom. It was an unexpected blow to Cupples, but he gallantly recovered, and gave her a smacking kiss and a mighty hug.

"Get things ready. I'll go right up and see Guffum. He must put me on the trail somehow."

He astounded McGuffum with his strange resolve.

"What! after that nigger baby?" he cried.

"Don't talk that way," said Cupples fiercely. "It's my baby; it's the very light of heaven—a part of my own soul—and I can't live without it. I'll hunt for it till I find it. You don't know, Guffum, how a baby gets into a fellow's heart. I thought I could throw it off. I might as well cut my flesh out. I must go. You must help me. Move heaven and earth. It's somewhere in the world, and I'll go to the end of it but I'll fetch it back again."

Sheriff McGuffum, though he was a Democrat of the first water (and whisky), was ready to help, for he was a good fellow at heart, and willing at any time to do a favor when it didn't interfere with his own interest. Besides, he saw that Cupples was in dead earnest, and that if he refused to help him he would incur his mortal hatred, and thereby lose his vote, and perhaps the votes of several others over whom Cupples had considerable influence. The sheriff was level-headed even in the most surprising situations, and knew which side of his bread was buttered. Generosity and selfishness coincided in this case, as it frequently does in others, thanks to a benign providence. If it did not I don't see how even providence could do much for the welfare of the race.

"Of course I'll help," said the sheriff. "But it'll be a difficult job—first to find out where the baby is, for we have no clue but the letter; and then, after you've found out, to go after it and get it. It's probably in Kentucky somewhere, in the possession of its owner—and only think, Cupples, we've got to break the Fugitive Slave law; and how often have we called that the palladium of our liberties. It was only the other night we had a grand ratification meeting and shouted ourselves hoarse over it."

"That's so," said Cupples. "But what's the Constitution compared to a baby? Politics is one thing, and happiness is another; and if politics goes ag'in' happiness, why, it must suffer, that's all. I'll vote the Democratic ticket every time. It's the ticket of my fathers, and I'll stick to it to my latest posterity. But I'll steal that baby, law or no law. They say religion mustn't meddle with politics. Well, I say that politics mustn't meddle with religion, and it's my religion to get that baby back. It's the very divinity of my home. I can't worship God unless I have that little thing to help me. It's all the prayer-book I've got."

"All right," said the sheriff. "It makes no difference so long as you'll stick to the party. We can't always practice what we preach. Of course we ought to give the slaves up, but then it's a poor law that won't work both ways, and give 'em back again if we happen to want 'em bad enough. All's fair in love, and babies are no exception. Sergeant Jones is the man you want, Cupples. He'll pull you through, I know, and I'll call him right in."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Beecher's Enigmatical Course Explained.

Brother Beecher deserves great credit for the bold and manly defense which he made on Sunday of the persecuted Newton.

But what does Mr. Beecher mean by the difference between ignorant and enlightened religion?

He must know that if the myths of the Old Testament are swept away like so many cobwebs, the religion which is based upon them goes with them, in theory at least.

In practice he seems resolved that such shall not be the case, and in this he is wiser than most of the men who make religion a business.

Everybody knows that the myths of Moses hav been knocked into smithereens.

If Quackenbos and the other quacks hav their way, people will only laugh at those fictions and giv the churches the cold shoulder.

The consequence of this will be that religion as a business will fail utterly.

On the other hand, if Beecher, Newton, and other men capable of understanding the situation, and bold enough to sweep away the dusty cobwebs of an abandoned faith, are allowed to hav their way, they will reconstruct the business in such a way that it will again become prosperous.

And this leads us to a proper understanding of the difference between ignorant and enlightened religion.

Ignorant religion is the religion which the churches teach, but which must fail as a business, because it is based on fictions as absurd as the story of Santa Claus.

Enlightened religion is the religion which the churches must teach, or giv up the game as something in which there is no longer a public interest. —Truth.

Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament.

REWARD OF SAINTS.—WHO ARE SAINTS?—WHAT, WHERE, AND WHEN SHALL BE THEIR REWARD?

Did Jesus come on earth and die to save all mankind? No. Christ positivly declares he came only to the Jews. "But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Then came she and worshiped him, saying, Lord help me. But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs" (Matt. xv, 24, 26).

When Christ sent out his disciples to preach the gospel, he forbade their preaching to any but Jews. "These twelve Jesus sent forth and commanded them, saying, Go not into the way of the gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not" (Matt. x, 5).

The gospel was never preached to gentiles until Peter had his strange vision of the sheet let down from heaven, containing all manner of unclean things (Acts x, 9–18). This, according to Bible chronology, was not until A.D. 41, more than seven years after the date given as that of the crucifixion of Christ.

We read of Jesus weeping over Jerusalem. But it should be remembered that this was not on account of sinners in general, but of Jews. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I hav gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not" (Matt. xxiii, 37).

Again Jesus declares, "Ye worship ye know not what; we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews" (John iv, 22). And Paul, although calling himself the especial apostle to the gentiles (thus ignoring Peter and the sheet vision), indorses this. "Who are Israelites; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers and of whom as concerning the flesh, Christ came" (Rom. ix, 4, 5).

How often we hear of people being converted by the sweet and loving invitation of Jesus: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will giv you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Matt. xi, 28, 29). But this was never meant to apply to any but the Jews.

Many priests and Sunday-school teachers often quote the words of Jesus, as applicable to their little children. "And they brought unto him also infants, that he would touch them; but when his disciples saw it they rebuked them. But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God" (Luke xviii, 15, 16).

But the "all ye" of Jesus did not embrace or in any sense include gentiles. The "suffer little children to come unto me" of Jesus never recognized any but the children of the chosen race—the children of Israel. They, and they alone, comprised all to him. All others he regarded—yea, branded—as dogs (Matt. xv, 26). Christ declared he was careful when addressing the multitude to speak only in parables. "All these things spake Jesus unto the multitude in parables; and without a parable spake he not unto them" (Matt. xiii, 34).

Christians do not love or worship the Jesus Christ of the New Testament, but an ideal Christ, a Jesus of their imagination, the embodiment of all that is good, pure, gentle, and lovable. A very slight comparison of the Jesus of the New Testament and the Jesus of their adoration would dispel the illusion, and result in very prompt and emphatic repudiation of the Jesus Christ of the gospels.

Suppose I discovered there was a conspiracy to wreck the night express; that on a very steep embankment the rails had been unspiked, and when the train reached this place it must inevitably be precipitated down the embankment; nothing can save the passengers from mutilation and horrible death. I enter the cars, as the train stands in the depot, about to start on its fated journey. I pass through and notify every Mason, by secret signals, to leave the train; they come out, I tell them of the danger, but forbid and prevent their warning any of the passengers not Masons. Men, women, and children are going unconsciously to their horrible doom. But, lest any of them should understand, take warning, and so be saved, I am careful to use only such signs and words as I am sure they cannot understand.

Would the Jesus that Christians revere, their ideal savior, do or sanction such a course? Could they reverence and adore him if he should himself so act? Read carefully his own words: "And he said unto them, Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God, but unto them that are without, all these things are done in parables, that seeing they may see, and not perceive, and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them" (Mark, iv, 11, 12).

The so-called son of God, the savior of mankind, the gentle, pitying savior, declares he took especial pains to prevent men, women, and children from being converted, lest their sins should be forgiven them and they be saved from eternal death and hell.

But the New Testament claims the gentiles were grafted in at Christ's crucifixion. How we are not told. Certainly Christ made no allusion to anything of the kind at the cross. But allowing the authority of Peter and Paul sufficient, we will take it for granted Christ, who was co-equal with God, co-worker in creation (John i, 3), who existed in heaven before Abraham was born (John viii, 58), who knew all the will and purposes of the father—yea, was in the father and the father in him (John xiv, 10, 11), yet did not know his coming to the Jews was all in vain, did not know that all his wonderful miracles, all his preaching, teaching, sufferings—nay, even his death, resurrection, and ascension, or the raising many of the bodies of the saints which slept, and sending them into the city to appear unto many (Matt. xxvii, 52), would never induce the Jews to accept or in the least believe in Jesus as the monarch; that in spite of all they would spurn, scorn, and repudiate him. Suppose we admit, finding his every effort fail, he did permit the disciples to turn to the gentiles and try if they would accept and believe in him.

We come now to the question, What, according to the New Testament, are the conditions on which Jews or gentiles may insure reward—be admitted to heaven?

The first condition is poverty.

Christ declares, "Blessed be ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God" (Luke vi, 20).

Christ positivly asserts the rich are shut out from heaven, although from youth to old age they hav kept every precept of the moral law. "All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags" (Isa. lxiv, 6); unless the rich sell all they hav, and giv it to the poor, they cannot inherit eternal life.

"The young man saith unto him, All these things hav I kept from my youth up; what lack I yet? Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and giv to the poor, and thou shalt hav treasure in heaven; and come and follow me. But when the young man heard that saying, he went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions" (Matt. xix, 16, 24). Mark informs us that although Jesus loved this young man, the condition of poverty was imperativ. "Then Jesus beholding him loved him, and said unto him, One thing thou lackest; go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and giv to the poor, and thou shalt hav treasure in heaven; and come take up the cross and follow me. And he was sad at that saying, and went away grieved; for he had great possessions" (Mark x, 21, 22).

Christ impresses the fact that only the poor can ever enter heaven still more emphatically in the story of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi, 19–24). There is not the slightest intimation that the rich man had been guilty of any wrong—he may hav rigorously kept the commandments from his youth up. All the reason assigned for his being in hell, suffering the torture of its flames, was that on earth he was rich. True, he fared sumptuously every day, but this could not be wrong, for Lazarus desired to be fed with some of the same food. He was clothed in purple and fine linen; there was no law against it. The priests of the temple were so clothed by the express command of God. If the rich man had been dressed in rough, mean clothing, we might hav inferred he was miserly and avaricious. His wearing purple and fine linen gave employment to artisans, merchants, and tailors; he thus provided employment for, and promoted the happiness of, his fellow-creatures.

There is no word or hint that Lazarus was good or virtuous. He is simply described as a beggar full of sores, and this was his sole claim and title to heaven. But that it was all-sufficient is confirmed by Jesus—"Blessed be ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God" (Luke vi, 20). "But woe unto you that are rich, for ye hav received your consolation" (Luke vi, 24).

Nor do we find that, after the gentiles are alleged to hav been grafted in, this condition was changed. James denounces the wealthy—"Go to, now, ye rich men, weep and howl, for your miseries that shall come upon you" (James v, 1).

Having sold all we hav and given to the poor, so that we belong to that class ourselvs, we must next love our enemies. Christ commands: "But I say unto you which hear, Love your enemies, do good to them which hate you. Bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you" (Luke vi, 27, 28).

Not alone does Jesus insist, as conditions to going to heaven, that we love our enemies, but we must hate our friends, all who are nearest and dearest to us. Heed the plain, unmistakable declarations of Jesus: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brothers, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26).

Desperately hav the learned doctors of divinity tried to smooth over, ignore, or explain away this most positiv declaration of Christ. But in vain. The word hate in this text is translated from the Greek word miseo, defined by Greenfield, "To hate; regard with ill will; to detest; to abhor." It is the same word used in Luke i, 71; vi, 22, 27; xiv, 26; xvi, 13; xix, 14; xxi, 17.

It is true the beloved disciple John disagrees with Christ. He says: "If a man say, I love God, and hateth [miseo, the very same word] his brother, he is a liar, for he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?" (1 John iv, 20.) And again: "Whosoever hateth [miseo, same word] his brother is a murderer; and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him" (1 John iii, 15).

Here is certainly a flat contradiction; but Jesus outranks John. And Paul, who really made Christianity, declares liars and murderers are not debarred from heaven, but are extolled as saints.

Abraham lied about his wife, Sarah, declaring she was not his wife, but his sister, and sold her to Pharaoh for a lot of sheep and oxen (Gen. xii, 13–16). And he lied again in the same revolting, cowardly manner to King Abimelech (Gen. xx, 2).

Isaac learned of Abraham and lied in the same way in regard to his wife, Rebekah (Gen. xxvi, 7).

Moses murdered the Egyptian, and hid his body in the sand (Ex. 2, 12).

Rahab, the harlot, lied and betrayed to death both men, women, and children of her own nation (Joshua ii, 4, 5).

Gideon murdered Zebah and Zalmunna (Judges ix, 21).

Barak aided and encouraged that most holy and exalted saint, Jael, in lying to and treacherously assassinating Sisera (Judges iv, v).

David, the man after God's own heart (Acts xiii, 22), lied to Uriah, committed adultery with his wife, and then planned his death (2 Sam. xii, 9).

So we might continue the list of the saints of old. We refer to these because the holy inspired Apostle Paul cites them to us as perfect saints—examples for us—saints of whom the world was not worthy, but who are sure of heaven; and we are urged to emulate their faith and character that we may share with them their reward, and dwell with them in heaven (Heb. xi, 17, 40). We may be met with the declaration, All those were cruel, vengeful, bloodthirsty, and Christ enjoins on us the very opposit of all this. He would hav us like himself—all gentleness, love, and mercy. Does he not enjoin us, "Be ye therefore merciful, as your father also is merciful?" (Luke vi, 36.) We freely admit Christ did so teach and command. We are truth seekers, and the lamented and revered model truth seeker, D. M. Bennett, taught, "Let justice and right be the standard by which we govern our actions, and never forget that the grandest thing a man can perform is to do what is right under all circumstances." We desire in this investigation that justice and right shall govern us, that we may nothing extenuate, nor aught set down in malice.

Christ tells us distinctly how much of mercy to exercise—"Be ye therefore merciful, as your father also is merciful." To learn of the nature and extent of the father's mercy, we turn to the Old Testament: "Therefore will I also deal in fury; mine eye shall not spare, neither will I hav pity; and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them" (Ezek. viii, 18). "Go ye after him through the city, and smite; let not your eye spare, neither hav ye pity. Slay utterly old and young, both maids and little children and women" (Ezek. ix, 5, 6). "God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth; the Lord revengeth and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies" (Nahum i, 2).

And we admit in this respect there is perfect harmony between the characters of God, Christ, and the holy saints that Paul cites us to as examples.

Christ's admonition, "Be ye therefore merciful, as your father also is merciful," applies to those who hav obeyed his injunction, "Search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye hav eternal life; and they are they which testify of me" (John v, 39).

Christ evinced neither love nor sympathy for his own mother, brothers, or sisters. We read, "Neither did his brethren believe in him" (John vii, 5). And he declares, like his father, he will not fail to take vengeance. "But those mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring them hither and slay them before me" (Luke xix, 27). "And to you who are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that obey not the gospel" (2 Thess. i, 7, 8).

The next condition of inheritance in heaven is: "And unto him that smiteth thee on one cheek, offer also the other; and him that taketh away thy cloak, forbid not to take thy coat also. Giv to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again" (Luke vi, 29, 30).

This would be to encourage thieves and bullies, but Christ says, in this same chapter, realizing the difficulties, "And why call me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" (Luke vi, 46.)

And, lastly, to attain heaven, we must believe all things in the Bible, Old and New Testaments, and be baptized. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16). We hav neither time, space, or inclination to enter into the controversy so fiercely waged in regard to what constitutes baptism—immersion, pouring, or sprinkling. We simply call attention to the fact that the word baptized in the text is from the Greek word baptizo, defined by Greenfield, "To immerse, immerge, submerge, sink." Pour is from the Greek word ekkeo, to pour, to gush out; and sprinkle, rantizo, sprinkled, to sprinkle, besprinkle. And these words are never used interchangeably, or as synonyms. Having complied with all the conditions, the next question is, Where do saints go to obtain their reward? CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

Musings by the Way.

II.

For Adam's sin was't God's divine decree
The race of man should lost and ruined be?
Did he decree that through all coming time
All should be born condemned for Adam's crime—
The countless millions who on earth should dwell,
Condemned to suffer in an endless hell,
Except the few who might embrace the plan
He would provide to save the race of man,
While out of every hundred, ninety-nine
Should fail to profit by this plan divine?
And did he wait four thousand years from then
Ere he this plan divine made known to men—
Meanwhile the race, from date of their creation,
Must die and go to hell without salvation?
And when six thousand years their course had flown,
It should be still to half earth's sons unknown?
Did he devise that one-third part of God
Should take a human form and tread earth's sod,
Pass here a few short years, be killed, and rise
In resurrection up beyond the skies;
And for this killing of God's body, he
Would set the race of man from vengeance free,
The exhibition of his wrath would quell,
Nor punish every one in endless hell?
But one who happens to "believe" the story
May gain admission to the world of glory,
No matter what his life has been on earth,
If only he's experienced this "new birth,"
In selfish struggle to increase his own.
He right and justice may hav never known—
A swindler may hav been, a poor man's dread,
And children may for him hav cried for bread;
He may hav been a pirate, man of strife,
A murderer and robber, all his life;
Its last few hours, why, then he must employ
In being "born again" for endless joy;
From Abram's bosom he may then look down
To hell, and on the unbelievers frown;
But though in life a person may hav been
One of the most kind-hearted, best of men,
Whose generous heart has sympathized with grief,
And utmost efforts made to giv relief;
A husband dear, a father kind, a friend,
On whom one could with confidence depend;
A generous neighbor, citizen erect,
Whose honor, virtue, love won all respect;
A friend of truth and culture of the mind,
Who strove to elevate and bless mankind;
Or may hav been a mother, fond and dear,
Devoted to her children's welfare here;
Whose sympathy and love her family blessed,
Who loved and pitied all the poor distressed;
Or youth, or maiden early death has claimed,
Of cultured mind and generous heart, who aimed
To rise in life and fill an honored place,
And use their powers to benefit their race;
Or aged man or woman come to rest,
By all who know them honored, loved, and blest—
If they do not believe in this absurd story,
Debarred they must be from that world of glory.
Can Reason sanction this? Can this be true?
Who of his God can entertain such view?
To some the evidence may be clear enough;
No Rational can e'er believe such stuff. W. R. DYER.

About Vivisection Again.

E. B. FOOTE, JR., TO ELLIOTT PRESTON, Sir: I am not inclined to be led aside from the main criticism I made of your essay on "Vivisection." There are various opinions as to the scientific value of, or necessity for, vivisection, but as a class the medical profession, who are capable of judging on such matters, believe it is useful and necessary to the pursuit of knowledge in physiology and pathology, while those who are blinded by their excess of sympathy shout their denials. To prove its utility would require more of my time and THE TRUTH SEEKER'S space than the subject is worth. It is, as I contend, not enough of an evil to deserve attention from those who hav time and strength to devote to reforms. I am not "woefully ignorant of its atrocities," having read most of Bergh's onslaughts, as well as the productions of foreign societies for the repression of vivisection, but I hav attended a four years' course in medical colleges and laboratories without seeing anything approaching to an "atrocity," and my brother, who has graduated in a veterinary college, says he never saw or heard of such vivisection as Murdock describes. I do not therefore contend that what we hav not seen never happened, but feel positiv it is a very uncommon occurrence, and I do not believe that the agony of "the little bay mare" can equal that of "a thousand slaughtered animals." "To compare," you say, "the pain of slaughtering to that of vivisection is like comparing a single grain of sand to the mighty desert." "Why, how ridiculous you talk!" I should say, borrowing an expression from the sympathetic sex who make such a furor about vivisection. For every authentic account of an atrocious vivisection, I will bring you statistics of one hundred thousand animals cut in the throat, as many more knocked in the head, as many more killed in sport, as many more maimed by sportsmen, and left to die in slow torture by injury and starvation. For every kind-hearted woman shocked by the accounts of vivisection, I will show you a hundred wearing a bird on a bonnet, whose life has been sacrificed to their fashion's folly.

To match every "scratching of a newt's tail," I will offer one hundred lobsters in a boiling pot, put in alive. For every drop of blood lost in vivisection, I will ask you to look upon a chicken's head and body severed on a block, and for every pang of pain caused by the vivisector's knife, let me invite your sympathetic gaze to a fox hunted down by hounds and men (and women) till he is run to the "death." The very hairs on that suffering "little bay mare" are not as numerous as the shotguns that hav been turned out by a single firm, and sold for the utterly useless slaughter of the innocents in field and forest.

To cry out against vivisection in these times of flesh food, sport, and fashion is as though some one were to wax wroth at the sight of a caged canary, and bemoan its cruel confinement in times of human slavery. E. B. Foote, Jr.

Young Dr. Foote Vivisected.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It seems to me that the article of Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., in The Truth Seeker of Jan. 12th, in reply to Elliott Preston on "Vivisection," is not what I had been led to expect from his pen. It is a weak, lame, tame affair, and no answer at all to Mr. Preston's argument. A man of Dr. Foote's pretensions and acknowledged ability should hav known that two wrongs do not make one right; that because one thing is wrong does not make another wrong thing any the more justifiable. Admitting that the killing of animals for sport or food is wrong, it does not make Dr. Foote's favorit mode of killing any the less fiendish and cruel, and besides, they are not parallel cases, since, in the one case, they generally kill their victims as quickly and painlessly as possible, while in the other its agony is intensified and prolonged to the uttermost. He must put a very low estimate upon the intelligence of the readers of The Truth Seeker, to expect they will be so easily satisfied and convinced. His cause is a bad one, and his pleadings must, of necessity, be weak and feeble. Better for him and it had he kept silent, especially him, if he values the good opinion of the common people throughout the country. I am glad this subject is being ventilated, so that the common people can learn somewhat of its cruelties and horrors. I agree with Mr. Preston as so happily expressed in his verse. I would not admit into my family, professionally, if I knew it, one of those monsters of cruelty (pardon me, Mr. Editor, if I put it too mildly)

"——With hands that reek
With the blood of the tortured brute."

Should it be said, "Then you will hav no doctor," well, be it so, then; I'll let nature take its course, which I think in many—may I not say in most?—cases would be the the better course. I agree fully with the sentiment of another—I will not enter on my list of friends the man who needlessly sets foot upon a worm. I don't propose to discuss this subject at length, I leave it with Mr. Preston, who is fully competent to attend to Dr. Foote, if, indeed, his article is deemed worthy of any attention.

A Tribute to a Deserving Man.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Probably no man ever attained such remarkable popularity in so short a time as Chas. B. Reynolds. Only a short time ago he was, as I understand, preaching "Christ and him crucified," and all the other dogmas of Christianity, with just as much honesty, sincerity, and veracity as he is now proclaiming the truths of that higher integration—Infidelity, Agnosticism, Freethought. He was, I say, earnest in his belief at first, until, through his ardent research, scrutiny, and investigation, convinces that Christianity and its doctrines were a gigantic falsehood. True to his reverence for truth and honesty, he, at a great sacrifice, knowing the great social ostracism that would follow, coupled also with the rending asunder of dear associations, taking, as it were, his very life into his own hands, jeopardizing the coming future, comes forth like a pillar of fire from heaven, proclaiming this new gospel, Rationalism. Since that he has been doing a mighty work for humanity. The barriers of church tyranny, priestcraft, and superstition hav already received a terrible onslaught from which they can never recover. The church militant is again being called up to giv reason why it should continue to exist. And even more, its very foundation has again been attacked as not before since the days of Bennett, Paine, and Voltaire. The citadel and her weakened battlements are being reduced, and the grand ecclesiastical paraphernalia is in danger. Since the Rochester Convention, and even before, I hav been inspired with the grand and very instructiv communications of the gentleman now under consideration. His writings and discourses which appear almost weekly in The Truth Seeker are alone well worth the price of the paper, and certainly they are well worthy of still a wider circulation. Every Liberal—yes, even fair-minded Christian—should read and study his articles.

None but an honest man, and one truly devoted to truth, could write such voluminous articles, which show an inexhaustible amount of patient and laborious investigation, the most famous of which is his "Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament." Paine and Bennett had written quite extensivly in exposing the prophecies of the Old Testament, but Mr. Reynolds in his "Facts and Fallacies" surely strikes aloud the keynote in these expositions. He writes very much more in detail concerning them, shows their true application, and at once convinces even the most credulous of the great perversion of truth by the gospel writers in endeavoring to thrust upon the world a falsehood in behalf of a foretelling of the coming of the messiah. The church has never yet undertaken to refute these expositions, which she would only be too glad to do were it possible to do so. Again, concerning the birth, life, teachings, miracles, crucifixion, and ascension of Christ, on which must either stand or fall the whole Christian system, as they are proved true or false, Mr. Reynolds shows most conclusivly that they are from beginning to end not entitled to any sane man's belief. Oh, were there now one thousand Reynoldses to lead the van onward to victory and truth! But I must revert to the subject more particularly in question, and that is an appeal to all live Liberals and the Liberal movement in general, that while we hav such men as Mr. Reynolds in our ranks to go forth to do battle for the right, truth, and humanity, we, as Liberals, should renew our courage, and say faithfully, They shall be supported and kept at work. Again, I repeat, Mr. Reynolds has done, and is doing, a great work for the Liberal cause. We cannot do without his valuable services.

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, I would suggest that Mr. Reynolds's "Facts and Fallacies," complete, be put in pamphlet or book form for preservation, and to be used with those of John E. Remsburg and others of much value for missionary work. These very important productions are wonderful in themselvs, and are having a great influence for good. The Christian world will never undertake answering them. L. DeWitt Griswold.

Auburn, N. Y.

The Liberal Club.

Bad weather made the attendance at the 326th meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club rather smaller than usual, but still there was a goodly gathering of sociable people. These came early, most of them, in order to hav a good chat before the lecture began. Several had not finished the arguments they had entered into when the secretary arose to read the record of the previous meeting, which was in the main inaudible. It was therefore news to many of the audience when the chair announced that they had heard the minutes.

The death of Mr. H. Neymann was mentioned, which took place on the afternoon of the 8th. The deceased was a well-known Liberal, the husband of Mrs. Clara Neymann, whose name is perhaps still more familiar in Liberal circles. The funeral was to take place on Sunday, attended by Mr. Wakeman and others.

The lecturer of the evening was Mr. Charles V. Wingate, Civil Engineer, on "Sanitary Problems." He was much pleased, he said, to see so fine an audience before him. It was encouraging. At his first lecture on this subject the hall had been crowded with thirteen persons, and at his next a tumultuous concourse of twenty had thronged to hear him. The speaker gave some startling statistics in regard to the evils of tenement-house life in New York. From eighty to one hundred persons were crowded into some of our down-town tenements, and the death rate in them was nearly ten per cent per annum. The Italian population were the most unsanitary in their modes of living. They lived in the tenements where the light of the sun never came, and the bath was unknown to them. Compulsion should be exercised in these cases to enforce cleanliness and prevent the engendering and spread of zymotic diseases, every form of which had its rise in these crowded houses. Mr. Wingate had no confidence that the average Christian missionary work would effect any perceptible results as now carried on. Personal attention must be paid. The tenement-house quarters must be visited and good examples set to take the place of religious gush, of which there was now far too much. There must be reform in the construction of buildings and in the system of draining, and the number of occupants to a certain area must be limited. Mr. Wingate spoke rapidly for about an hour and a quarter. His discourse is straightaway and his style vigorous.

Mr. Robert Blizzard communicated some interesting information about the condition of the poor in Paris. It was not so bad, however, as in New York. He had found a pig on the fourth floor of a house in this city, and the pig seemed to him the most reputable occupant of the whole tenement, so far as cleanliness went. Mr. Blizzard also said that the women-employes in the best hotels of this city were obliged to sleep in subterranean chambers below the pavements of the streets in beds only a foot apart.

Mr. Cohen, who is a Socialist, believed that the question of how to effect universal human happiness would never be settled while men retained private ownership in land and houses. The houseless children of the city were little Jesuses, having not where to lay their heads. The rich people, the speaker said, must know that they were not following Christ's teachings, to sell what they hav and giv to the poor; yet he had observed that they usually hung on to their wealth and took the risk.

Mr. Mark, or "Brick," Pomeroy responded to an invitation to speak. Those who hav seen his Great West and hav never seen the editor may not know that the picture of "Parson" Pomeroy published each week in that journal is a striking likeness of Brick himself. Such, however, is the fact. Mr. Pomeroy spoke briefly to the subject under discussion. He had no faith in the so-called Christian church. It led men's thoughts above the sufferings of their fellow-creatures, and fixed them on the kingdom come. He had once belonged to the church, and the best thing he ever did was when he got out of it. He worried so much about his soul that he forgot when the calves needed to be fed and the cows to be milked. The evils which the lecturer of the evening had been discussing were enormous, and he wished him God-speed and humanity-speed in the good work he designed to do. Next Friday evening Mr. Pomeroy speaks before the club on "The Cause of Panics."

Mr. Henry Stone alluded to the Catholic protectories of this city which were mere manufactories for Catholics. The expense incurred in supporting children in those institutions was more than twice what it needed to be. He would guarantee that five hundred children up to five and six years of age could be supported at the rate of ten cents apiece per day. He would be willing to devote his life to the care of destitute children if anyone would agree to furnish him a comfortable living. Mr. Stone was among the Shakers for a time, and there gained his experience and knowledge as to the expense of caring for children.

Mr. Wakeman spoke of the desirability of founding a Liberal Children's Home. The times seemed ripe for it, and the occasion propitious. Mr. Hugh Byron Brown, of Brentwood, Long Island, had his heart and soul in the work; there was a fund in the hands of the Church of Humanity, the interest of which he had no doubt the trustees would be willing to devote to that purpose; and here was Mr. Stone with the necessary experience. Mr. Pomeroy arose to say that he would giv one hundred dollars, and guarantee another hundred when enough had been subscribed to assure the trial of the experiment for one year.

Mr. Wingate, in conclusion, thanked his critics cordially for the merciful way they had treated his lecture. It was his intention to continue the agitation of the sanitary problem, and if possible carry out the first provision of the Declaration of Independence, which was the right to life itself.

The Other Side.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Within the last few weeks there hav appeared in your paper two letters written by two women, upon the same subject, to which I feel called upon seriously to object. The authors of these letters, Mrs. Severance and Mrs. Smith, are both women whom I love, honor, and respect, and whom to know is to find them possessed of unusual ability; nevertheless, I dare to differ from them sometimes, as, of course, they do from me. But to the matter of which I complain.

I hav been connected with the Freethinkers' movement ever since it took form as an organization. I ought to know pretty well its history. I cannot remember one of its public meetings where there hav not been women on the platform, invited speakers, and to whom a full share of time has been given. I am very sensitiv in regard to the rights of my own sex, and am sure I should, in all cases, demand them, but I do not like a false claim. At the first meeting held in Watkins, where we had four arrests, I myself put Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage on the committee on resolutions; she herself wrote the resolution upon woman; it was accepted and passed unanimously, and she accused the meeting (though she had been given full time for her speech) of trying to shut off woman. At the first meeting in Hornellsville, Mrs. Colby was one of the invited speakers, and I think she has often been invited since and well received, as she deserves to be. At Chicago, Mrs. Severance was made first vice-president, and, in the absence of the president, occupied the chair, presiding with dignity and grace, giving universal satisfaction when even Mr. Green had deserted us. I hav always found Mrs. Severance welcomed to the platform in the meetings of Freethinkers since. I think she has been not always welcomed in the Spiritualist meetings—witness Lake Pleasant camp-meeting—but as I had the honor to be loudly hissed at that meeting, and bore it without loss of self-respect, I trust Mrs. Severance will not suffer much from any slight received there. If Lake Pleasant can afford to ignore a woman like Mrs. Severance, she can afford to part with it. Now, I hav but little more to say. I think even if there were no women who responded to Mr. Green's call for volunteers to Salamanca, that doesn't prove that our leading men, or men that are led, in the Freethinkers' Association are opposed to woman as an equal worker with man. For myself, I am glad to say that I hav never been treated by any one of them as though womanhood meant any less than manhood. In selecting speakers for a convention it is sometimes difficult to determin the most appropriate; the question of expense enters largely into the difficulty, as that must be met in some way.

I am glad to see that Mrs. Judge Krekel is to be the orator at the Paine celebration in Pittsburgh, and Miss Susan Wixon is one of the speakers for the Boston meeting. Mrs. Krekel's speeches at Rochester showed an acquaintance with books and knowledge that only comes from close study. A good thing for some others of us would be to study a little, I think. I don't think even Boston need be ashamed of Miss Wixon. Demanding justice not only for my own sex, but equally for yours, I am always for freedom,

Chainey's Lectures.

Chainey lectures next Sunday evening on "The Sources of Poetry." Every Liberal should be present, for he will assuredly hear something new. Chainey is pre-eminently constructiv and forward-looking. He brings to the development of scientific thought the graces of art. Liberalism is now advancing to assured success. It is beginning to reach the masses and to kindle their heart. But in order that it may more fully command the future it is necessary there should be organization, a coming together, and an acquaintance among those who are leading the thought of the world. What better means is there of this association than the platform lecture, especially when one can hear so good a lecture as Chainey will giv? This course of lectures, under the auspices of the Liberal Club, is the only means by which the Freethought people of the city can make some intellectual and moral use of Sunday evenings. In the success of this effort lies the success of other and larger things to be undertaken in the future.

Will not every Liberal take a personal interest in this matter, make a special effort to attend the lecture, and persuade others to do the same, in order that we may hav an overflowing house? The presence of every friend of the cause is needed. These lectures ought not to be a failure for lack of sufficient attendance. With all the progress that has been made, Liberals are still so few that each one must feel his responsibility to do his share of work. Of course no one will be put into hell-fire if he stays at home and reads the newspaper; but there is no doubt that one will feel much better if he quits his household corner and enjoys the presence of a living thinker and gets stirred up with trumpet tones, and has a vivid realization of the poetry that is still in our heart and brain. Therefore we expect that every metropolitan reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and friends will be present without fail next Sunday evening at German Masonic Hall, 220 E. 15th street, between 2d and 3d avenues. A good winter's work has been done so far; let us keep the ball a-rolling, and capture a few of our Sundays for advanced thought and culture.

Lectures and Meetings.

A NEW Freethought lecturer is W. Mason, of Bevier, Mo. The press notices he has received are good, and his ability is indorsed by G. H. Walser, of Liberal. Mo., and Capt. Frank Green, editor of the Liberal, of the same place. His terms are low, and can be obtained by writing to him.

THE program of the Pioneer Freethought Club of Montreal for Feburary comprises some highly interesting discourses. Sunday, the 3d, was devoted to Thomas Paine; on the 10th, Capt. R. C. Adams told "What Unbelievers hav Done for the World," and to-morrow, the 17th, Charles Bardorf will set forth the "History of Chemistry." On the 24th, Mr. R. Swalwell will exhibit "Some Phases of Christianity." During the Carnival week just closed, the club's rooms were thrown open to the public. Every Friday evening is devoted to social amusement.

C. B. REYNOLDS lectured in Hamburg, this state, last Friday, Saturday, and Sunday nights, to crowded and enthusiastic houses. His topics were "What Liberalism Teaches," "Why I left the Pulpit," and "The Bible in the Public Schools." He will lecture in Brockport, N. Y., at the Opera House, on the 19th, 20th, and 21st. Everywhere he goes he works for organization. Mr. Reynolds is an eloquent speaker, and, as he intends to devote his whole time and energies to the spread of Freethought, we look to see him become one of the most popular of the many good lecturers in the field. He would like engagements anywhere, and will respond promptly to calls. His terms are very reasonable. Address him till the 19th at Brockport, N. Y.; his permanent address is box 104, North Parma, N. Y.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S appointments for Illinois are as follows: Ridge Farm, Feb. 23d and 24th; Chebanse, 26th, 27th, and 28th; Huntley Grove, March 1st and 2d; Union, 3d; Nunda, 4th, 5th, and 6th; Antioch, 7th, 8th, and 9th; Capron, 11th; Poplar Grove, 12th, 13th, and 14th; Durand, 15th and 16th.

Editorial Notes.

As a sign of the times we note that whenever a great daily paper prints an opinion adverse to the claims of the Bible and church, that article is quoted from one end of the country to the other, while the wishy-washy church paragraphs never get beyond the columns in which they originally appear. Truth has obtained more reputation by a half dozen sledge-hammer editorials against Christianity than by all its varied political turnings.

IN his sermon last Sunday, Justin Fulton took it upon himself to lament that Wendell Phillips was not a Christian, for "then he would hav been good as well as great." It will be well for Mr. Fulton if when he dies his obituaries reveal the doing of one-millionth part the good that Wendel Phillips did. If Mr. Fulton livs long enough, he will learn that goodness and Christianity are not interchangeable terms. About thirty days in every month they are wide apart as the poles.

W. F. JAMIESON has begun the publication of a local journal called the Pipestone Republic, at Pipestone, Minn. It is to be devoted to building up the town, which, if Brother Jamieson is to be credited, is a little the finest spot on the earth, and to the discussion of politics in an independent way. The paper is little, but expects to be lively, which is better, the editor assures the world, than to be large and lazy. Mr. Jamieson was offered $1300 to found a straight Republican party organ, but he prefers freedom and poverty to slavery to party rings and a full purse. All honor to such men. They are the kind needed in this country. May his success be commensurate with his independence.

BEECHER, as we hav often said before, has his ups and downs. A remark made at his last Friday night prayer-meeting is one of his downs: "Don't," he said, "believe that Infidelity has any mark on it but the death-mark. It is sure to go under, and belief will more and more, as the ages go on, do honor over against unbelief. It is a great deal better to believe something that isn't true with all your heart than to believe nothing." That last fling is a little dishonest. Every Infidel that we know believes in all that is true, and notwithstanding the eminence from which the contrary is asserted, we believe them to be better off intellectually than are the Christians. And we may add that for a force upon which the death-mark is already visible the Infidelity of today is a pretty cheerful corpse.

THE calls for the "Truth Seeker Annual" are still undiminished, we are happy to state, although nearly two thousand hav left the office. Every one is pleased with its matter and appearance. Charles Stevens, Librarian of the Pioneer Club of Montreal, in a note to this office, says: "Let me congratulate you on the magnificent get-up of the 'Annual.' It is as near perfection as we can expect in this world, and reflects great credit upon the publishers. I hav disposed of all but two copies." George Maddocks, of Hamilton, Ont., in ordering a lot to be sent to his friends, says: "I hav been around showing 'Our Annual.' I hav shown it to some of our city editors of the daily and weekly press, and they say they never saw such an amount of good information, such beautiful letter-press, engravings, and nice paper, for twenty-five cents before, and wonder how you ever can supply it for the money."

THE many recent celebrations of the anniversary of Thomas Paine hav set the pack of pious editorial wolves yelping after that hero. We hav received at least a dozen religious sheets containing unlimited abuse and vilifications of Paine. The lies are not new. They hav done duty every winter for many decades. They are not even presented in fresh garments; their habiliments are the same old muddy shreds and rags that hav flapped in the winds of slander since Cheetham was convicted of libel. It was a trite remark of the Rev. Dr. Talmage, and perfectly applicable in this case, that a hog can root up a century plant in ten minutes. We cannot use space to whip sense into the heads of Paine's traducers in detail. It has been often done, and is unnecessary since Ingersoll forced the Observer to eat its words. Let all Paine's friends get that correspondence, and they are equipped to silence the heaviest guns of the Christian's offal battery.

THE contradictions and chronological discrepancies of the New Testament are well known plagues of the pious, and many volumes hav been written to explain them away. One of the most troublesome is found in John xviii, 28, which would indicate that Christ had eaten the Passover on a different day from the one observed by the Jews, and that, according to John, the day of Christ's death would be the 14th of Nisan, while the other gospels say it was the 15th of Nisan. This difficulty, says the Independent, has always been acknowledged, and conservativ exegetes hav resorted to varicus means to harmonize the accounts. A common resort was to declare that the Greek word used was not to be taken in its specific but in a general sense, and that it referred to the sacrificial feasts observed in connection with and after the Passah proper. The matter was thus reduced to a philological question. A few weeks ago Professor Shurer, of Giessen, published a pamphlet of twenty-four pages, in which the use of the Greek word and its Hebrew equivalent is investigated. He examins the Old Testament use of the word, and then the rabbinical use, and comes to the conclusion that this so-called "wider" meaning of the word exists only in the heads of the apologists, and that a difference between John and the other gospels must here be acknowledged and accepted. Another stumbling-block more firmly fastened in the path of the Christian!

WE hav often wondered how it was that the bodies of the "just men made perfect" could last forever and furnish the material machinery for an endless chorus of hallelujahs around the throne (for even the angels must hav jaws, and tongues, and larnyxes, and other vocal paraphernalia in order to praise God), and we are glad that a religious contemporary has furnished the explanation. Just where our religious friends obtained their information they do not state, but that is of no consequence. A child's opinion in this matter is worth as much as a philosopher's. This is the explanation:

"The bodies of the just will be endowed with these four qualities: impassibility, subtilty, agility, and luminosity.

"Impassibility will render them invulnerable, incapable of suffering and death.

"Subtilty will establish a perfect harmony between them and the soul, so that they will obey the soul in every action and movement, without being arrested by any obstacle; they will penetrate, as did Jesus Christ risen from the dead, the hardest substances, and will be. in a certain sense, spiritual. It shall rise a spiritual body, says St. Paul.

"Agility will enable them to move from place to place, no matter how distant, in less than a moment.

"Luminosity will adorn them with an incomparable beauty, and will render them radiant as the sun."

We will only make one inquiry, and that is, When are our bodies to take on these marvelous qualities—before or after they hav been disintegrated and scattered to the winds or absorbed in grasses and flowers and weeds? This point must be settled before our satisfaction can be complete.

J. P. NEWMAN, who has been called a "consular theologian," and who is now engaged in a very lively fight with his parishioners, preached a sermon on a recent Sunday in which he said: "Show me the Infidel or man of depraved life who has ever produced a great mechanical invention or made a great scientific discovery. I challenge you to do so. I throw down the gauntlet before you." The Herald of the Tuesday following picked him up in a manner so pertinent that further comment would be superfluous. "It is not worth while," says that paper, "to join issue with a man so very ill informed. But a display of rash presumption, springing out of gross ignorance, by a clergyman who tilts as a champion of Christianity discredits the sacred cause he espouses. Without allusion to great mechanical inventions and scientific discoveries made outside of Christendom, the greatest scientific discovery made in a Christian country in our time is unquestionably the rule of the survival of the fittest in the struggle for life. Its discoverer, Charles Darwin, was an Agnostic. Mr. Darwin, in June, 1879, then seventy years of age, wrote as follows: 'Science has nothing to do with Christ except in so far as the habit of scientific research makes a man cautious in admitting evidence. For myself, I do not believe that, there ever has been any revelation. As for a future life, every man must judge for himself between conflicting vague probabilities.' And in 1881 he said to an Infidel interviewer: 'I am with you in thought, but I should prefer the word "Agnostic" to the word "Atheist." . . . I never gave up Christianity until I was forty years of age.' Further, in reply to a question why he then gave up Christianity, he said, 'It is not supported by evidence.' He died in April, 1882, at the age of seventy-three. Other instances which disprove the Rev. Mr. Newman's ignorant assertion might be cited to much length. It is folly to pretend either that Christian belief or that a moral habit of living is requisit for the mental acuteness which is the fertil source of contributions to human knowledge of natural laws and their practical application."

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, the distinguished anthropologist and naturalist, has devoted much time to experimenting upon animals with a view to enabling them to converse with man. "It has occurred to me," he writes in Nature, "whether some such system as that followed with deaf mutes, especially by Dr. Howes with Laura Bridgman, might not prove very instructiv if adapted to the case of dogs." Accordingly he has been trying experiments with his dog. He printed in legible letters on pieces of stout cardboard such words as "food," "bone," "out." The dog was a black poodle, a breed which, by the way, is generally known to be quick at learning tricks; and Sir John Lubbock got the head master of a deaf and dumb school to assist at the experiments. They began by giving the dog food in a saucer, over which was laid the card on which was the word "food" and beside which was placed an empty saucer covered by a plain card. "Van," the poodle, soon learned to distinguish between the two. Afterward he was taught to bring the card which expressed his wants. "This he does now," says Sir John Lubbock, "and hands it to me quite prettily, and I then giv him a bone or a little food, or take him out, according to the card brought. He still brings sometimes a plain card, in which case I point out his error, and he then takes it back and changes it." That mistake, however, is not often made by Van. He has learned to distinguish between the card with the word and the blank card, no matter how often their relativ positions are changed. This is only the beginning of the very interesting experiments Sir John Lubbock proposes to make. He means to multiply the cards so that the dog may be enabled to communicate freely with him. He also expressed the wish that other owners of dogs which hav displayed especial intelligence and docility would conduct similar experiments, so that the results may be collated and compared. "I confess," he concludes, "I hope that some positiv results might follow, which would enable us to obtain a more correct insight into the minds of animals than we hav yet acquired."

MR. GREEN writes that the March number of the "Freethinkers' Magazine and Freethought Directory" will be out about the 25th of this month, and will be a great improvement on all former numbers, containing original communications from James Parton, Judges Waite and Krekel, Courtlandt Palmer, Hon. Elizur Wright, Hon. A. B. Bradford, J. H. Burnham, John E. Remsburg, T. B. Wakeman, and others.

"Philosophy on the Half Shell."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In answer to my criticism of certain remarks made by Mr. Elliott Preston in The Truth Seeker of Nov. 24th, a reply comes from that gentleman, and also from Mr. "Antichrist," in the issue of your paper dated Jan. 19th. Those who hav made a study of the subject will at once see that these replies are of no force whatever; but the majority of your readers are no doubt only slightly informed on such matters; therefore, in order that they may not be misled by what these gentlemen state, I consider it requisit to again ask for a space in the columns of your journal.

In the first place, I objected to his statement that

"The Jewish mythology was transferred, substantially, from the Hindoo philosophy."

In reply to this, the gentleman says:

"Doubtless much of Christianity did, as you claim, emanate from the Babylonians, but very much more as doubtlessly emanated from India."

I didn't claim anything of the sort. It was not "Christianity" that I spoke of (not having even mentioned the word, excepting at the head of my article, it being the title of the one I was criticising), but Jewish mythology (the Eden-myth, the Babel story, the deluge, etc.), which, he stated "was transferred, substantially, from the Hindoo philosophy." The Jewish mythology, I claimed, was "made by Jewish priests, who had become familiar with the Babylonian mythology" during their captivity. And as Mr. Preston makes no reply to this, and, therefore, no objection, we presume he stands corrected on the statement that the Jewish mythology "was transferred, substantially, from the Hindoo philosophy."

My next objection was to the statement that

"In the Hindoo fable we hav the Garden of Eden (Island of Ceylon); the first man, Adam (Adami); the first woman, Heva (Eve)."

Which he answers by saying:

"Relativ to your question as to the correctness of my statement that Christianity was derived from India, I will quote (to go no further back) the following passage from Col. R. G. Ingersoll's well-known lecture, etc."

He then quotes from "The Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," to show that Ceylon was the Hindoo paradise, and that Adami and Heva were the names of the Hindoo first man and woman.

I said nothing in my article about his statement that "Christianity was derived from India, etc." I simply said that "Ceylon was never believed by the Hindoos to hav been the paradise or home of our first parents;" and objected to his mode of spelling the name Crishna.

Now, with all due respect to his authority (Col. Ingersoll) as an educated gentleman, we must emphatically state that, as an authority on such subjects, he is certainly not one of the best. The colonel is, undoubtedly, a very good theologian; but is he an oriental scholar of reputation and authority? We think not; and do not believe the gentleman would wish to be considered such. He evidently drew his picture from "Jacolliot's Bible in India," and we do not believe he would care to stand by this "fairy tale" and endeavor to support it to-day. It is a romance which is to be found in the writings of no other orientalist. If it were true, 'tis strange that he alone discovered it. Prof. Max Muller shows the character of the work in his Hibbert Lectures, and is willing to believe that M. Jacolliot was imposed upon, but John Fiske, of Harvard University, does not hesitate to call it a "very discreditable performance," and "a disgraceful piece of charlatanry" (Myths, etc., p. 205). Now these gentleman are truth seekers in every sense of the word. They are not "orthodox bigots," but Liberals. They are willing to face the truth, whatever it may be (see Max Muller in The Science of Religion, p. 11), and would be perfectly willing to acknowledge that Ceylon was the paradise, if such was the case. But the Hindoo legend states otherwise. According to it, the paradise was on the sacred Mount Meru, which was situated in the center of the earth. It was clothed in the golden rays of the sun, and adorned with many celestial plants and trees. Its entrance was guarded by a dreadful dragon (cf. Kalisch: Commentary on O. T., i, p. 70; Colenso: The Pentateuch Examined, iv, p. 153; Forlong: The Rivers of Life, ii, sub voce "Meru;" Higgins: Anacalypsis, i, p. 357; Maurice: Hist. Hindostan, ii, p. 242). And in regard to the fall of our first parents, it states that Siva (the destroyer) tempted Swayambhura (son of the self-existent) with a blossom of the sacred fig-tree. Swayambhura, instigated by his wife, Satarupa, endeavored to obtain this blossom, thinking its possession would render him immortal and divine; but when he succeeded in doing so, he was cursed by the Almighty, and doomed to misery and degradation (cf. Wake: Phallism in Anc't Relig's, p. 46; Hardwick: Christ and Other Masters, p. 215; Maurice: Hist. Hindostan, i, p. 408). This sacred Indian fig is endowed by the Brahmins and the Buddhists with mysterious significance, as the Tree of Knowledge or Intelligence; that is, it is the Phallic tree (ibid). To the present day, thousands of barren Indian women giv offerings to this Peepal, or male fig-tree of India, to obtain offspring (cf. Forlong: Rivers of Life, i, pp. 34, 35).

So much, then, for the Hindoo legend, which has nothing whatever to say about Ceylon, or Adami and Heva.

That the Hebrew story, as related in Genesis, was borrowed principally from the Chaldean and Persian legends, is evident. English archæologists hav discovered cuneiform inscriptions which show that the Babylonians had this legend of the creation and fall of man at least 1500 years before the Hebrews heard of it (cf. Geo. Smith's Chaldean Account of Genesis, pp. 13, 88, 89).

The Persians believed that the first men lived in a region of bliss and delight called Heden, which was traversed by a mighty river. But the evil spirit, Ahriman, came to them in the form of a serpent, and tempted them to eat of the forbidden fruit, Hom, which was guarded by cherubs (cf. Kalisch: Com. on Old Testament, i, p. 70; Colenso: The Pentateuch Examined, iv, p. 152; Lenormant, Beginnings of History, ch. ii). And George Smith (Chaldean Account of Genesis, p. 91) givs an illustration (taken from a Babylonian cylinder) of two figures sitting one on each side of a tree, holding out their hands to the fruit, while near the woman is a serpent, which shows "it is evident that a form of the story of the fall, similar to that of Genesis, was known in early times in Babylonia" (ibid).

The Zend-Avesta account states that Ormuzd, the supreme being, created the universe in six periods of time, and that the first man aud woman were joined together until he separated them (cf. Von Bohlen: Introduction to Genesis, ii, p. 14; Lenormant: Beginnings of History, p. 61). This agrees exactly with Jewish traditions in the Targum and Talmud. "Male and female created he them, . . . and named their name Adam," signifies, say they, that Adam and Eve were joined together until the creator separated them (cf. Lenormant: Begin. of Hist., p. 64; Baring-Gould: Legends of Patriarchs, p. 31). It is not necessary, therefore, to travel to India for the foundation of the Hebrew legend.

That the peak on the island of Ceylon is called "Adam's Peak" is certainly true, but this is because the Portuguese gave it the name of Pico d'Adama (cf. Maurice: History of Hindostan, i, 361; ii, p. 242). This was owing, no doubt, to the fact that the nativs called it the Adam. It was probably worshiped on account of its shape as an Adam, i.e., a phallus (cf. Forlong, Rivers of Life, ii, p. 171).

And now, in regard to the spelling of Crishna. Mr. Preston says it is spelled in many different ways. True enough, but that does not signify that any way you wish is correct. Orientalists tell us "Crishna" is the proper way, and that the word signifies black (cf. Williams: Hinduism, p. 125; Maurice: Hist. Hindostan, ii, p. 269), and Major Moore (Oriental Fragments, p. 88,) tells us that in India black stones are sacred to Crishna, while Gen. Forlong (Rivers of Life, ii, p. 495) says that the Lingham stones worshiped by the Crishnaites are black. Both of these gentlemen hav resided in India for years.

We now come to the "Crucified Saviors." I objected to his claim—that "history boasts of upwards of a dozen 'crucified saviors'"—unless the statement was intended to be taken figurativly or allegorically. In reply to this, he says he means "pure and simple English," not allegory; and that "we hav had too much of the figurativ business in Christianity already." He then givs a list of sixteen "saviors," who, in "pure and simple English," were crucified. Very well, we will take him at his word, and see what we can make out of them.

"1. Crishna, of India." Crishna, according to one legend (Vishnu Purana, p. 612), was shot in the foot with an arrow, and died from the effects of the wound; while another states that he was nailed to a tree, on which he died (cf. Guizniant; Relig. de l'Antiq.; apud Higgins: Anacalypsis, i, 144; Inman: Ancient Faiths, 411). He is represented as crucified, and is called Heri, i. e., the savior. But this must not be taken as "pure and simple English," for Crishna—although a black god—is a personification of the sun, crucified in the heavens. One of the names of the sun in the Vedic hymns is Vishnu (cf. Williams's Indian Wisdom, p. 322), and Chrishna is Vishnu in human form (cf. Cox: Aryan Myths, ii, 131; Allen: India, p. 397; Maurice: Indian Antiquities, iii, p. 45; Hist. Hindostan, ii, p. 270; Sir Wm. Jones: Asiatic Researches, i, p. 260). The story of his crucifixion is allegorical, and signifies the overpowering of the god by his enemies—Winter, Darkness, and the Storm Cloud. Nearly all sun-gods die a violent death at the end of their career. It is an iron fate from which there is no escaping. Hindoo sculptures represent Crishna in the toils of Kaliya, the Serpent of Winter (cf. Forlong: Rivers of Life, ii, plate, ix.)

"2. The Hindoo Sakia." Gautama Buddha, the Sakya prince, and founder of the religion known as Buddhism, according to all the sacred Buddhist books, and all orientalists—St. Hillaire, Muller, Burnouf, Bunsen, Rhys-Davids, Williams, and a host of others, was not crucified, in any sense of the word, either in "pure and simple English," or "allegorically" speaking, but died peacefully at a ripe age, while sitting under a tree. As Bunsen remarks, in speaking of Buddha and Jesus, "with the remarkable exception of the death of Jesus on the cross, and of the doctrin of atonement by vicarious suffering, which is absolutely excluded by Buddhism," the histories of their lives correspond in a remarkable manner (The Angel Messiah, p. 50).

"3. Thammuz, of Syria." Tammuz, or Adonis, was one of the pagan "crucified saviors," or "redeemers," who gave himself up as a willing sacrifice (cf. Hislop: The Two Babylons, p. 100). He is fabled to hav been put to death by a boar. But the boar is the same as the deadly serpent Kaliya, that killed Crishna, i. e., a personification of Winter. "Babylon called Jyphon, or winter, the boar; they said he killed Adonis (Tammuz) or the fertil sun" (Forlong: Rivers of Life, i, p. 527). Tammuz died in winter, and the Marys and Marthas wept for him, but "the women weeping for Tammuz was no more than expressiv of the sun's loss of power in the winter quarter" (King: The Gnostics, etc., p. 102.) It was at this time the Egyptians mourned the death of Osiris, their savior (cf. Wilkinson's Anct. Egyptians, i, p. 361). Tammuz, Adonis, and Osiris are personifications of the sun; the story of their crucifixion, therefore, is simply allegory, not "pure and simple English."

"4. Wittoba, of the Telengonese." Wittoba, or Vittoba, is but another name of Crishna (cf. Cunningham: Bhilsa Topes, p. 361; Higgins: Anacalypsis, i. p. 146; Inman: Ancient Faiths, i. p. 402; Williams: Indian Wisdom, p. 48.)

"5. Iao, of Nepal." Iao is the same as Dionysus, being one of his names. Dionysus was the "sin bearer," the "savior," and "redeemer," and the "slain one" (cf. Knight: Ancient Myths, p. 22; Hislop: Two Babylons, p. 104; Bonwick, Egyptian Belief, p. 169). He was put to death by being torn to pieces—figurativly speaking, "crucified." Iao was "divine love," the sun personified, and was one of the names of Adonis (cf. Cox: Aryan Mytho., ii, p. 113.) The legend has the same meaning as those cited above.

"6. Hesus, of the Celtic Druids." There is no account of a savior by this name being crucified. The statement made by Graves (Crucified Saviors, p. 109) is a very far-fetched one. He attributes to Higgins a meaning which that author never intended to convey, as may be seen by referring to his work (Anacalypsis, ii, p. 130).

"7. Quexalcote, of Mexico." Quetzalcoatl, in one of his aspects, is a crucified savior. He was represented, like other sun-gods, crucified in space, in the heavens, while a serpent (the emblem of winter) is depriving him of the organs of generation (cf. Anacalypsis, ii, p. 32). Other representations show the serpent hovering around (cf. Kingsborough: Mexican Antiq. vi, p. 161). This is an allegorical fable, and is the same story as those related above, told in a different form.

"8. Quirinus, of Rome." Quirinus was a name given to Romulus, the supposed founder of Rome, after he had been raised to the rank of a divinity. It is also used as a surname of Mars (cf. Smith's Dic. of Biolog. and Myths, sub voce Quirinus; Tooke's Pantheon, sub voce Mars). One legend relates that Romulus was carried up to heaven in a fiery chariot (as the Old Testament relates of Elijah), while another states that he was cut into pieces as was Osiris and Dionysus; but he did not, like these gods, "giv his life for others," and he was not, like them, looked upon as "one of the saviors or deliverers of humanity" (cf. Bonwick: Egyptian Belief, p. 155).

"9. (Eschylus's) Prometheus." Prometheus, according to Eschylus (Prometheus Chained, Potter's Trans.), was a god-man, a savior of mankind, who suffered crucifixion on Mt. Caucasus. He was nailed there with arms extended, in the form of a cross (cf. Murray: Myths, p. 82; Higgins: Anacalypsis, ii, p. 113). He was "the friend of the human race, suffering in its behalf the most fearful tortures" (Fiske: Myths, etc., p. 64). "He interposed in their behalf when Jove was incensed against them" (Bulfinch: Age of Fable, p. 32). But all this is figurativ language, and cannot be taken literally, Mr. Preston to the contrary notwithstanding. "Prometheus was only a title of the sun, expressing providence or foresight. . . . The story of his crucifixion was allegorical . . . and signified originally no more than the restriction of the power of the sun during the winter months" (Knight: Anct. Mytho., p. 88).

"10. Thulis, of Egypt." The story related by Graves (Sixteen Cru. Saviors, p. 112), about this Egyptian God (his reference being Wilkinson) is simply that of Osiris, the Egyptian savior, who was put to death and rose again from the dead (cf. Wilkinson: Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, p. 219). This God "was crucified on the tree [the cross], which denoted his fructifying power" (Cox: Aryan Mytho., ii, pp. 115 and 125). He is a well-known personification of the sun; his history, therefore, is but allegory.

"11. Indra, of Thibet." Indra, the crucified god of Thibet, is identical with Crishna (cf. Cox: Aryan Mytho., i, p. 88; ii, p. 131.

"12. Alcestos (or Alcestis), of Euripides." The story of the death of this woman is related by Euripides (a Greek tragedian, born at Salamis 480 B.C.), and is to this effect: Alcestis was the wife of Admetis, who gave herself up as a substitute for her husband, who was about to die. Admetis weeps, "holding his dear wife in his hands, and prays her not to leave him, asking impossibilities, for she wastes away and is consumed by sickness." While she is dying, the following conversation is carried on between Admetis and his wife: "ADM: Lift up thy face, do not leave thy children. ALC: Not willingly, in sooth, but—farewell, my children. ADM: Look on them, O look! ALC: I am no more. ADM: What dust thou? dust thou leave us? ALC: Farewell. ADM: I am an undone wretch! CHORUS [of attendants]: She is gone. Admetus's wife is no more" (The Tragedies of Euripides, Buckley's Trans., Bohn's ed.). Here we hav the story of a devoted wife who dies as a substitute for her husband. But the death is not violent; she simply "wastes away and is consumed by sickness." And yet we are told by Mr. Preston, who takes Graves for his authority, that Alcestis was a "crucified savior." Rather far-fetched, we must say.

"13. Atys, of Phrygia." This "only begotten son" (who had the title of "savior") according to Lactantius "suffered a death made bitter with nails and stakes." He was one of the crucified saviors of paganism (cf. Hislop, The Two Babylons: p. 101). But Atys never lived in the flesh. He is the same as Adonis, and the story of his crucifixion is only figurativ.

"14. Crite, of Chaldea." Of this fellow we know but little. Even Mr. Graves, who has the faculty of making out a case upon a very slender foundation, has little to say of him. We are told that a person by this name appeared to a medium not long since, and informed him (or her) that he lived "before any history regarded as reliable by moderns" (cf. Jesus Christ a Fiction, p. 4), but the editor says: "A careful search in ancient history reveals nothing of this man. As he states, he must hav lived in prehistoric times." We must confess ignorance as to this fellow. Perhaps Mr. Preston may know all about him.

"15. Bali, of Orissa." Bali, or Balii, is identical with Crishna and Wittoba (cf. Higgins: Anacalypsis, i, p. 750; Williams: Indian Wisdom, i, p. 48), being simply another name of this Hindoo God.

"16. Mithra, of Persia." Mithra was "mediator between god and man" (cf. Hislop: Two Babylons, p. 101; Dunlap: Mysteries of Adoni, p. 123), who had the title of "Savior." He was put to death in midwinter, when the sun was overpowered by Ahriman, the Evil One. Mithra was the great sun-god of the Persians. Their most splendid cermonials were in honor of him. They kept his birthday, with many rejoicings, on the 25th day of December, when the sun perceptibly begins to return northward (cf. Higgins: Celtic Druids, p. 163; Gross: The Heathen Relig., p. 287; Dupuis: Orig. of Religs., p. 246). The story of his birth, death, and resurrection, is an allegory.

So much then for the "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." It now remains for the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to decide whether these stories are to be taken as "pure and simple English," as Mr. Elliott Preston would hav us believe, or as figurativ and allegorical tales. R. Payne Knight tells us that the crucifixion of these gods meant "no more than the restriction of the power of the sun during the winter months" (Anct. Mytho. p. 88). Sir Geo. W. Cox says these tales "represent the short-lived sun, whose course is one of toil for others, ending in an early death" (Tales of Anct. Greece, p. 33); and that "it is the sun in winter crucified on the tree [the cross] which denotes its fructifying power" (Aryan Mytho, ii, p. 113). Gen. Forlong says that Adonis—in Hebrew "My Lord"—who was crucified in the winter, was simply the sun; and that his death was an allegorical fable. The Babylonians said that winter "killed Adonis, or the fertil sun" (Rivers of Life, i, p. 527). "Hercules is torn limb from limb; and in this catastrophe we see the blood-red sunset which closes his career. The sun-god cannot rise to the life of the blessed gods until he has been slain" (Cox: Tales of Anct. Greece, p. 32). The Phenician deity El, the name they gave to their god Sol (Parkhurst: Hebrew Lexicon, sub voce "El") was called the "preserver of the world," for the benefit of which he offered a mystical sacrifice (Wake: Phallism in Anct. Relig., p. 55). "Yearly the sun-god was supposed by the ancient Aryans to die to save all flesh" (Lillie: Buddhism, p. 93). And "the philosophic theist who reflects upon the story [of virgin-born, crucified, and resurrected saviors] known from the walls of China, across Asia and Europe, to the plateau of Mexico, cannot resist the impression that no Materialistic theory of it can be satisfactory" (Bonwick: Egyptian Belief, p. 182). Allegory alone explains it; and Mr. Preston's "pure and simple English" won't stand the test of criticism. We may hav had "too much of the figurativ business in Christianity already," but it will be rather a hard task to convince readers that his sixteen crucified saviors are really more than ONE, worshiped in different countries, under different names. "We are forced to confess," says H. Fox Talbot (Trans. Biblical Arch. Soc., i, p. 98), "that all the great deities of antiquity were originally ONE, viewed in different lights." Even the Christ of the gospels comes in under this head. There may hav been many Jesuses put to death—for the name "Jesus" was very common among the ancients—but no Christ ever lived in the flesh and suffered the penalty of the cross, "in pure and simple English." A "Christ" is an Æon, and an Æon never had a material body. And now, before we hav done with Mr. Preston, who styles himself "an authorial porcupine," who "makes it a rule never to print statements he cannot fully substantiate by facts," we would like to ask him if he can "substantiate by facts" his statement that "Christna is said to have died peacefully at the ripe old age of 80 years;" and that the fact that Christ was crucified "was disputed by Polycarp (who claimed that he peacefully died at the age of 50)." Both of these statements are new to us, and on that account should like to know from whence they emanated. But his authority must be other than the "Sixteen Crucified Saviors," the author of which has made a great jumble of Crishna and Buddha.

In answer to "Antichrist," we shall say but little. He has seen our opinion of the "Bible in India" stated above; and although he may say "the pseudo scholars who denounce him [the author of the "Bible in India"] are blind leaders of the blind," we fail to see it. If convinced, at any time, that he is right, we will readily acknowledge it. The name Crishna, we believe, signifies black. All Sanscrit scholars tell us so. They also say it should be spelled "Crishna" or "Krishna," and we find that the Hindoos themselvs spell the name in this manner (cf. Moor: Oriental Fragments, p. 21). Madame Blavatsky's statement has no weight with us. It should be remembered that the Madame has seen and heard things which are not common to the lot of most mortals. A little work called "Occult Science," published by Colby & Rich, Boston, will, no doubt, convince anyone of this. We believe the editor of the Sun was correct when he said "there never was a Hindoo reformer named Jezeus Christna." If such is the case, it is rather strange that M. Jacolliot and Madame Blavatsky alone should hav heard of him. Crishna, the warrior hero of the Maha-bharata, can never be converted into "a Hindoo reformer named Jezeus Christna."

Paine's Anniversary in Brooklyn.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Notwithstanding there was no organized effort made by the Liberals of Brooklyn for celebrating Paine's birthday on the 29th of January, yet his services were prominently, if not "providentially," recognized on the 31st.

A paper was read on the above date before the Brooklyn Historical Society, by Oscar S. Straus, Esq., of New York. The subject chosen was, "The Origin of Republican form of Government in the United States, and The Hebrew Commonwealth."

Of this discourse I will briefly remark that Mr. Straus endeavored to trace an analogy between republican principles and the laws and teachings of Moses.

In regard to the political services of Thomas Paine he used the following language: "We should not," he said, "lose sight of the fact that neither the Declaration of Independence nor the success of our armies in the struggle against Great Britain decided for us our republican form of government, or secured for us the blessings of civil and religious liberty; they only served to make them possible; they were the victories of the statesmen, heroes, and the patriots of the pen. No one arraigned the monarchical tendencies of the times with a more vigorous and fearless pen, no one contributed more in kindling the fires of liberty during those times 'that tried men's souls,' than Thomas Paine, that much maligned and abused man, who has been accused of every crime that malice and design could invent. Call him Deist; call him Atheist; call him what you will, he was, in the words of James Monroe, 'the friend of human rights, and a distinguished and able advocate in favor of public liberty.'"

This allusion to the "author-hero of the Revolution" was received with loud applause from the larger portion of the audience, mingled, however, with hisses from the clerical and conservativ portions, who were galvanized into momentary activity by the potent name of Paine.

Mr. Straus concluded his discourse with an earnest protest against those misguided people who seek to introduce their religious faith into the Constitution, and to Christianize our country by act of Congress. "Let those narrow-minded and misguided men," said he, "who would corrupt the grand charter of our liberties by sectarian amendments, shrink back in holy horror from so suicidal a step. Let them read the records of their country's birth, and from them learn that civil and religious liberty in spirit are inseparable, and when they throttle the one, they destroy the other. Freedom of person, freedom of conscience, and toleration are the cause of our political faith, and they alone lead to peace, liberty, and safety. O America, thy bright example is the guiding hope of all the oppressed nations of the world. The winds from the west are constantly wafting thy spirit of civil and religious liberty into the farthest confines of the east. By thy shining light the champions of popular rights are battling against every form of absolutism in Russia, in Turkey, in Spain, and in the great German empire. O America, the promised land for all mankind, thy glorious example is a power more puissant than army or navy for the conquest of the world."

The Rev. Dr. Hall arose and moved a vote of thanks to the lecturer. He indorsed all that the speaker had advanced in favor of Moses, and added, "We hav clergymen to-day teaching us that the books of Moses are like ropes of sand." If the reverend speaker had added that these teachings of the Rev. Heber Newton are acceptable to many intelligent people, he would not hav violated the truth.

The Rev. Dr. Putnam seconded the motion for a vote of thanks. He admires Moses quite as much as the Rev. Dr. Hall, but lacks this gentleman's diplomatic skill in handling delicate subjects. He also lacks the broad and tolerant spirit which many Brooklyn clergymen possess; such, for instance, as has often been exhibited by the Rev. Mr. Canfield, of the Church of Our Father; by the Rev. J. W. Chadwick, of the Second Unitarian church; and also by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, of Plymouth church. Because Mr. Putnam dislikes Paine's religious views, he apparently wishes to ignore his political services.

"The Bible," says this pious clergyman, "is the great charter of popular rights. When rightly understood, it can be made to tell more widely than any other agency to that end. I perhaps feel a little dissent in my own mind with regard to one allusion made by the speaker in his admirable lecture; or, rather, I feel that that allusion was a little unfortunate, by way of illustration of his subject. I happen to hav in my pocket—I can't tell how—this article in which Thomas Paine says: 'As to the Bible, it is a blasphemy to call it the word of God. It is a contradiction, and the history of bad times and of bad men.'"

As a matter of fact, the Constitution is the great charter of popular rights, and the Constitution was not taken from the Bible. It is the work of Jefferson, and Paine, and Franklin, and Adams, and Washington, and the patriots of the Revolution, and these men should not be robbed of their just claim to be acknowledged as the founders of the republic.

But as the Rev. Dr. Putnam now holds in his pocket—no matter how inserted—some writings of Paine, it is to be hoped that he will retain them, and study them, and profit by them. He will learn that Paine believed that "religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy." This is a good doctrin to liv by, and an admirable doctrin to die by. If it were universally adopted, it would banish injustice and oppression from the world, and make a heaven and paradise on earth.

Perhaps, Mr. Editor, it is unnecessary to warn your readers that the Rev. Dr. Putnam here spoken of is not the genial scholar and voluminous writer known in literary circles as the ex-Rev. Samuel P. Putnam. These men should never be confounded together. They are alike in name, and both are interesting and versatil speakers, but their religious views are as divergent as the poles. Had the ex-Rev. Putnam found the writings of Paine in his pocket, he would surely hav endeavored to ascertain how they came there—by "what conjuration and what mighty magic" they had appeared. He would not hav been contented with Lord Dundreary's solution of the apparent miracle, "that it was something no fellow could find out," and he is by far too good a reasoner to attempt to show, as his reverend namesake of Brooklyn has done, that Paine's political views are wrong, by quoting from his religious views which are certainly right.

PETER ECKLER.

OF Mr. Putnam's "Problem of the Universe and its Scientific Solution" George Chainey writes: "The book inspires me with faith in Mr. Putnam's future as a representativ thinker. It is a clear and adequate statement of my own position. The last four pages are magnificent and thoroughly inspiring. They are among the best things that the author ever wrote—prose poetry indeed—and that, to my mind, is the highest form of poetry. This book is, I am afraid, too fine, too earnest, to catch the popular view, but from all high-minded and advanced Liberals it must receive, I think, an enthusiastic welcome."

THE "Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac for 1884" is an interesting and instructiv issue. Its table of contents embraces a compilation that every Liberal will find useful. The debate in the Brooklyn Constitution Club and the words of the Brooklyn Eagle printed on another page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER are very significant. The club is not a Liberal club. The Eagle is a secular paper. They both voice a growing sentiment—a sentiment that may be likened to a snowball—the further it is rolled the larger it grows. The instances cited of the rapid increase of religious property in this state can be duplicated in nearly all the older states of the Union. By our system of exemption our government is proceeding along the road traveled by Italy, by France, by Mexico, and by other countries. And we are traveling along it rapidly—too rapidly for the situation not to be viewed with alarm by every truly democratic citizen. The crooked methods of shielding church property employed by the incorporators of religious societies are well known. Especially is it true of the Roman Catholic church, that incarnation of villainous tyranny, the mother of slaves and mental serfs, the fosterer of war, the disturber of the peace of every country she has blighted by her presence. That the church societies should be extravagant and unjust is a matter of course. Stolen money is easily spent, and but very few thieves are philanthropists. There is a swelling feeling that the undetected Cowleys in our religious charitable institutions are many. In their last report the commissioners of charities recommended that a supervisor of these institutions be appointed having power to correct abuses. This recommendation would not hav been made did the commissioners not hav solid grounds upon which to base it.

Only one man was found in the Constitution Club who opposed a word to the otherwise unanimous opinion that every religious tub should stand upon its own bottom, unaided by the state. He put his plea for the continuance of the present system upon two grounds: 1. That the American people are generous and desire to support the churches; and 2. That the taxation of church buildings would only relieve the people to the extent of $2.50 a year to each taxpayer.

It seems to us that the first reason is partly untrue, and that the second is an exceedingly substantial one to be used on the other side. It is true that the Americans, as a nation, are generous. But it is equally true that most Americans strongly object to paying for what they do not get, and don't want, and won't hav. Taking the church statistics as the basis, allowing their most extravagant claims as to membership, and less than one-third of the people of this country are affiliated with any denomination. We cannot conceive that the generosity of the other two-thirds can be stretched to contentment at having to pay any proportion whatever of the worshiping bills of the third.

Two dollars and half a year is not a great sum, but upon what principle of right and justice can an Infidel taxpayer be asked to contribute that amount to his Christian neighbor? There are about five millions of people in this state. Probably three millions are direct taxpayers, which is, we take it, what the gentleman meant. Two dollars and half to each amounts to a great sum. We cannot think that Col. Hemstreet would argue in the way he does about his private business. And certainly the churches should be as honest as commercial men, if they do not want their claim to be moral teachers hooted out of the court of public opinion.

The Brooklyn Constitution Club and the Brooklyn Eagle hav got hold of the right horn of the ecclesiastical bull. He should be taxed like any other commercial property.

How Garfield Carried Indiana.

Stephen W. Dorsey, of Star route fame, made an interesting disclosure to a World reporter the other day. It is a practical illustration of the evils of sectarianism, and a loud-voiced warning to the Freethinkers of this country. It shows also the dirty depths to which the politics of our times has sunk, though the latter revelation is not new, and needs no sign-board to point it out. The facts come out in an interview with Mr. Dorsey published in the World of the 9th inst.:

"While in Indiana did Gen. Garfield write you in reference to and suggesting the use of the Campbellite church to secure his election on the ground that he was a member of it?"

"Oh yes, often, not only wrote to me, but sent out the most prominent men of that church, among them Mr. Phillips, of Pennsylvania, and his own successor as president of Hiram College. We did all we could, and used all the methods in our power at the suggestion of Gen. Garfield to produce the result we desired. I say this because I don't think there is any secret about it. If there is, it is so open that tens of thousands of people know it."

"What method did he suggest to change the political convictions of the members of his church?"

"Gen. Garfield seemed to think it best where we found a church in debt, that represented a large number of voters, that, if we had the means, we should pay off the debt, and where we found a community with a good number of Campbellite voters without a church we had better contribute liberally toward building one, and especially if the voters were Democrats. I carried out these suggestions to the best of my ability, under the guardianship of Mr. Phillips and others. We tried to make the lonely way of the Campbellites as pleasant as possible, and there were about 25,000 of them in the state."

Everybody knows that carrying Indiana carried the country for the Republicans in the presidential campaign. And Garfield owed his office to his church. He was voted for by 25,000 men, not because he was an honest, capable man, not because he possessed the qualities of a statesman, knew the country's needs and could satisfy them, but because he had embraced that particular variety of superstition known as Campbellism.

If anything were needed to show the danger that Christianity is to our country, and the direct influence it exercises upon our two great political parties, this furnishes it.

A Chat with Correspondents.

The following letter should hav been answered sooner, but got misplaced and has just come to light:

GIDEON, KAN., Jan. 6, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Having taken your paper for some time, I would like for you to answer the following questions through your columns:

1. Where does the "mad stone" come from that is a sure cure for hydrophobia?
2. Does protectiv tariff hav a bad effect on us Western farmers? and would free trade be any better?
3. What gave rise to Thanksgiving day?
4. How many do the Liberals number in the United States?
5. How many Bibles are there besides the Christian's Bible?

Please answer the above questions to settle a dispute and oblige J. W. W.

1. The mad-stone is a porous stone said to be capable of drawing poison from wounds. It is not a "sure cure." It has been found in this country in the Southern states. Its powers are probably more or less mythical and exaggerated. If we wanted to procure one we wouldn't hav the slightest idea of where to find it. Statements regarding it are always general.

2. The tariff question is a big one, and hardly to be settled off-hand. We believe, however, that political economists generally agree that the farmer is injured in this country by protection, because he is the exporter, and consequently the price he gets for his products is regulated in the markets of the world, while on the imported goods he buys he must pay prices regulated by the combination of manufacturers in this country. We saw an illustration of this in the Free Bulletin not long ago, which seems to put the case in a plain light. It runs in this form:

What is tariff?

Our tariff is a system of duties paid at our customs houses in money on goods brought into the United States from foreign countries.

(1) One object is to raise money to carry on our government. This is a good object. (2) The second object is to keep out of our country certain goods, so as to induce men to make them in this country. Let us see in what way their object is attained, and whether the result is good for the American farmer.

Of course, our people who want a certain kind of goods must either buy them abroad or make them at home; and it is an inducement to make and sell them here, if the goods brought in from abroad are taxed by duties, while the goods made here are not taxed. This is a simple statement of what is called doctrin of protection of home industry. To change that statement a little, the tariff duties which keep out, or tend to keep out, foreign goods, allow our manufacturers to sell their goods with foreign competition, and therefore at higher prices from our people, they will of course be willing to make the goods for which high prices are to be paid.

Now, who gets the benefit and who suffers the harm of these high prices? The man who gets the benefit is certainly the maker of the goods, who sells them at the high price; and the man who suffers the harm is the buyer of the high-priced goods. Such a man is the farmer.

Let us giv a very simple example. A pocket-knife could be brought over from Sheffield, England, and sold in Chicago for—say thirty-five cents. But the importer finds that at the port of New York he must pay a tariff duty of—say fifteen cents. Therefore, to make a profit, a knife must evidently sell for thirty-five cents, plus fifteen cents,—that is to say, fifty cents when it reaches Chicago. Now, seeing this, the American maker of pocket-knives says to himself: "I can make my knife for thirty-five cents. I will then take my knife to Chicago, and as there is a tariff tax of fifteen cents on the Sheffield knife, but none on mine, I can sell my knife for forty-five cents and still make a profit. He does so, and the farmer who wants to buy a knife at Chicago finds that he must do one of two things—either buy the Sheffield knife for fifty cents or the American knife for forty-five cents. In the first case the farmer has paid ten cents extra, which goes into the pocket of the maker of the American knife.

But presently the man who brought over the Sheffield knife finds that he cannot pay the tax of fifteen cents and compete with the American knife-maker, who pays no tax at all. So he imports few or none of the Sheffield knives, and the American knife-maker has a clear field. The government is consequently deprived of revenue, and the poor farmer must pay what prices the American knife-maker chooses to exact.

Now, let the farmer reflect that this American knife, which he has paid so high and unnecessary a price for, is the symbol of all the goods which he buys for his farm and household. His hoe costs him thirty cents more than it should, his plow fifteen per cent more, the paint for his house twenty-five per cent more, the clothing for his family twenty, thirty, or forty per cent more. Everything is dearer which he has to buy, while the wheat which he sells has not advanced a penny in price. For his wheat is not, and cannot be, "protected." The price of grain is fixed in the world's market and cannot be ruled by the tariff of any particular country.

This conversation might be lengthened, and no lies told, like this:

Does the tariff protect the Laborer?

So the Manufacturer says.

How?

The Manufacturer says he can afford to pay higher wages than the Pauper Labor of Europe gets!

Can he afford to?

Yes.

Does he?

Not in proportion to the cost of living.

Why not?

Because he goes over to Europe and imports that Pauper Labor, and places it in competition with American Labor.

What happens then?

The American can work for what the Pauper Labor gets or starve.

Which does he do?

Neither. He goes into business and endeavors to become a Monopolist, or into Wall street and becomes a High-toned Christian Gambler.

Then the tariff is a damage to the Farmer?

Yes.

And no practical benefit to the Laborer?

No.

But does Protection confer no benefits?

Yes indeed!

On whom?

The Manufacturer.

Is there no remedy for this state of affairs?

Yes.

What?

Put a tariff on Labor, or take it off of Labor's products.

That is one phase of the protection issue in one easy lesson. Its ramifications are far-reaching, and their amplification has filled and will continue to fill volumes. Free trade is the ideal system of society. Whether the time has arrived for its practical application we are not egotistic enough to pretend to say. But times cannot be much harder than they are now, change the political parties and policies as we may.

3. Thanksgiving Day originated in New England. It has been observed since the first settlement by the Pilgrims. It was instituted after a particularly hard season. It has now extended to a national holiday, being first observed as such in 1862. It is a time for killing turkeys and stuffing geese.

4. We hav no means of knowing how many Liberals there are in the country. They form a sturdy band, and their numbers are increasing. Complete organization must be effected before a census can be taken.

5. See page 75 of "The Truth Seeker Annual."

The next letter is from a Christian gentleman who has read Mr. Bennett's "Answers to Christian Questions," but has evidently not heard of his lamented death. Mr. Parrish says:

ST. LOUIS, MO.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In looking over your pamphlet, "Answers to Christian Questions," I find an error on page 3, near top of page. You state, "It is more unreasonable to hold that the universe came from nothing." Religionists do not hold that the world was made of nothing. The Recognized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints do not teach this, nor do they believe it. No reasonable man will dispute the inevitable truth that the matter of which this earth was formed always did exist, or that, if it did not, it is beyond our comprehension to understand.

The idea advanced by you Atheists, that "nature" was always inherent in matter, and caused this earth to assume its present form, is the most absurd theory I ever heard for the matter in question; by this I mean the laws of nature.

Yours respectfully, JOHN S. PARRISH.

Our copy of the Bible says that "in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." Mr. Noah Webster, who is accounted a pretty good authority on the meaning of words, asserts that "create" means to "bring into being; to form out of nothing; to cause to exist;" and he givs for his authority, Genesis i, 1, showing that his is the Christian world accepted definition. Mr. Calvin was a great and consistent Christian. His followers are regarded as the most orthodox of any Protestant sect. Their Confession of Faith is authoritativ as regards the essentials of Christianity. Chapter IV., section 1, of the Confession reads very plain:

"It pleased God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, for the manifestation of the glory of his eternal power, wisdom, and goodness, in the beginning, to create, or make of nothing, the world, and all things therein, whether visible or invisible, in the space of six days, and all very good."

These facts flatly contradict Mr. Parrish and fully sustain Mr. Bennett. The Latter Day Saints, or Mormons, accept the Bible as divine, and consequently must accept the creation account; but the laymen of that church are compelled to take the explanations and interpretations of "the prophet," who can of course squirm out of the absurd position.

If the laws of nature are not inherent in matter, what are they inherent in? And if not eternally existing, when did they begin? Mr. Parrish himself is not an orthodox Christian, because he concedes the impossibility of creating and destroying matter. The true Christian theory is that matter has existed only about six thousand years, having been created at that time by a god.

The laws of nature are immutable, universal, and immortal as the matter they move and control. Matter is and always has been permeated by Force. Force produces all the phenomena of nature, and the correlation and conservation of force are the laws of nature, which Mr. Parrish derides. Separately matter and force do not exist, because no force can arise from nothing, and there exists no matter which has not within itself a latent force. "The law of nature," as Moleschott truly says, "is a stringent expression of necessity." "There exists in it," also says Buchner, "neither exception nor limitation; and no imaginable power can disregard the necessity. A stone not supported will in all eternity fall toward the center of the earth, and there never was and never will be a command for the sun to stand still" that was or will be obeyed.

To assert that the laws of nature are not inherent in matter, and as immortal as matter, is to assert what has been long demonstrated to be false; and to call the knowledge of this fact absurd is a development of ignorance surprising in a man who can see the necessity of the immortality of matter.

The laws of motion and attraction, called gravitation, are everywhere the same. The motions of the most remote bodies take place according to the same laws by which on this earth a body falls. The laws of light through all space are the same. It has everywhere the same velocity and composition; its refraction takes place in a similar manner. The laws of heat are, like those of light, the same everywhere. The history of the origin and development of our earth is analogous to that of the heavenly bodies. The spheroidal forms of the planets prove that they, like the earth, were once in a fluid state, and the gradual development of the earth to its present form must, in a similar manner, hav taken place in all other planets. It is the force of gravity, and gravity alone, that causes the moon to circle around our earth, and the earth around the sun. The fixed stars are likewise subject to this univeral law, as are all the planets—in fact, every heavenly body obeys this eternal law, which, as has been shown by Buchner and other scientists, "is inherent in matter and visibly manifested in every atom, and is irresistibly obeyed by every body, however large or small, without the least deviation." It is because the laws of nature are inherent in nature, and mathematically exact, that astronomers can foretell eclipses and calculate the movements of the heavenly bodies. If the universe were a hap-hazard arrangement, subject to the will of a changeful god, we should never know when we go to bed at night whether the sun would rise in the morning or not, or whether the stars that were shining in the evening would not in a few hours be fiery comets chasing each other through the skies to the imminent peril of this terrestrial ball. Mr. Parrish is indebted to Atheistical science for the peace of mind and certainty of the stability of his lands which he now enjoys. All science is Atheistic, in that every new fact discovered is one less reason for the necessity of a superintending power. More than enough of the mysteries of the universe hav been explained to permanently retire the popular deity from the exercise of power. The god of the Christians, Mohammedans, and other sects, is a person or force entirely unknown to science, and known only to believers in him or it by imaginativ assertion. No one in the whole wide world can giv one solitary authenticated fact about him or it. Believers simply assert such an existence. It therefore belongs to them to prove it. This they cannot do, and, to throw dust in people's eyes, loudly claim that the negativ must first be proven. But those caught in this trap are very few nowadays. The pagans had a god for every season of the year—for almost every day in the year; a god who presided over every occupation, and over every function of the human body. Monotheism supplanted these by one God in whom these duties were concentrated, and here began monopoly. But the discoveries of modern science hav relegated him to the same limbo that ingulfed the smaller deities. The laws of nature, inherent in matter, are found to be all-sufficient. In the words of another German scholar, "Comparativ, assisted by microscopic, anatomy, broke down the old barriers; paleontology filled up the gaps by intermediate forms; geology taught that the natural forces had never been different from what they are at present; physiology showed the dependence of the intellectual capacities and their development on organization; psychology teaches that reason is an acquired faculty; anthropology finally points out the development of the races; history and philology exhibit the rude beginnings. All our civilization, the basis of humanity, is not nature, but art—the toilsome education of the race and of individuals, effected in thousands of years; and the physical development, from the first moment of generation, is in every individual merely a repetition of the same laws of development to which the organic world owes its existence. How simple does all this appear to us, how forcible the inferences, were not the 'ifs' and the 'buts' rendering the minds of so many men inaccessible to the truth! That this mode of viewing nature will ultimately prevail, I entertain no doubt whatever."

We commend the above to the thoughtful consideration of Mr. Parrish.

Here is another Christian gentleman, an old man on the shady side of the hill of life, his shadow falling toward the east. Age has softened his words, experience has chastened his Christian arrogance, and he has enough good breeding to allow him to be civil to Freethinkers without danger of exhausting the supply. He comes from Wymore, Neb., and thinks he is going to heaven. We hope he may. He writes at the request of a friend:

WYMORE, NEB., Jan. 14, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav often seen your paper, and I hav been requested by Mr. A. Howell to ask you to spare me a small space to present a few ideas, as there are two sides to all questions. Now, I am an old man, staying here on what is called borrowed time. So please allow me to "strike a light" until I get my hand in.

I am aware that public opinion is against the Bible. Hasty and inconsiderate conclusions generally fall into disgrace. Now, dear sir, if counterfeit money were found in every house in the Union, would it be any evidence that there was no genuin currency? Popular opinion is doing for the nations of the earth. But common sense tells us that mind must exist beyond matter. Can happiness exist without order? Can order exist without law? Can there be a law without a law-giver? Now, dear sir, if you should in your search find a Phœnix-tree whose fruit alone was life-sustaining, would you try to destroy it because some counterfeiters should undertake to counterfeit the fruit, or misapply the fruit, or besmear the fruit with filthiness? Wisdom's book is the tree of life.

Wisdom and reason make us men;
Take these away—what are we then?
Mere animals, and just as well
The beast might think of heaven or hell.

Now, if you will deal kindly, truly with me, tell me; and, if not, tell me that I may turn to the right hand or to the left. S. E. COOLEY.

It is pleasant to know that public opinion in his section is against the Bible. Presumably it is also adverse to counterfeit money. Supposing some Eastern shark goes out to Wymore and offers to buy some of Mr. Cooley's land, tendering in payment some paper which he calls the only kind of cash that will buy groceries and clothes and medicins. It has the vignette of a man in the corner, and some Hebrew and Greek signatures on the bottom. The paper is musty with age and the print is blurred with handling. It cannot be read with any certainty, and the promis to pay is written in so many different ways that it cannot be told whether it means to pay in current coin that shall be a joy, or base metal that will turn to pain. Would Mr. Cooley accept it? No. He will tell the shark that he don't know the man, and has no means of finding his rating, and whether the promises he makes will be kept. And if it comes out in the course of the conversation that the maker of the note has been dead a few thousand years, and that grave doubts exist as to his ever having lived, and his possessions are admittedly all in the air, Mr. Cooley will retain his land and the shark his notes.

This is thrown in parenthetically. Mr. Cooley's counterfeit money argument is too aged to stand. It lost its value when Paley's watch stopped ticking. The best of paper money is rendered valueless by the failure of the government which issues it. The notes of a bankrupt firm hav no market value. So it is with Christianity. The government of Jehovah is at an end. The firm doing business in pledges at the sign of the three golden balls is bankrupt. The father has retired, the son gone to Europe, and no one knows the whereabouts of the third partner. Religions, like governments, come up, issue their promises, pass away and become interesting only to collectors of canceled stamps and currency. There may be, there is, a little good gold behind the paper, but not enough to redeem one in a million of the promises. Mr. Cooley, perhaps, can see the point.

Can there be a law without a law-giver? Yes, there can. The law of gravity, for instance, is universal and eternal. Eternal means endless both ways, and what has always existed never could hav been begun. And now, here is a conundrum for you. If every effect must hav a cause, and God is an effect, what or who is the cause of God? Giv it up, do you? Well, here is the answer. There is no such being as is described in the Bible and called God.

As for the "Phœnix-tree" we will talk about that when we find a religion that sustains life. So far, religion has destroyed more life than it has sustained. Christianity has made more wounds than it ever healed; shed more blood than it ever stanched; destroyed more knowledge than it ever gave to the world; and been in all ways more of a curse than a blessing. This is not to say that it has done no good; but when the balance sheet is struck the debit side of Christianity's account with humanity will show about four times as many figures as the credit column. Of Mohammedanism the same can be said. All theologies are obstacles to progress—shadows cast by clouds across man's pathway.

But our space is limited, and we must let Mr. Cooley's further quibbles go. As he rightly says, 'tis wisdom and reason that make us men, but if the only distinction between the beast and man is the capacity to think of heaven and hell, the race must be nearer its ancestors than Mr. Cooley would probably be willing to admit. If Mr. Cooley could only teach his cow to say her prayers she would be his equal, according to his reasoning.

Something for the Taxpayers to Consider.

At a meeting of the Brooklyn Constitution Club on the evening of January 28th, the subject for debate was, "Resolved, that no real property be exempt from taxation but public property." The Brooklyn Eagle reported the speeches made:

Mr. John H. Clayton spoke in favor of the resolution. His understanding of the principles of good government were that the public must support the government, and that the government in return for this should protect the citizen. The government was supported by the taxpayers. This was the modern idea. Formerly nations thought it proper to levy taxes as they were needed, without regard to any system. This seemed to him to be irregular. Our theory was based on the old Venetian law, and ever since the law was enacted in Venice, the duties of the citizen and government hav been reciprocal. The speaker could not, therefore, conceive why any corporation should be exempted from taxation. It had come to pass, however, that all public buildings, houses of public worship, colleges, seminaries, academies, schools, court-houses, jails, and even the furniture contained therein had become exempted from taxation. The resolution, as the speaker understood it, had been offered to ascertain why the churches had been included in this list, and why they should not contribute to the support of the government. They had the equal protection of the government with the private citizen. They were protected by the civil, military, police, and fire authorities, and they should be compelled to contribute to their support. Statistics showed that the amount of property exempted in this city in 1880, was $16,271,300. It had increased a million of dollars since then. The following were the exact figures:

Churches,	$9,276,500
Parsonages,	701,500
School and other institutions,	6,293,300
Total,	$16,271,300

The exemption on churches and parsonages alone amounted to $10,000,000. While it was perhaps proper that schools should be so exempted, he could see no reason why churches should not bear their share of the expenses of government, and he had heard no reason advanced except that the churches were carried on for the good of the state, but in the speaker's opinion this reason was not a true or a sufficient one.

Chairman Hentz asked if all church property was exempt, or only that portion upon which the edifice stood.

Mr. Clayton: Whole blocks of it. There are only small sections of church property really occupied by the churches. The larger portion is rented out and incomes are derived therefrom.

Colonel Hemstreet: Why should not this apply to New York church property?

Mr. Clayton: The same law should exist all over. A law was passed some time ago compelling Trinity, and other church property to pay taxes on its improved property.

Mr. D. W. Northup said that only a short time ago he had been in a court of justice, when a petition was presented for the exemption of a large plot of church property. The speaker knew that the judge was a Catholic, and the petition came from Catholics. He was surprised to hear his honor say that, although he was bound to grant the motion, yet if he could hav his way he would not do it, because the system hurt his own church more than any other in the land. Continuing, the speaker said that there was no limit to the amount of property a church might accumulate under the present law. There was an old law that churches should pay taxes on all real property over and above $2,500 to $3,000 worth.

The churches, however, evaded the law, for as soon as they reached that amount they turned the surplus over to another society and elected new trustees. The bishops, however, controled all the property and held the title deeds. In France, under Napoleon III., who was one of the Catholic church's best sons, that potentate had decreed that the church should control but $15,000,000 worth of property and no more; yet in this state the Catholic church owned $25,000,000, and the amount was ever on the increase. This they could not do if they shouldered their just share of taxation. In England they had accumulated so much property that it had been deemed proper to take it away from them, and monastery after monastery had been abolished and placed were they should stand their portion of the taxes. Our country and our state should compel them to do the same, and every unbiased mind would echo the speaker's words. If the Protestant churches should be compelled to do the same, there would not be so many unoccupied churches. Many of these churches were owned by insurance companies, who were reaping the benefits, while the small congregations were groaning under the constant accumulation of heavy debts.

Mr. Duryea spoke at length. He said that an opinion predominated that a house of worship should not be taxed merely because it was a house of worship. There was a superstition against taxing a church because it was a house of God, and that governments had never been strong enough to overcome this superstition. The first man to speak against the evil was General Grant, who, in his message in 1875, brought up the question. President Grant said that, in 1850, the church owned $83,000,000 of property; in 1860 it had more than doubled, and in 1870, estimated at its lowest figure, it was worth $354,000,000. Mr. Andrews had dissented from the president's desire to tax this property, but was forced to admit that if it increased in the same ratio before the nineteenth century closed it would be worth between two and three billions of dollars. Such a rapid increase was not only astonishing but dangerous. The idea of those in power appeared to be to obtain grand buildings, and engage in impressiv services. Their desire appeared to be to crush out all that were not within the ring. These edifices should not be erected otherwise than for the enlightenment of the people, and if they were run on other principles they should be taxed. These large edifices, cathedrals, etc., had but a few seats for worshipers, but they were so gorgeous that they placed smaller churches, where good might possibly be done, at a great disadvantage. The larger churches, with thousands of dollars' worth of property, were run on purely business principles, and the speaker intimated that they grabbed all they could lay their hands on. They rented their property, and should, therefore, pay taxes. They should be compelled to do as their master did, and render unto Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's.

The speaker then said that there was a congregation within a stone's throw from the club-room that exerted scarcely any religious influence; a congregation with a Sunday-school of barely 150 scholars; that had endeavored to sell its property to the United States government for $300,000. What right had the church to hold property, and pay no taxes, when it gave no instruction to those who were compelled to share its debts?

There was another piece of property on Clermont avenue. It occupied a whole block of ground. A foundation had been laid all around it ten years ago for the purpose of evading the law, and there it stood to-day, of no use to anyone. The speaker maintained that no church had any right to teach morals when it evaded the law.

Mr. Douglass spoke in the same strain, and Colonel J. W. Jones followed. He said that wealthy men who had sumptuous houses wanted their families to worship in churches equally sumptuous, but had a desire to dodge the tax-collector, while they were abundantly able to support the luxury they had organized. The gentleman reviewed what Messrs. Clayton, Duryea and others had said and upheld their ideas.

Chairman Hentz was slightly opposed to the ideas of his fellow clubites, and thought that a limit should be made to the holdings of church societies.

Mr. Duryea then spoke against the organizations known as the Young Men's Christian Associations of New York and Brooklyn. The former had lobbied through the legislature a special act whereby they had been permitted to own from $26,000 to $30,000 worth of property, and rent it for large amounts to the detriment of private property in the same neighborhood. It was one of the most aristocratic organizations in the city, and a poor man was debarred from its benefits. The same could be said of the Brooklyn organization. A person must believe just this or think just that, otherwise he could not become a member.

Colonel Jones thought that the limitation should be placed at $20,000 or $25,000.

Mr. R. B. Leech reviewed the history of the city, and said that even the graveyards of their ancestors had been despoiled by the church societies. He quoted, as instances, where the bones of their forefathers had been removed from two graveyards on Fulton street and from one near the Wall-about, in order that the organization might obtain large sums for property they had never paid a cent for.

Colonel Hemstreet said that all the speakers had skirmished at safe distances from the real question that affected the community. The question was one of portentous importance. The American people were liberal, and were willing to support the churches directly or indirectly. He had figured on the statements of Mr. Clayton, and had ascertained that if even the whole church property was taxed it would only be a saving of $2.50 per year to each taxpayer.

Mr. Alfred Churchman asked that somebody move as an amendment that the limit be placed at $25,000. Mr. Churchman is a clerical looking old gentleman, and created some laughter when he said that the authorities had mistaken him for a clergyman, and had reduced his taxes $2,000 on that account. "Two thousand dollars for piety's sake," said the old gentleman, chuckling.

Colonel Jones: "Did you permit it?"

Mr. Alfred Churchman chuckled again, but made no answer. Later in the evening he explained, for the benefit of those present, that he had not permitted it.

Other gentlemen spoke, and then Colonel Jones said that millions of dollars' worth of property was imported to this country duty free by priests; vestments, censors, altar cloths, and cadaverous images were brought here, but were charged no duty, merely because they were brought here by priests. One man in Minnesota made a regular business of it, and another, when he had been stopped by the Custom House officers, was surprised, and said, "Why, this is my twenty-first trip, and I hav less now than I hav ever brought across before."

After some further debate the original resolution was adopted.

The paper from which we take the above report printed, a day or two after, the annexed editorial upon the same subject:

The justice of the present exemption of church property from taxation is a question which has been discussed frequently in the past, and is likely to be still more prominent in the future. This must be so from the nature of the case. If it seemed a wrong to many citizens of this city and state, as well as of other cities and states, that churches should pay no taxes when their property amounted only to thousands of dollars, it now seems a greater wrong when it is worth millions, and as churches are constantly increasing it will seem more and more intolerable as their property goes on increasing in extent and value.

Although the Constitution Club of Brooklyn is only a small society of citizens who meet to exchange their thoughts and adopt resolutions on Constitutional questions, the subject of church taxes, which they debated recently, is one in which every citizen, not only of Brooklyn, but of the United States, is interested. The principle, as we hav said, is the same, whether the value of church property be small or large; but the statistics presented last evening are sufficiently startling to giv emphasis to the argument and to justify decisiv action. It will be far better for the churches themselvs if the question is settled before the alleged injustice assumes proportions which may excite a feeling in the public mind antagonistic to them and to the welfare of religious institutions.

It appears that the value of the property of churches and parsonages that are now exempted from taxation in Brooklyn alone amounts to $10,000,000. There is no equality in claim to exemption between public schools, hospitals, and other institutions that confer benefit upon the whole community, and are independent of all religious and denominational influence, and the churches, which represent special denominational and sentimental interests and feelings. It is urged that churches exist for the good of the state, but it has been maintained by many political economists that the next best thing to having one state religion is to hav none. It is not easy to see that the teaching of denominational dogmas that keep men at variance and divert them from common purposes and pursuits of benevolence is a benefit to the commonwealth. The benefit of a Roman Catholic church is to the members of it, and so is that of a Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, Baptist, or Methodist place of worship. They are excellent for those that use them; they are of no use to those who do not believe the things taught in them. Yet they ought to flourish in our midst, because it is advisable that every man should worship God according to his conscience. It is not so apparent that the state should pay for his doing so, any more than that the state should provide him with the necessaries of life.

It appears that even Napoleon III., who as emperor of France was "fils l'aine de l'Eglise," and whose last will shows him to hav been a sincere and devoted member of that church, thought it right to limit by a decree the property of the church in France to $15,000,000 worth. Yet in the state of New York alone this particular denomination owns $25,000,000 worth of property, and the amount is constantly increasing. An old law still exists by which all churches in this state should pay taxes on all real property above the value of about $3,000; but nothing is easier than to evade this law by dividing and subdividing the parishes and founding new district churches with other trustees. The membership of the Roman Catholic church is constantly increasing through immigration; it is chiefly of the poorer classes, but the immense value of its holdings which are exempt from taxation makes it practically a beneficiary of the state, and if its citizenship and property were to go on increasing beyond those of other denominations collectivly it would become a state church, whether it had the name or not.

It seems to us of the very essence of the voluntary system of religion which in this country has taken the place of the endowed and established churches of Europe, that every man should pay for his own religion, and that those who do not belong to it should not be taxed to support it. But the exemption of many millions' worth of church property in the state of New York from taxation clearly makes taxation heavier for the people at large. And in Brooklyn, the exemption of ten thousand dollars' worth of church property belonging to the various denominations does the same. One body of Christians would certainly not approve of special privileges being granted by the state to another body that was opposed to its doctrins and principles, and those who do not assent to the dogmas of any of the churches, Catholic or Protestant, hav an equal right to complain of the special privileges of all of them, as a whole. In truth, while George Washington denied, although an Episcopalian churchman, that the Constitution of this republic was based upon Christianity, our states hav been endowing every form of Christianity, however mutually hostil to one another. For it is the same thing to make a grant of money to a church as to exempt it from the payments made by the people for the general good. To say, "I forgiv you that debt," is, in dealings between man and man, equivalent to saying, "I make you a present of that money."

And not only is the exemption of church property from taxation an injustice to the commonwealth, but it is the cause of trickery and jealousy among the churches themselvs. If the roast beef and plum pudding of exemption from taxes be the privilege of the larger denominations, every new sect that is started will feel itself aggrieved if it has not a share. The Salvation Army will claim exemption for their barracks and headquarters on the same principle and with as much justice as the wealthy denomination that builds a magnificent cathedral.

The same argument applies to the exemption of ecclesiastical millinery and valuable property in metals and jewels from Custom House duties. It is a privilege which is based upon special ecclesiastical claims with which the people of the state hav no concern, and which are not based upon human rights or the rights of citizenship. The Methodists are the most numerous denomination in the United States, and if they were to adopt a costly ritual and build magnificent temples they might, with equal justice, insist that their importations for religious purposes should be free of tax as well as their property.

The whole question must compel investigation and legislation in the near future. As it is, we hav thrown off the trammels of a state church while we hav allowed the worst features of it to acquire proportions which were forbidden in Catholic France, and are not paralleled in the state churches of Protestant England and Germany.

Memoir.

Samuel Kirk died of heart disease on Dec. 1, 1883, aged 61. His life was a checkered one. By turn he was a farmer, merchant, lumberman; then a farmer, which occupation he was engaged in at the time of his death. He was twice married. By his first wife he had five children, four of whom are still living. By his second wife (who survives him) he had six children, five of whom are still living, the idols and care of a loving mother. By sedulity he was enabled to leave them in comfortable circumstances. In middle life he visited some of the kingdoms of Europe, and returned with a higher estimation of the advantages of a republic. He was a Freethinker in the full sense of the term; a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER; an inveterate reader of all Liberal publications, and an ardent supporter of truth from whatever source it might be found. He attended the Watkins Convention in 1882; has been charmed with the wit and eloquence of Ingersoll, and, if possible, made more sanguin by the logic of Chainey. His decalog, abridged, was:

> "Bound to no sect, and to no creed confined,
> My home the world, my brethren all mankind:
> Love, justice, do good, be kind to all,
> Support the truth, though every ism fall."

His prayer ineffable was, "Lord thou hast the power but not the will; I hav the will but not the power; let me importune thee to join thy power with my will and save poor fallen humanity." Peace to his remains, and happiness to those who survive him.

Passed to Spirit Life.

From Ottumwa, Iowa, Jan. 21, 1884, Mrs. Sarah Millisack, aged eighty-four years and seven months. She was born in Harrison county, Ohio. At twenty-one she married Jacob Millisack, and together, in those early days, they did valiant service in the anti-slavery cause. Henry C. Wright, Wendell Phillips, Abby Kelly, Parker Pillsbury, and many others, enjoyed the hospitality of her home. For a number of years she was a Methodist, but in the early days of Spiritualism, she, with her husband, became convinced of its truth, and in that belief she passed gently away, crowned with a life-time of good deeds. The funeral services were largely attended, Mr. W. F. Peck, Mrs. Nettie Fox, and Mrs. Lake officiating. The Liberal choir sang some very beautiful and impressiv songs, and in the light of the new philosophy of death the body of the arisen one was laid away. She leaves behind her life-long companion, and eight children, all zealous Liberal Spiritualists.

Letters from Friends.

AYER, MASS., Feb. 5, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received "The Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac for 1884," and consider the cost (25 cents) a very slight approximate to its real value. It is at once a treasury of thought—the best Freethought—of the age, and also of statistical reference on many important facts in history, not to be found elsewhere. I hazard nothing in saying no one will regret the possession of it, or willingly part with it. Please mail one to each of the four names inclosed. E. MYRICK.

WHEELING, W. VA., Jan. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed a synopsis of a speech or lecture delivered in this city on the 147th anniversary of the death of Thomas Paine by Major J. J. Folley, of New Orleans, La. Previous to this, Mr. S. Hutchings and myself had about completed arrangements for a private celebration, But, upon learning soon after that Mr. Foley was going to occupy the rostrum on the same evening, and with better results, perhaps, we gave up the idea, and repaired to the synagog of Freethought. Ice has been broken here, in this neck of God's moral vinyard, and if the god of reason still sits supreme a little while longer—say a year—a Liberal League may be the result of this one night's labor in Freethought. Hoping that the Liberals hav everywhere met and given thanks that God created such a noble soul as Thomas Paine, I subscribe myself, as ever, the foe of mental despotism. OCTAVIUS J. BROSIUS.

CUMMINGS, ILL., Feb. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me the space in which to say a few words in regard to the now defunct Gunnison and Uncompahgre Colonization Society, which was to found a Liberal colony near Delta, Col.

Last spring I was induced—by letters and circulars received—to join, and paid $25 membership fee, and went out to the place where the colony was to locate. Shortly after I arrived I found that the Gunnison and Uncompahgre Colonization Society was defunct, and that I had not received—and was not likely to—any benefits for the money paid into the society. So I concluded that it was no more than just and fair that my money should be refunded to me. Since then I hav written twice to the president of the society, A. W. Smith, of Denver, in regard to refunding the money, but he was not manly enough to even answer my letter. If Smith is not a fraud he has acted very much like one in the colony scheme.

In conclusion, I will say that those parties of whom the society was composed may succeed in keeping the $25 they received from me, but they can rest assured that I shall not keep silent in regard to the matter until their acts are duly exposed.

C. BURSEE.

PRESCOTT, IOWA, Jan. 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, which you will dispose of as per accompanying order.

The books which you sent arrived in due time in good shape, and are highly satisfactory. I already hav Paine's works loaned out (which, by the way, is the second volume of his works which I hav sowing the good seed in this neighborhood), and hav scattered Remsburg's "False Claims" broadcast, and the tracts and leaflets which I order by this shall be used the same way.

The religionists are holding a series of meetings in our schoolhouse. I liv in the country, and am only a boy, and I hav been arraigned for disseminating Infidel literature. One of the leading saints said I was a "pretty good boy if it was not for my belief, and that is not so bad if I would keep it still." Another one asserted, "He sows more seeds of Infidelity in a month than the preacher can uproot in a year"—and thus I ever intend to be. Last night I challenged the preacher to a discussion on the merits of Infidel literature, but he would not giv me a definit answer. I hope you will fill my orders as soon as possible, as I want the tracts to distribute while the revival is going on.

My best wishes to you and THE TRUTH SEEKER fraternity, and long may you liv to combat priestcraft and superstition. JOHN W. YEADON.

SPRING FORGE, Jan. 31, 284.

MR. EDITOR: For the $1 you will please to send "Age of Reason," cloth, and Colonel Ingersoll's "What Must We Do to be Saved?" and last, but not least, a copy of "The Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac for 1884."

I see you published two of my letters; receive my thanks for it. Ever since the publication of the first letter in issue of January 19th I receive almost daily sample copies of Liberal papers. I also received a prospectus of Mr. Truesdell's "Bottom Facts," which I left to an old Spiritualist in York, previously a subscriber for a Spiritualistic paper. I had also a letter from a Mr. Lighty, of Mulberry, this county, a subscriber for your paper, who obviously was surprised not to find my name in Green's Directory. As I only received an invitation to membership of the New York State Freethinkers' Association last week —moreover, as I first got acquainted with American Spiritualism, Liberalism, and Freethought shortly before my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER—I could not yet be inserted in any of the Freethinkers' lists and directories of this country; but I shall hasten to return the application for membership this very day with my own and another old antichrist's signature; he is reading THE TRUTH SEEKER with me.

There is some occult Liberalism, even in this part of the world. There are our barber and many others depending on their Christian neighbors, who are afraid to confess; nevertheless, through them I received the addresses of two outspoken Infidels, whom I will probably visit, when health and weather get more favorable. Yours, F. W. OPP.

BELLECENTRE, O., Feb. 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I find on page 23 of your issue of Jan. 12th a column headed "Liberty and Prohibition," in which the writer, W. F. Jamieson, opens out with a grievance inflicted on him by one E. C. Walker, said grievance consisting of "illogical remarks," "ungenerous flings," "reckless and cruel charges." I am somewhat surprised that one so great —"for I thought he was invulnerable"—should feel annoyed at receiving pay in his own coin, for I don't know anyone more liberal than W. F. Jamieson in despotic, arrogant, and dogmatic flings — in fact, in this sense alone can he be considered a Liberal, for I hold it utterly impossible for anyone to be at the same time a Prohibitionist and a Liberal. My humble opinion, "which you need not consider," is that W. F. Jamieson is used up, regularly cornered, on the question of prohibition, as must every other one be who attempts to defend it. I would advise W. F. Jamieson and his class to turn their attention to the perpetual motion machine; that finished, they might again turn their hand to Prohibition, for the one seems as likely to be brought about as the other. Personally I am in favor of temperance—temperance in all things. Not that I hav a very high opinion of the author of that sentiment, who was all things to all men. I consider there is a wide difference between prohibition and temperance. Prohibition savors of tyranny and coercion, and coming from a class who profess to hav the happiness of the human family at heart, appears to me a strange mode of procedure, making people happy by taking away their liberties, coercing them into subjection, bullying them into devotion. It is not desirable to the majority of the people, but only to a few petrified specimens of some prehistoric age, who hav more vanity than discretion—in fact, a few bigots and tyrants who wish to rule the people in a way just to suit their own fancy. I hav known many Prohibitionists, but hav not yet found any who possess a shadow of benevolence. They hav all been a covetous, selfish, narrow-minded set of skinflints. They are chiefly antiquated church-members, and are actuated more by envy than by pity. They lack sincerity; it is not the morality nor the comfort of the people they consider; "no, they would sooner commit suicide than do anybody good," but they hav only the desire to rule them. It puzzles me to understand how men like W. F. Jamieson, whose avowed object is to destroy or weaken church influence, can truckle to its interests. This also savors of insincerity, and looks like a political trick to catch votes. It seems to me the Prohibitionists are on the wrong track. Why not apply to their savior? He once turned water into wine, and surely he could turn whisky into water; but they must instruct him not to meddle with what is in bond; let the distillers pay the duty first. That's the way to abuse Prohibition. That will settle the liquor trade; and I can not think of anything else that will.

Yours respectfully, WM. PAULUCCI.

ROCHESTER, MICH., Feb. 4, 1884.

TO MRS. SLENKER, Dear Madam: In the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER I read, with a curious interest, your notice of Mr. Putnam's book. As you quote, Mr. Putnam says: "Mind is not substance: it is simply phenomena. We cannot make it identical with pure existence, for it has no independent life. We cannot conceive it as existing in itself. Mind is not matter, however subtil and ethereal. Neither is it an entity or thing." And so on, manipulating that one thought—mind has no existence independent of matter.

Then follow your remarks: "There it is, my friends; all the problems of mind and matter solved in a few axiomatic sentences," etc., which read to me wondrously like an intended satire. If you had only used the term *dog*matic instead of *axio*matic, I should hav felt sure of your meaning. In closing the paragraph, you say, "I don't see how theologians or Spiritualists can reconcile the facts [italics mine] of this simple essay with their ideas of life beyond the spheres."

In reference to your kind invitation to "rise and explain," although not yet claiming to be a distinctiv Spiritualist, let me refer you to some things that transpired in my own family in this village in October last. I am sure I know them to be facts, whether Mr. Putnam's theories all are or not.

From my TRUTH SEEKER reading, I rather suspect you consider that Mr. J. W. Truesdell, of Syracuse, N. Y., has settled the subject of independent slate writing. I ordered and read what he chose to designate "Bottom Facts," and found the title a misnomer.

At the time above mentioned, in a well-lighted room, about mid-day, in presence of my wife and self —along in our sixties, but with our senses of perception (allowing us to be judges) yet in good running order; a son of thirty-five years, a merchant here, and rated a shrewd business man, and an avowed skeptic in Spiritualism; and a Mr. W. A. Mansfield, medium; a boy, you may say, of twenty years of age, brought up on a farm near Grand Rapids, in this state—a sincere, unsuspecting, honest, simple-hearted young man—there was independent slate-writing, and no trick, sleight-of-hand, fraud, or any such thing. There was, independent of human hands, an intelligent answer written upon the upper side of the lower of two clean slates while placed together, to one of a number of questions previously penciled on small strips of paper and rolled into pellets and placed on the table in the absence of the medium.

That one question he apparently picked up haphazard, placed between those slates, and the writing was done while they lay on top of the table, and a hand of each of us four resting on each slate corner. Such writing was done at different times between those slates with and without pencil, while lying on the table, or in other positions before our eyes; once while I held the slates back six feet or more away from the medium. There were the names of our dead friends signed to those answers. Of those names Mr. Mansfield knew nothing. One was of my lost boy, who died before Mr. Mansfield was born. Nor could he hav learned had he at any time while with us slipped into another room, a la Truesdell, and rummaged in our coat pockets. We had also a number of evening sittings, only one of which I shall hav time and room to giv you here an outline of. It was a dark seance (hold on, now!). There were eight persons present—four of our near neighbors, and three of our own family and Mr. Mansfield. Two or three were believers, the others inquirers. We all sat in a circle, so close that our chairs all touched each other, and all joined hands, my skeptical son holding Mr. Mansfield's right hand or wrist, and a level-headed lady at my right holding the medium's left hand. After some ten minutes, the medium seemed to go into a trance, and remained so for eighty minutes or more. My son remarked a number of times that he could feel no pulse in Mr. Mansfield's wrist, and he breathed so heavily that we could all hear it distinctly, as though in a deep sleep. During this time there were unmistakable evidences of the presence of an intelligence or intelligences independent of the circle—hands, that could not hav belonged to any of the sitters, would gently pat our hands, heads, and faces. At our son's request, some independent hand took out his pocketbook, shook out the papers and change, that were heard fall, rolled up some bank bills and crowded them between the owner's fingers, and finally, per request, gathered up the contents to where they belonged, and placed the book in his pocket again. His watch, a stem-winder, was taken out, wound up, passed around the circle, and put back again. A light-stand was brought from the farther corner of the room, over our heads, and placed in our circle by some unknown intelligent force (N.B.—A secret accomplice is out of the question), and there tipped over and about, as requested. The lady at my right, as she says, mentally requested this something to unfasten her necktie and carry it across the circle to her husband. It was immediately done. Books were brought from a table, and a panel picture from the organ, that were not asked for nor thought of by any one of those present. I might go on with this narration to still greater length, and not tell near all that transpired in those circles. But I must hasten to a close.

Mrs. Slenker, this is the point I am after. We in that room during those evenings and intervening days had evidence clear and unmistakable that there were intelligences about us that were not of us. I do not swear that they were absolutely those of our dead friends. Nevertheless, there were those manifestations of intelligence, and no human bodies attached. I am well aware that this I hav related is no new or strange thing. Our country is full of it. No doubt, more or less fraud is practiced under the name of Spiritualism. Whenever it is self-confessed all must allow it. But the fraud theory will not explain all the facts, and the effort to make it do so calls for a resort to paltry subterfuges.

When our Materialistic friends will take heart to examin these various phenomena, learn and publish to the world their import, then some things may be settled. Until then Winter's ipse dixit, Wakeman's long-drawn inferences, and Putnam's poetic postulates will not do the work of convincing the world. Such ghosts will not down at such bidding.

C. H. GREENE.

BURTON, TEX., Jan. 23, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2.50 to pay my fare on board our stanch passenger packet, which is sailing so proudly to the kingdom. If she could only cruise around more in the waters of the old Zion craft, I think her superior accommodations would entice passengers to come over, but knowing this, the old, unworthy hulk steers clear, and warns her deluded tribe to look not on, even, such su picious sails, lest they become contaminated. But people cannot always be kept in subjection. A desire to change the old threadbare fables for truth and scientific facts will now and then seize one and another, until the old ship will finally be deserted, and our fleet will take the fort.

I venture to occasionally slip a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER into the orthodox camp, but always at great risk of the flames—for vengeance is declared thereon should it happen to fall into the hands of the lady of the household; hence I am accused of doing much harm hereabouts, as some of the devout brethren hav begun to "cuss," and are not so regular in their attendance at church—all of which are signs of improvement.

Hoping you will excuse me for so long neglecting the duty of remitting my fare, I remain

Truly yours, H. B. JONES.

CRABORCHARD, Jan. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 to apply on subscription for your welcome paper, as it is my first choice among all papers in existence, and has been from the first number issued in Illinois by that ever-faithful friend of liberty, D. M. Bennett. It is wonderful what inroads the principles taught by the good old hero hav made in so short a time. What may we not expect in the future, if Liberals prove faithful to their trust.

I would be glad to hav a few of the pamphlets of Remsburg's great lecture, to distribute around in these parts. I think they would do some good here, as the bigots are somewhat quiet just now. I am getting somewhat old—nearly 69—and am almost blind. I will now close for the present.

Yours as ever, B. F. STONE.

LOCUST GROVE, PA., Jan. 19, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as that amount will pay for it. I hav read several copies of your paper. I hav thought seriously of its claims as a journal of reform. The result is that I wish to become a regular subscriber. It is perhaps a little in advance of our age—it is certainly far in advance of a great majority of our people; still I think the people need just such literature as your paper supplies. I am engaged in teaching the only school in this little town. I take several papers and journals, but my list would be incomplete without THE TRUTH SEEKER, for I am a Freethinker—just what it seems to me that every true man should be.

With best wishes for the permanent success of the sensible, witty, brilliant TRUTH SEEKER, I remain

Yours, OSCAR PARKER.

MATTAPOISETT, MASS., Jan. 19, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. I like the raper very much; it knocks this Bible I hav had for the last forty years higher than a kite. I am in hopes the time is not far distant when it will knock it out of existence. I want the world to know that I am ar Infidel, and if I hav to go to hell on account of being so ignorant—if it is ignorance—I shall find the class of people there that I should want to find. If I wanted assistance to-day it would be the Infidels I should look to, as I take them to be the most honorable people in existence. If I am wrong I would like to be righted. But it will take something besides church lies to do it, as I think more of one Infidel truth then I do of a thousand church lies.

BENJ. F. DEXTER.

SEDALIA, MO., Jan. 28, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent has been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER since September, 1878. He was somewhat fearful that the death of its founder would result in the death of the paper, but he cheerfully indorses the opinion of its contributors, that THE TRUTH SEEKER has improved under the present management to a considerable extent. The diversified character and scope of its contributions make the paper a continual feast. May its light never know any waning.

There are many forms of evil that afflict humanity, and reformers are generally specialists; each one singles out one form of evil, and claims that it is the parent evil. Thus THE TRUTH SEEKER claims that superstition is the parent evil. Another, that land monopoly is the monster curse. Another, that too many hours of daily labor to which the toiler is subjected is the all-devouring fiend. Another, that the use of alcoholic stimulants as a beverage is the hydra-headed destroyer. Another, that usury, rent, and profit are the boss thieves in the mill, etc., and your correspondent claims that all these forms of evil hav a common parentage. They are the legitimate offspring of the competitiv system on which present society is based. Throttle this fiend, and you dry up the source of these evils. Pruning will only giv temporary relief. We must lay the ax at the root of the tree that bears the bitter fruit. THE TRUTH SEEKER'S mission is to educate the masses for the rapidly approaching revolution that is to rid this country at least of the presence of this devouring curse. Then we will lay the foundation of the new temple on the rock of the brotherhood of humanity.

Yours in the brotherhood of Freethought, free land, short hours of toil, prohibition, and against usury, rent, and profit, N. T. R.

KEOTA, IA., Jan. 18, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: I liv five miles from town, confined to the house with ill health most of my time; and although I mail all my. TRUTH SEEKERS to Liberal friends, I fear I did not gain a permanent subscriber yet (three failing harvests causing a scarcity of money in southeastern Iowa). Divide the inclosed $5 as follows: One year's subscription, $3, from Jan. 1. 1884; 25 cents for "The Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac for 1884;" 75 cents for one dozen of Remsburg's "False Claims," and the remaining $1 you will please to send to our old veteran, J. Hacker, for the pearls of thought handed to us by his contributions to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I am not so enthusiastic as many of your readers to see multitudes of Freethinkers on all the corners and cross-roads. We may yet, as to numbers, fight in the shade of the spears of Jehovah's hosts. We can and do conquer them by argument, but not by counting votes; therefore we should not establish the rule that majorities may interfere with the habits of the minorities, for that opens the road down whence we hav come—roasting heretics and burning witches. We should not double the hosts of Rome by degrading woman to trudge to the ballot-box. Our gain would only be a few and better, but the hosts of Rome, by dictate of the priesthood, do multiply like sand. Yours truly, CHAS. NAUMANN.

GARY, DAKOTA, Jan. 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 for trial subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER; names as in accompanying note.

Gary is a town of about three hundred inhabitants, just across the Minnnesta line. There are some Liberals in town, and quite a number in the country, but not many take Liberal papers, which, of course, is deplorable. But all those who hav received a sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER seem to be well pleased with it. I hope many of them will become actual subscribers; we need a little stirring up here just now, as the God's people of this town hav got to fighting. Last Sunday some of the leading members of the Presbyterian church locked out their minister. One of the members is said to hav remarked that, "if the preacher would hav forced his way in, he would hav kicked him out." The church is a new one, and is not yet dedicated. They quarreled the first Sunday the preacher occupied the pulpit, and hav kept it up ever since. It seems that a certain party, who has contributed the most toward the church, tries to run it; hence the trouble. The Methodists hav also commenced building a church; look out for more fur a-flying.

Fight on, ye ranting hypocrits, and show the world your true inwardness. While you are fooling away your money building God-houses, you are letting your fellow-man suffer in ignorance and want. Oh, how long will you keep up that delusion? Nine-tenths of you do not believe what you pretend to, nor what you preach. But the time will soon come when your rotten system will be exposed and you will hav to be ashamed that you had neither the courage nor the honesty to express your honest convictions. P. J. UMBRITE.

BELPRE, O., Jan. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It would giv me much more pleasure to send you this letter could I inclose what I owe you for reading the dear TRUTH SEEKER since October, 1881, but this pleasure, like a thousand or more others, I am denied—at least at the present time. I was in hope that I would be able to pay up, for at least one year's subscription, but since the establishment in which I was employed burnt down on the 4th of this month I am without any support, left out again; and with a family of eleven heads, destitute of all necessities of life, I feel as if I had got to the end of the road and could neither go ahead nor turn back to escape starvation, or, what is worse, the disgrace of receiving bread from the hands of the agents of Jesus Christ & Co., who hav already made charitable offers to my family; and, providing I am willing to giv up mental liberty for a bundle of old clothes, my landlord will let me remain in his house another month. My profession would pay better than day-labor, could I but get out among a people who are not so much prejudiced against Infidel music-teachers. I find there are some among the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER engaged in publishing and selling music or musical instruments, and I would be glad if I could get acquainted with some of these, for I might serve in a great many different ways in that line of business, and might get employment. I hav compositions to publish, can arrange music for almost any instrument, piano, organ, brass or string bands, tuning and regulating pianos and other instruments, as well as playing the piano, violin, and clarionet. This does not pay any better than teaching here in this place, where we hav a surplus of cheap female teachers within the folds of the church, and the professional teacher is expected to work more for Christ's sake than for the furtherance of the beautiful art of music. Concluding, I will say that I will try to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope you will not stop it—at least for the next three months.

Yours with gratefulness, J. G. KUHN.

[The story of Mr. Kuhn is a sad one. THE TRUTH SEEKER shall not stop; it will supply him with mental food; and we hope some of our readers will know of employment whereby he can earn enough to supply himself and family with physical necessities, and not be compelled to sell his soul for clothes and food. It is to be regretted that Freethought is yet so young that it has no organized societies of relief. There is such a thing as helping a man without dishonoring him. It must be the work of Infidels to do this. The churches hold out a loaf in one hand and a text in the other. By swallowing the text he is allowed to hav a mouthful of the loaf. Help, and not charity, must be extended.—ED. T. S.]

LIBERAL, MO., Jan. 22, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I hav given a course of three lectures at Fort Scott, Kansas, the last one on Sunday night. The first two lectures were well attended, the body of the court-house being comfortably filled. On Sunday night a large number came, although the several churches hav held special meetings to bring the unconverted into a saved condition. Owing to some unavoidable delay in getting the hall opened and lighted, over a hundred persons came and left. It was announced that the lecture would commence early, and that those who desired seats should come early. Although such a number left, the court-house was filled, and for the hour and forty-five minutes that I spoke they gave the best attention. The subject was, "Why Do Freethinkers Reject the Bible?" As is generally the case, the Christian ministers gave a little of their animosity, and disparaged the cause and character of Liberalism.

E. N. McComas, J. and L. Farnsworth, F. M. Baker, and M. S. Fox are some of the leading Liberals of this town. Gov. McComas was for some years editor of the Chicago Times, and is the author of "The Divine Problem," an abstruse metaphysical work, or criticism of Prof. Tyndall and Herbert Spencer's position. Whether the work be a solution of the divine problem or not, it exhibits a far-seeing, penetrating, logical mind.

I shall probably giv a lecture here on Paine on the 29th inst. There seems to be a great need of activ Liberal work here, and the people are getting more and more desirous of it.

I wish to say to the Leagues and different organizations throughout the country, that being in the lecture field, I am willing to respond to all calls for lectures. Write for terms. J. L. ANDREW.

WINTER PARK, FLORIDA, Feb. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1, for which please send four copies of your "Truth Seeker Annual." Please accept my thanks for the four copies you sent me of the Mitchell-Wakeman debate. I will distribute them where I hope they will do some good. Very little Freethought, or, rather, free action, in this vicinity. The churches here are social institutions, or clubs, and unless one goes occasionally at least, he will lose caste. My nearest neighbor is not orthodox by a good deal, and thinks much as I do; yet he is a vestry man of the Episcopal church and takes an activ part. He is of that class alluded to by the late lamented John W. Draper, known as involuntary hypocrits. There is also another class of voluntary hypocrits, who are governed by policy. I hav another neighbor, educated and well read, who is not rated as belonging to either of the above classes; he is a disciple of the ancient philosopher, Lucretius, and does not keep much account of church-going. I hav read most of the lectures of Col. Ingersoll and his other writings, but am free to say, in my humble judgment, that his "Analysis of Orthodox Belief," as seen in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is the most logical, convincing, and conclusiv document I ever read among the thousand and one articles on the same subject. Were I a millionaire, I would hav millions of copies printed and spread broadcast over the whole country.

The misfortune is that it is written by Col. Ingersoll. There are many persons who would throw it aside without reading as soon as they saw his name as the author. Such is the force of bigotry and prejudice.

Well may the churches, both Protestant and Catholic, be alarmed at the progress of Freethought and common sense; but if the former should join hands with the Catholics, thousands will at once leave their ranks and come to us, or will show at least a strong leaning in that direction. The fact is, it is now too late—too much Freethought literature spreading over the country. The only feasible, practical plan is to modify, readjust, and reconstruct the whole system of theology.

It has occurred to me that if any one of the large Protestant organizations were to convene and remodel and readjust their whole system on a Rationalistic plan, they would soon hav a very large following of the best class of humanity. Humanity must hav something to replace the old effete beliefs. They must hav church or lecture organizations. Organization is the word that has practical, efficient power in it; and if Liberalism is to be a success, organization is the thing to make and perpetuate it. But, by all means, I trust it will never merge into a miserable political party; the tail end it would be all the time. Beg pardon for boring you with my crude thoughts.

May THE TRUTH SEEKER long liv, and perform well its mission, is the earnest wish of Yours respectfully, NELSON BEALL.

The Little Glass Shoe.

"Ho! ho! ha! ha! what is it I view?"
John Wild, the ploughman, cried,
As he hit his foot on a little glass shoe
That lay on the mountain side;
"Some fay has lost it, there's never a doubt,
And ah! how lucky for me,
The owner will soon be roaming about
To find where his shoe may be.
And so (said John) I'll carry it home,
That's just what I will do,
And he will pay me a pretty sum,
Who buys this little glass shoe!"
And he spread the story far and near,
For many a mile around,
That the fairy folk might surely hear
Who the little glass shoe had found.
And soon to John a merchant came,
Who said he had heard the news;
And would the ploughman sell the same
To a dealer in little glass shoes?
And he offered John a pretty price
For the shoe that he had found;
But John replied it was much too nice
To go for a hundred pound;
Then the merchant offered a hundred more,
But the ploughman still said, "Nay;
The man who buys my shoe (he swore)
Will dearly hav to pay.
There's not so pretty a shoe on earth
To cover a lady's toes;
And then I happen to know its worth
Far better than you suppose.
The shoe is one of wondrous price
(That nobody can deny),
And yet, perchance, there's some device
May serve the shoe to buy.
If you are able to show me, now,
When I am ploughing my field.
That every furrow behind my plow
A shining ducat may yield—
Why, then, to you the shoe I'll giv,
Else I will keep it myself—
For an ornament, as long as I liv,
To grace my mantel-shelf!"
And so it was the fairy bought
('Twas he in merchant's guise!)
His own glass shoe, and quick as thought,
Away to his home he hies.
And off went John, with much delight,
As fast as he could go,
By trial to prove that very night
If the charm would work or no.
And he found the fairy's word as true
As he promised in the trade;
For a shining ducat came to view
In every furrow he made!
And again next morning off he went—
Nor scarce to eat could stop—
To plough again—he was so intent
To gather his golden crop.
And so he ploughed, and ploughed, and ploughed
And scarce for slumber ceased;
No wonder John was growing proud,
So fast his wealth increased!
And still he ploughed by day and night,
When none were looking on,
Till he seemed, indeed, a sorrow wight,
He grew so lean and wan!
And still when none his work might view,
He ploughed by night and day.
And still the more his riches grew,
The more he pined away.
Until, at last his work was stopped,
And the ploughman, where was he?
Down in the furrow, alas! he dropped,
As dead as dead could be!—
Though good is gold to hav and to hold,
My story makes it clear,
Who sells himself for sordid pelf,
Has bought it much too dear!

Meddlesome Molly.

"Oh, I smell buckwheat cakes! Fry me one—do! I just dote on buckwheats! I want a good big one!

Molly White uttered these words as she bounded into Mrs. Kingsley's well-kept kitchen, where that good lady was engaged frying buckwheat cakes for breakfast.

"Havn't you been to breakfast, Molly?" inquired Mrs. Kingsley.

"Why, yes; but I didn't hav buckwheat cakes. Never mind about sending it into the dining-room; I'll eat it right here. Where's the butter? Got any molasses? Some like maple syrup, but for me, just plaster on the butter, and then sop it with molasses, and I don't ask anything better."

In helping herself to butter and molasses, Molly upset a pepper-sauce bottle, and came near breaking it; knocked over a pitcher of milk and spilled it; and in drawing molasses tilted the jug so far that its contents ran in a small puddle on the buttery floor before she saw what mischief she was doing. Mrs. Kingsley looked distressed, but as she did not wish to reprove a neighbor's daughter said nothing.

"There! that was what I call good. Do you hav 'em every morning? because if you do I'll come and eat breakfast with you."

Mrs. Kingsley made no reply, while Molly wiped her sticky fingers on her apron, and ran into the dining-room, exclaiming,

"If you havn't got the table-cloth on the wrong side! Well, we do so sometimes; when it gets dirty on the right side clap it on the wrong side, and 'twill go a couple of weeks longer, if you're careful! O my! what's this?—a new book of prints! What pretty pictures!" and she commenced turning the leaves with her molasses-daubed fingers, leaving a stain on every page. "Where's Carrie? Car-o-line! Where are you? Hoot!"

Away through the rooms she went, and up stairs to Carrie's sleeping-room, where that young lady was engaged making her bed. Carrie was Mrs. Kingsley's daughter

"Oh, I hope you don't make your bed every morning regular. I don't"

"What do you do with your bed?" asked Carrie.

"Just spread it up—so! shake up the pillows, and let it go at that. What's the use to be so fussy? Whose room is that across the entry?"

"Father and mother sleep there."

"I'm going in there; why, this bed is all nicely made, too. Whose new boots in the clothes-press, here?"

"My father's," answered Carrie, with a sigh.

"I'm going to try them on," and she slipped her feet into Mr. Kingsley's boots, and then stood up on a trunk to look on a shelf. "What's in this box here? O goodness, gracious! look at the gloves, and the velvet what-d'ye-call it, and the spangles, and the gold fringe! And here's a hat, and, oh, what a long feather! There! Why don't you put that on your winter hat, Carrie? And here's a sword! What is all this toggery, anyhow? Was your father ever a soldier?"

"Oh, I wish you would put the things back," said Carrie. "If you must know, my father is a Mason, and belongs to a commandery, and that is his suit. I wish you'd let it alone."

"Oh, ho! That's the secret of Masonry, is it? Spangles and feathers, swords and gauntlet gloves! I'm glad I found it out. You needn't be so short, though; we can never be Masons. What's in this other box?" and she hastily pulled off the cover.

"Oh, don't touch that—don't," pleaded Carrie.

"Why not? I guess there isn't anything in it to bite me?"

"No, no; but my little brother Charley's playthings are in there."

"What, the one that died ever so long ago? Oh, well, I won't trouble it—don't fret."

She jumped down and kicked off Mr. Kingsley's boots, to the great relief of Carrie, and followed her out of the room.

"Oh, this is Tom's jungle, I know," said Molly, pausing on the threshold of another room. "Look at the pictures he has tacked all over the walls—pirates, bicycles, sleds, Indians, horses, monkeys, and things—just like a boy, for all this world! Box of blacking and shoe-brush on the bed, bootjack behind the door, and a pair of skates in the middle of the floor! What's this writing I I'm going to read it."

"Please, don't. Tom won't like it."

"Don't you read his higgledy-piggledy papers?" pulling out a table drawer.

"No, indeed; not without leave. It wouldn't be proper. Papa says we should not meddle with each other's affairs, unless invited to do so. We wouldn't like anybody to interfere with our concerns, and that which we would not like done to ourselvs we should be sure and never do."

"All nonsense, Carrie. Here's Tom's penknife—ivory handle. I guess I'll sharpen my pencil, and I shall read this paper sure as you're born. I'm glad I havn't any old-fashioned fiddlestick notions." But in reaching for the manuscript, she swept the ink-bottle off the desk, and upset the contents on the carpet.

"O dear! Dreadful sorry! Couldn't help it, though! Hark! Is that Tom coming? I guess I'll go now. Good-by. Come over. Don't tell Tom who did it." And away the giddy girl went, much to the relief of Carrie, whose ways being quiet and gentle, was always anxious when Molly was about, lest, in her meddling, she should do mischief.

Molly meant well enough, but she was so meddlesome that nearly everybody disliked her. She would go into a neighbor's house, her eyes roving around the room, trying to see something to meddle with. "Hello,' she would say, "where did you get this? What did it cost? I don't see how you can afford it. If left alone a moment, she would open doors, and peer into every closet, cupboard, cellarway, or chamber. One day she went into Mrs. Jones's house just as that lady placed something on an upper shelf in the pantry. A caller was announced, and Mrs. Jones excused herself before Molly had time to ask what it was she had placed on the upper shelf. But Mrs. Jones had no sooner left the room than Molly determined to know for herself. She darted into the pantry with a chair, upon which she mounted. "What's this?" said she, taking the stopper from a bottle. "Jamaica ginger! And here's some mutton tallow!—and goose grease for sore throat!—and bay rum—I'll wet my handkerchief—I like to smell it! And St. Jacob's Oil! pah!—they hav everything handy, though. But there's the stone pot she put there. I shouldn't wonder if it's full of citron, melon, or peaches!" And standing on tiptoe, she grasped with both hands the stone pot, and at the same time lost her balance, fell over backwards, dishes, St. Jacob's Oil, a bottle of alcohol, essences, pie plates, a soup dish, tin pans, and the stone pot and contents all falling upon her. The terrible commotion brought Mrs. Jones and her caller to the scene, which they viewed in great consternation. The stone pot did not contain preserves or sweetmeats, but simply some melted beef suet that Mrs. Jones had put away to cool. Luckily for Molly, it was not hot, or she might hav been badly scalded. As it was, her face, neck, and hair, were all saturated with the grease; besides, her dress was ruined by it.

This affair was quite a lesson, and, you would hav thought, must hav cured her meddlesome habits. Nobody was sorry, but all said, "It served her right: she should not hav been meddling with other people's business."

For some time after she seemed quite subdued, but the following summer her old habits revived again, and she went on just as badly as before. One day she discovered a hornet's nest in an old shed. She examined it from every side, and she wanted very much to see, she said, the inside of a hornet's house. Tom Kingley told her not to meddle with the hornets' nest, for if she did she would surely get hurt.

"Tom Kingsley is a coward," she said inwardly. "I'm not afraid of getting hurt." Her father and mother both told her to let the hornets' nest alone, but she paid no attention to their counsel, and, watching an opportunity, when no hornets, as she could discover, were about, she seized a two-tined, long-handled pitchfork, and went for the nest.

"I want to see how it is fixed inside, said she, laughing to herself. "The hornets are all out neighboring, and now for some fun!"

Another moment and the hornets' house was on the end of the pitchfork, and Molly—luckless, frightened, meddlesome Molly—was running toward the house, screaming and screeching, pursued by more than a hundred mad hornets—for they were all in the nest at the time of the attack. They covered her face, her ears, her eyes, her neck, her hands—in fact, they were all over her, in her sleeves, in her slippers, and everywhere they touched they stung. They followed her right into the house, and Oh, how mad those hornets were! They would hav killed her on the spot if they could, and they undoubtedly would if her mother had not come to the rescue; for their rights had been invaded, their house torn down, and their children turned homeless into the street, and for the time all they thought of was revenge.

Poor Mollie was a sight to behold for many a day afterward. She could not open her eyes, and her nose was swollen to three times its natural size—and it was a good-sized nose originally. The hornets had stung her fearfully, and a physician had to be called to allay the dreadful pain and smart.

But it cured Molly of her meddlesome tricks. It was a painful and severe lesson, but an effectual one, for never again did she meddle with what did not concern her. From that time on, she was a good, well-behaved girl, and won the respect and admiration of all who noted the great change in her conduct. Mrs. Jones, who never forgot the melted suet affair, said meddlesome people did not always get into a swarm of hornets, yet it was a pity they didn't, but she had remarked it that they usually came to grief in one way or another; and whenever she heard of anyone meddling with other people's business she would be sure to tell the story of Meddlesome Molly and the hornets' nest.

Correspondence.

PAWTUCKET, R. I., Jan. 30, 1884.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: Father says I may write to you, and I take the first opportunity. I have read "Apples of Gold," and I feel almost well acquainted with you. I like "Uncle Stevenson," in your book, so much, and I like all the good characters in it, and the naughty ones are only to show how bad is evil. I hav not had the chance some girls hav to get an education, except in music, and they say I excel in that. I play the violin and piano. But I shall try to educate myself in reading and writing, in which I am deficient. Mother says I am very well advanced in arithmetic. I am in compound fractions. Perhaps I am writing too long a letter. Father says, if I write too long, you will not hav time to answer, for you are always busy; so I will say good-bye at once, hoping that this will find you well, and that you will answer when convenient. With grateful admiration, I am always,

Your loving friend, ETTA ——.

Poetry.

Question.

BY MRS. A. W. LAKE.

Why did God make the devil
To run opposition to him?
Surely an all-wise being
Must know that his snakeship would win.
The road to his realm is much broader,
And far more attractiv, 'tis said;
Then isn't it a foregone conclusion
That the devil must come out ahead?
He marched right into the garden
And said, Ye shall not surely die.
They ate of the fruit, and behold, it
Proved just as he said—'twas no lie.
Then God said, Lo, man is becoming
Like us, to know good and evil,
We will send him straight out of the garden,
And leave him to go to the devil.
O infinit wisdom and mercy
Did plan for us wisely and well;
Set a trap for his child to get into,
Then for getting in, doomed him to hell.
Shall we praise his name for such mercy?
Such wisdom we can't comprehend;
The beginning of things we can't find out,
And who can tell what is the end?

Union Convention of Spiritualists and Liberalists.

The officers of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists, and of the Nemoka Spiritualist Camp Meeting Association, hav, upon, full consideration of the subject, deemed it advisable to join in a call for a Union Conference and Convention, to be held at Lansing on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, February 28 and 29, and March, 1, 1884. The object of the meeting may be stated generally to be the discussion of subjects affecting the cause of Spiritualism and Freethought, and to take some order that will secure more united and concurrent action. Among the topics more specifically suggested for discussion are the following:

1. The Spiritual Philosophy, and the best method of inculcating and advancing it. This will involve the discussion of: (a) Mediumship and the Phenomena; (b) Organic Work, Lectures, and Literature.

2. The Progress of Liberal Thought, and the Situation of Liberalism in the Country, especially as related to Organic Methods.

3. The Relation of Spiritualism and Liberalism in the State Work; is it desirable to continue them as recognized joint factors?

4. The Nemoka Interest, and the necessity for a Headquarters and Rallying Point for the Spiritual and Liberal Forces.

The topic suggested under the third subdivision, namely, the relation of Spiritualism and Liberalism in the state work, has elicited more or less outside debate, but has never been fully and fairly discussed at any responsible gathering.

While the officers who join in this call do so officially, the meeting itself will be unofficial, though advisory, and a cordial invitation is extended to all Spiritualists, Liberalists, and Freethinkers to attend and participate. It is noped to make the coming convention the largest that has ever been held in the state representing this class of thought.

It is known that a number of the friends of justice at Lowell hav brought suit to test the question of Bible Reading in the Public Schools. The coming meeting ought, not only by its numbers but its voice, to respond to this step in a way to strengthen the sinews of those who hav been bold enough to enter upon it.

The convention will be held at Mead's Hall, and will be called to order at two o'clock on Friday, February 28th. The leading speakers of the state will be in attendance.

The following officers of the two Associations will act as a joint Executiv Committee in charge of the convention: On behalf of the State Association S. and L.—the President, W. J. Cronk, the Secretary, S. B. McCracken, and Director, J. H. Burnham. On behalf of the Nemoka Association—the President, Dr. N. A. Dryer, the Secretary, Mrs. M. J. Mead, and Director, S. L. Shaw. The joint committee will meet at nine o'clock on the morning of February 28th, to transact any necessary business preliminary to the organization of the convention.

COMMITTEE FOR LOCAL ARRANGEMENTS.—Dr. N. A. Dryer, Dr. A. W. Edson, S. P. Buck, P. S. Olds, J. M. Potter, Mrs. Gertrude Merrill, Mrs. S. P. Buck, Mrs. P. S. Olds.

RAILWAY RATES.—Certificates for reduced railway rates may be had by addressing S. B. McCracken, Detroit, inclosing stamp.

On behalf of the State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists:

WALTER J. CRONK, President.
S. B. MCCRACKEN, Secretary.

On behalf of the Nemoka Spiritualist Camp Meeting Association:

S. L. SHAW,
Chairman Board of Directors.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances nder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intainsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

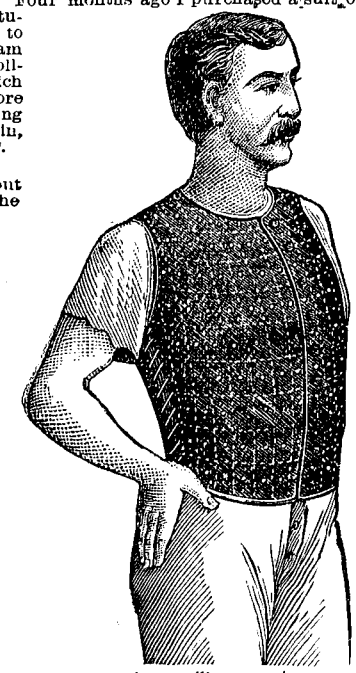
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Gems of Thought.

BE punctual in carrying out the contracts which you enter into, first giving due and careful consideration to the things you agree to perform. Blessed be the memoay of the man who honestly and faithfully performs what he agrees. Let the professors of false doctrins—those who boast of going to heaven upon the merits of another—hav the monopoly of forfeiting their word, and of taking little contemptible advantages in business trausactions; but as the disciples of truth, let me enjoin you not to act in that manner.—D. M. Bennett.

THOSE who allege that there is a distinct soul, which is to liv forever, should also explain whether or not this soul has always existed—i.e., whether my soul existed prior to the commencement and clearly traceable growth of my body?—and when, and for how long? If it did exist prior to my commencement in the world, how was it then identifiable as my soul? If prior to my body it was not so identifiable, how will it be identifiable after my body has ceased? If the soul existed prior to my body, had it always existed? If yes, do you mean that each soul is eternal? that no soul has ever begun to be? If you argue for the eternity of the soul, you deny God as universal creator; if you contend that soul commenced or was commenced, you should also admit that it may finish or be finished. If the soul existed prior to my body, had it been waiting inactiv but ready to occupy my body? And, if yes, when did the occupation commence? and was the soul always existing perfect and unimprovable? If, after vitalization, the unborn child dies, what becomes of the soul? and what is it in such a case that evidences that the particular soul had ever existed?—Bradlaugh.

IT is a profound, as well as a pleasing, view of ethical philosophy that led some of the wisest of moralists to define virtue to be "the living according to nature." They did not mean by this that it was virtue to liv the creature of instinct and passion, blindly following or giving way to any natural impulse or propensity that might be strongest at the moment, without looking forward to the future, or backward to the past, without reflection and without conscieuce. They deemed more justly of man. They regarded him as a complex being, who had numerous appetites, affections, and powers implanted in his breast, suited to the various relations and destinies that surround and await him. All these propensities and faculties hav their right and fitting use, and it is for the rational and spiritual part of his constitution to direct and restrain them to their proper and, therefore, natural euds.—Verplanck's Liberal Studies.

FEW, very few, there are who, even if their circumstances admitted it, can dispense with the wholesome yoke of a profession and yet liv to any good purpose. But, while fully acknowledging, not only the necessity, but the advantage of being harnessed to some regular profession, and that to succeed in this, the finest edge of faculty and the most accurate technical training must be sought, I still believe there is something more than this, and greater, which must never be lost sight of, if we desire to become, not mere useful machines or instruments, but complete men. The professional man who, over and above his professional duties and business relations, has learned to feel that he has other relations, wider and more permanent, with all his fellow-beings in all ages—that he is a debtor for all he has and is to a wider circle of things than that he comes in contact with—that he is an heir of all the great and good who hav lived before him—is not on that account a worse workman, and is certainly a higher and better man.—Principal Shairp's Culture and Religion.

THE soul admits of a twofold division, one of which partakes of reason, the other is without it; when, therefore, we are ordered to giv law to ourselvs, the meaning is, that reason should restrain our rashness. There is in the soul of every man something naturally soft, low, enervated in a manner, and languid. Were there nothiug besides this, man would be the greatest of monsters; but there is present to every man reason, which presides over and givs laws to all; which, by improving itself and making continual advauces, becomes perfect virtue. It behooves a man, then, to take care that reason shall hav the command over that part which is bound to practice obedience.—Cicero's Tusculan Disputations.

I BELIEVE that there is no tenet in all paganism which would giv so fair a scope to ridicule as that of the real presence; for it is so absurd that it eludes the force of all argument. There are even some pleasant stories of that kind which, though somewhat profane, are commonly told by the Catholics themselvs. One day a priest, it is said, gave inadvertently, instead of sacrament, a counter which had accidentally fallen among the holy wafers. The communicant waited patiently for some time, expecting that it would dissolve on his tongue; but finding that it still remained entire, he took it off. "I wish," cried he to the priest, "you hav not committed some mistake. I wish you hav not given me God the father; he is so hard and tough there is no swallowing him."—Hume's Natural History of Religion.

YET I argue not
Against heaven's hand or will, nor bate a jot
Of heart or hope; but still bear up and steer
Right onward. What supports me, durst thou ask?
The conscience, friend, to hav lost them overplied
In liberty's defense, my noble task,
Of which all Europe rings from side to side.
—Milton's Sonnets.

Odds and Ends.

AN Indian named "Man-Afraid-of-Nothing" married a white woman in Montana recently, and in one week after the wedding applied to his tribe to hav his name changed.

A FAMILY drama entitled "Abraham" would take well. Most every one would like to see old man Abraham hugging his comely servant Hagar in the kitchen while the old woman would be out marketing.

"WHAT'S the difference between an orange and a cabbage?" "I don't know," pleasantly answered the man. "You don't!" ejaculated the propounder of the inquiry. "You would be a devil of a man to send after oranges."

"MR. SMITH," said a witty lawyer to his landlord, a boarding-house keeper, "if a man were to giv you a hundred pounds to keep for him and he died, what would you do? Would you pray for him?" "No, sir," replied Mr. Smith, "I'd pray for another like him."

"MY son," said an old negro, "now dat you's outen de penitentiary, try tir keep out, an' arter dis doan steal, leastwise doan do like yer did befo', steal a par o' boots wat was too big fur yersef an' too little fur yer ole daddy. Ef yer kaint pick up suthin' dat'll do yer some good, be hones'."

THEY do things coolly down in Tennessee. It is said of a young lady that, nineteen years ago, her father refused to let her go to a candy-pull. She, however, dissappeared. The other day she returned, lifted eleven children out of a wagon, went into her father's house and took off her things as calmly as though she had only been absent an hour or two.

"I UNDERSTAND that De Wolf has left the Ann Street church." "No; is that so? Didn't he like the preaching?" "As far as I know he did." "Well, why did he leave, then?" "He givs no reason; but you know they hav raised their pew rents twenty-five per cent, and in view of the dull business outlook, and the reduction in wages, a man has got to scale down his religious expenses to a panic basis."

A MAN is very like a gun,
That fact please try to fix,
For if he finds he's charged too much,
Why, that's the time he kicks.
But still men differ much from guns,
As all experience teaches,
For men kick oddly with their boots,
While guns kick with their breeches.

"MAMMA," said a little girl. "is Mr. Barnum's white elephant a sacred animal?" "Yes, my dear. It is considered so in India." "And it will appear with his circus in Philadelphia next summer?" "Yes; I suppose so." "Oh, that's splendid!" the little girl exclaimed. "He will giv a Sunday afternoon exhibition, of course, and that will be ever so much more fun than going up to Laurel Hill to see grandfather's grave."

"YOU say the officer arrested you while you were quietly minding your own business?" "Yes, your honor. He caught me suddenly by the coat collar, and threatened to strike me with his club unless I accompanied him to the station-house." "You were quietly attending to your own business; making no noise or disturbance of any kind?" "None whatever sir." "It seems very strange. What is your business?" "I'm a burglar."

THE following is taken from the autograph album of a Nantucket girl: "I stood upon the sad seashore, and with a reed I wrote upon the sand, 'Agnes, I love thee!' A wave rolled by and washed that fair inscription out. O fragil reed! O cruel wave! O treacherous sand! No more I'll trust thee; with giant hand I'll pluck from Norway's frozen shore her tallest pine, and with its top dipped in the crater of Vesuvius, upon the high and burnished heavens I'll write, 'Agnes I love thee!' and I'd like to see any damned wave wash that out!"

"MY dear," said a Brooklyn man to his wife, after perusing the evening paper, "are you aware of the fact that a man's brain weighs three and a half pounds?" "You've just read that, havn't you?" "Yes." "Well, doesn't the article say that a woman's is somewhat lighter?" "It certainly does." "And it also informs you that a woman's brain is of much finer quality?" "Yes." "Well, then, just concentrate your three-and-a-half pound intellect on that scuttle, and figure out how much it will weigh after you bring it up full of coal from the cellar." The man with a great head departed for the lower regions in search of information.

A PARTY of fair Welsey College sophomores had returned from an afternoon skating on the lake, and rushed into the study of a favorit instructor with the greatest enthusiasm. "O Miss ——, we had a perfect lovely time. The ice was as clear as glass, and we found some splendid bouys to sit on as we put on our skates." "Girls!" exclaimed the shocked instructor. "Yes, the skating was perfectly divine, and we sat on the bouys and—" "Why, girls, I am shocked. Do you mean to say you sat down on boys to put on your skates?" "Why, yes, those great wooden posts that come up through the ice." "Girls, it is time to get ready for the bread-making optional."

"I SUPPOSED as a general rule you passed clergymen," said the red-nosed man in a disappointed tone, "and my case is particularly a hard one." "If there is any good reason why you should hav a pass I will consider the matter," said the superintendent. "Are you in distress, out of a job, anything of that kind?" "I am out of business completely," exclaimed the red-nosed man earnestly. "I was a missionary to Japan, but now the Japanese pretend that they hav discovered trichinosis in missionaries, and they won't let us into their ports auy more. That has ruined my business, and I am bankrupt." On the next train there was a red-nosed man who showed the biggest pass ever issued over that road or its leased branches.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 11. No. 8. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, February 23, 1884. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

CAPTAIN COUCH has bought a Presbyterian church building in Leavenworth, Kan., and converted it into a billiard hall and saloon. Another Presbyterian church in the same city is used for school purposes only. John Calvin stock is below par in the West.

THE Sunday Free Lance is the name of a new paper just started in Leavenworth, Kan., by Will Kernan, formerly of the Okolona (Miss.) States. Its politics are intensely "state rights" and anti-prohibition, and its religion red-hot Infidel. It is a large paper, ably conducted—terms, $2 per year.

THE Atlanta Constitution is indulging early in Fourth of July oratory. In its humble opinion, "the war is not over. The war of opinion must and will go on, till everywhere in the land the humblest come-tumble may record his biffle through the buffle-baffle, and until the will of bunkles—the real binkles in nation and state—shall, under the hipple-hopple, be sinktum in the things of which it should of right hav sanktum."

THE Christian Union, with a commendable endeavor to tell the truth, says: "It is very little use to preach peace and good-will among men from the pulpit, and practice in the church meeting wrath and bitterness. Of all wars, religious wars are the worst; of all quarrels, church quarrels are the meanest. All the injuries which Mr. Ingersoll, with his rhetoric, and Herbert Spencer, with his logic, inflict upon Christian faith are insignificant in comparison with those inflicted upon it by one church quarrel in which pride gets the better of piety, and passion of love."

A PRIESTLY scandal is rife in Munich. A short time ago the lady superior of a convent was dying, and it was discovered that for twenty-two years she had concealed her illegitimate daughter in her apartments. This girl, though she had been well supplied with nourishment, was in a most pitiable condition and could neither speak nor understand. Although the wretched mother was of good birth and had many wealthy relativs, none of them would undertake the charge of her offspring, so the convent authorities hav taken over the responsibility, although all their efforts to keep the scandal secret hav proved unavailing.

THE city of Rome, Italy, the home of the pope, was recently in consternation in consequence of a most mysterious murder. Mgr. de Cesare, a Catholic, general of the Olivetan congregation of Monte Vergini, at Naples, whose official duties require his presence in Rome for some months every year, kept an apartment at No. 80 Via Puraficazoine, near the Piazza Barberini. Here, when at Rome, he lived alone with a man servant, who had been in his service many years. One morning he returned from Naples, and, a noise soon afterward in his apartment having attracted attention, the neighbors made inquiry at the door. The servant replied by a story of a woman having been fonnd in the room by a jealous husband. No further notice was taken of the matter till the next morning when the Monsignor was found murdered near the bed. He bore the character of a pious priest.

THE Church Standard (Episcopal) says: "We fear that of all the religious bodies calling themselvs orthodox, the church to which we belong is the least true to its character. The whole church is honeycombed with unbelief. What doctrin cannot with impunity be denied from the pulpits of our churches? What one question of morals is there on which we cannot find bishop, priest, or deacon to argue the other side? We will not mention names. We might do so if we chose. Anyone with any knowledge of the state of the church can supply examples for himself. Some will not say the Nicene creed; some deny the immortality of the soul; some the everlasting damnation of the wicked; some the inspiration of holy scripture, and affirm that the Bible is like the Vedas, etc., only the best of all; some deny the double procession; some deny the sacred ministry; some teach that Christ was only the model man; some teach the propriety of suicide; some that of divorce and re-marriage so-called; some that of incest. There are among the clergy those who teach that the law of expediency is the only rule of life; and many, many (alas, be it said!), many declare that the Lord that bought them made no 'satisfaction' for their sins! It will be said that this is an exaggeration; that the men who teach such things are few in number, and of small influence. It is not so. They were few in number twenty years ago, they are so no longer. They had no influence twenty years ago; to-day they all but rule the church." It is for saying things like these that THE TRUTH SEEKER is called Infidel.

A SENSATION has been created among the Catholics of this city by the excommunication last Sunday of the congregation of St. Procop's church, on Burton street, by Bishop Gilmour. Under the laws of the diocese the parish elects four councilmen to administer the temporal affairs of the church. The priest selects sixteen members of the congregation, from whom the four councilmen must be chosen. The congretion numbers about 400 Bohemian families, or 2,000 persons. Attached to the church are a number of aid societies. For some years past there has been trouble between the leaders of these societies and the church authorities. It culminated a few weeks ago in a refusal on the part of the congregation to select councilmen from the sixteen names presented by the parish priest, Father Furdek. Bishop Gilmour then appointed four councilmen. These the congregation refused to recognize. The bishop gave the congregation to understand that his wish was law, and excommunicated the whole congregation. It remains to be seen what the poor Catholic dupes will do about it. They are so besotted in their ignorance and superstition that it will not be strange if they submit. But the people who in this age of the world fear a bull of excommunication deserve no sympathy.

A "GRANDFATHER," in one of our city dailies, thus discourses on the Newton-Potter controversy: "If Mr. Newton can make it clear that all parts of the Bible are not of equal authority, no right-minded church people should hinder him. For example, he should not be hindered from drawing attention to the familiar discrepancy between the books of Kings and Chronicles in the matter of the age of one of Judah's kings. The second verse of chapter xxii in 2 Chronicles, in the Hebrew as well as in our versions, states that at the time Ahaziah ascended the throne, on the death of his father, he was 42 years old, while his father, Jehoram, it is stated in the two verses immediately preceding, was at that time but 40 years old, which would make the son two years older than his father—an absurdity. Now, this statement as to Ahaziah's age in Chronicles is at variance with the statement in 2 Kings viii, 26, which places Ahaziah's age when he ascended the throne at 22 years, or 18 years younger than his father. Some similar cases of the variable reliability of scripture might be cited perhaps. My point is this: If it is manifest that the Bible contains a historical untruth, or any incongruities, his duty to the rising generation justifies and requires Mr. Newton's exposition of it. The Episcopal church cannot afford to attempt to silence him. It can but recoil on its own head if it does. Our children must be taught only what is true. Let the heavens fall if they will. Of that there is no danger. They will not fall."

THIS is Talmage's opinion of such ministers as Beecher and Newton: "A London fog has fallen on some clergymen, who are at sea as to the inspiration of the Bible. They deny its full inspiration; Genesis to them has become a myth, and they will drift until they land on a continent of mud from which, I fear, they will never extricate themselvs. Who make up this precious group of advanced thinkers to whom God has made a special revelation? Are they so noted for piety and disinterestedness that they shall take the place of Paul, and John, and Christ? On what mount were they transfigured? What star pointed at them when they were born? When I see them trying to improve on the work of the Lord God Almighty, I am filled with disgust. O man who believes in a half-and-half Bible, a Bible in spots—where did you come from? 'Away back in the ages, my ancestor was an orang-outang, a tadpole, or a pollywog; and it took a million years to evolute me.' 'Where are you going when you die?' 'I am going to the great To-be, thence into the great Somewhere, and so on into the great Anywhere, and finally end in the great Nowhere!' 'That's what I supposed you would!' Nearly all the heterodox men I hav seen believe men are coming to the same destination. Tom Paine and Whitfield, Jebezel and Florence Nightingale, Charles Guiteau and James A. Garfield, John Wilkes Booth and Abraham Lincoln, side by side! If this be true I turn from such a debauched heaven with loathing."

Two Catholic shrieks: "Liberalism is beginning to raise its head. Its principal center is in Montreal, and that is not astonishing when we remember that for a number of years back it has been allowed full swing. It would seem that the fruits of the crusade formerly undertaken so courageously by Mgr. Bourget are about to be lost, and a few days ago, openly in the city of Montreal, there was an attempt to rehabilitate in public opinion the old Institut Canadien, the well-known cradle of false doctrins."—Courrier de St. Hyacinthe.——"At Montreal some persons hav dared in full public meeting to make a pompous eulogy of the Institut Canadien, formerly condemned by the church for its thoroughly satanic spirit. They exalted the memory of a Papin, of an Eric Dorion, well known for their ferocious radicalism and their Voltairean views. They recalled with delight the memory of the Avenir and Pays, those two papers in which rebellious children for years threw handfuls of mud in the face of their mother, the holy church. They paid homage to a Joseph Doutre, the malevolent secretary who, in a celebrated case [the seizure of Paine and Voltaire's works], uttered horrible blasphemies against the bride of Christ. That is what they are doing at Montreal, while at Quebec they are endeavoring to destroy the Cercle Catholique, blessed by the pope, approved by the ordinary, and supported by the clergy. On the one hand they pull down a Roman Catholic institution; on the other hand they revive a Masonic institution."—Vertie.

THERE has always been a good deal of talk about the "heathen Chinee," says Peck's Sun, but there is evidently one Chinaman in the country who does no little thinking, and as a moralist is a great success. In a recent interview the Chinese giant was asked if he believed in the Bible, to which he replied: "Oh, yes, I am a Christian, because Christian takes his Bible from Chinaman—from the morals taught by our great philosopher. Read Confucius, or we say King-fu-tse, and see how closely the Bible doctrins resemble the principles in which we are educated. Our legends correspond closely with those of the Old Testament. My people are 'heathen Chinee,' as we are called. We hav a high-class people, low-class people, same here. Very few first-class people you see here from my country. The worst class you hav. Compare them with your own worst class. Chinamen work hard, lie very little, steal not at all; never make bad citizens. Some say this free country: Open your land to ignorant of other nations. In prison, in workhouse, no Chinaman, but plenty of other nations. You say Chinaman can't come here, but you welcome drunkards and thieves from other lands. Just think, I engage to come here for Barnum. I cannot leave ship because I am a Chinaman. The collector pass me because I am a curiosity, just like some buy pieces of bric-a-brac. You invite Chinaman to be citizen. He stay; help country just like German. We use type and printing thousand years before you. You cannot make silk like this I wear. You should see the farms of my brothers near Pekin and Weang Hoe. You say we can liv on the waste of your fathers. Is that a sign that we grow rich by employment others shun? Yet your sacred writings teach that waste and idleness are sinful."

BRADLAUGH has been re-elected to Parliament from Northampton, by a larger majority than ever before.

A BALL was given at Salt Lake City last week in which prominent Mormons and gentiles participated in a most fraternal manner.

THE military attache of the Russian embassy at Berlin has visited Prince Bismarck, and assured him of the czar's warmest friendship for Germany.

A CATHOLIC priest of Wilkesbarre, Pa., last Sunday refused a body of veterans of the G. A. R. admittance to his church, where they had come to bury a comrade.

NEGRO RUGG, the author of the recent numerous assaults and murders on Long Island, broke jail last Sunday by overpowering his jailer and leaping through a window twenty feet to the ground.

FLOODS in the Ohio valley continue, and great suffering follows. The situation is destined to become worse. Relief is asked for, and is being afforded from many sources, but is not commensurate with the necessities.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S new book is attracting much attention and being mercilessly ridiculed on this side of the water, on account of the prominence given to the deceased gillie John Brown, concerning whom she has written a large amount of familiar discourse.

THE ex-Rev. George Miln, who left the pulpit for the stage, has been in Brooklyn the past week. His presence provoked the Rev. Justin D. Fulton to remark in his sermon last Sunday that "men of that kind are of the world, and care more for the favor of the ungodly than of God's children."

M. ROUDAIRE, the French hydrographer, announces that he has great confidence in the scheme to convert the Desert of Sahara into a vast inland sea. The French assembly has given him an appropriation. He will devote two years to surveys and observation, and make the results public in 1887.

BARNUM'S sacred white elephant is declared to be a fraud. It is said that the peculiar color, which is a sort of pink, is the result of a skin disease, and that elephants of that shade are no more sacred than any other. The alleged priests which accompany the elephant to put him through the mystic rites are only Burmese traders, who hav a fair knowledge of the Buddhist form of worship.

REPRESENTATIV WILLIS has prepared a table which shows that illiteracy holds the balance of power in fourteen Northern and in all the Southern States. In the thirty-eight states there are 1,871,217 illiterate voters. One voter in five cannot write his name. The illiterate voters in South Carolina are more than one-half; in Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Georgia, North Carolina, and Virginia, one in two; while Missouri, with one in nine, presents the best record.

GROUPS of persons holding lighted candles crossed against their throats were to be seen at the early services and throughout the day, last Sunday, and until far into the night, kneeling before the altars in all of the German Catholic churches of this city. They were petitioning St. Blasius to preserve them from pneumonia and sore throat. The candles used had been "blessed" by priests. The age of miracles may be past, but that of fools evidently continues.

A COUPLE of pious people, Mr. and Mrs. Bayles, of Port Jefferson, N. Y., came to this city last Saturday to get possession of a colored girl who had formerly lived with them, and who was then living with her mother. They met the girl and her mother on the street, and in the struggle to obtain the girl the mother sustained injuries from which she died. The Bayleses were arrested. Bayles is a leading member and trustee of the Methodist church, and his wife has been leading a revival meeting all winter.

Waifs and Wanderings.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

CHAPTER XII.

GETTING READY.

Sergeant Jones was indeed one of those fellows you can "tie to," good for a long pull and a strong pull and a pull all together; sharp, taking in everything almost at a glance; prompt, activ, enduring, of boundless good nature, unruffled as a summer's sea, yet with something at times of volcanic intensity. He was one that surmounted every difficulty; a splendid incarnation of the innate goodness of things. Cupples was confident that somehow this man would get his baby back again.

The only clue was the letter signed "Amy Bolton." This was put into the sergeant's hands, and he promised to report progress in a week.

It was a long week to Cupples, but his purpose only grew in intensity.

"Thank God," said Dobson, "hearts are trumps, and the black suit don't win."

"Yes," said Stubbs—

"Night's candles are 'played out,' and jocund day Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain top."

The Rev. Adolphus Hapgood consulted the concordance, and came out with the following neat bit:

"I am black but comely."

His congregation thought this quite good—"really unexpected," some of them remarked. This scared the ministerial punster. He did not mean to do anything unexpected, even in his sallies of wit.

In a week's time Sergeant Jones had found out all about the matter and reported.

On the night of the disappearance three men had crossed the river about a mile above the town. They had come to town and returned, and a bit of ribbon had been found on their route which the Cuppleses recognized as belonging to the baby. Mrs. Cupples had reason to know it, for she had used it twenty years to decorate her spring bonnet, and it came handy at last for the baby, while Mrs. Cupples rejoiced in a new splendor.

From this point the search was comparatively easy, and they had traced the fugitives to the home of Col. Bolton, in B—— county, Kentucky.

"They are both there," said the sergeant. "The mother and child are in close confinement and guarded night and day. The colonel has the best pack of bloodhounds in the county. There's a tremendous risk to be run. I doubt, Cupples, if you can do anything."

"But I will do something," said Cupples. "At least, I'll try."

"What are your plans?" asked the sergeant.

"I haven't any, only to go where the baby is. There must be some way to get hold of it."

"I'm ready to help," said the sergeant. "But it's no fool's errand; and if you haven't considerable courage, Cupples, you'd better not start."

"I'll go," said Cupples. "But I do wish that pack of bloodhounds were out of the way. Can't we p'isen 'em?"

"I guess not; but the bloodhounds won't bother us till we get hold of the baby—and there's the rub, to get the baby."

"Let's start, anyway," said Cupples. "We can back out if things look squally. But I must try; I can't stay here and do nothing."

"All right," said Jones. "Bolton livs about fifty miles from the river. We must travel by night and not let anybody know what we are up to. We'll start to-morrow night."

Cupples hurried home, and by the next evening the preparations were complete. Mrs. Cupples gave him her best word and a good luncheon, and told him to be "spunky" and keep shy of the bloodhounds.

"That I will," said Cupples. "But the trouble is they run faster than I and don't wait for an introduction. They take a bite without asking, 'By your leave.'"

Mrs. Cupples clung to her lord long and fondly, and was almost on the point of urging him to stay, but reflected that though his valor was an unknown quantity, his discretion was perfectly reliable; and if it came to anything very bad he would certainly ——"run away,

And live to run another day."

CHAPTER XIII.

OVER THE RIVER.

Cupples was ready and exultant at the appointed time. Indeed, he felt gigantic and able to cope with any difficulty. They crossed the river at nine o'clock. Though Cupples had lived in E—— for twenty years, he had never been on the river at night, and did not know what a magnificent and fairy-like spectacle it presented. The lights far-flickering in a mazy semicircle were mirrored in the water with exquisit brilliancy, or trembled into billowy spangles in the wake of passing boats. The shore looked like an illuminated palace, infinit in splendor, fascinating as a dream.

The music of the waters seemed like the faint echo of the dance of genii in those far-away halls that stretched so gorgeously along the winding hillsides.

Cupples wondered that he had never come to look upon that nightly exhibition, so close to his very door and so wonderfully beautiful. He resolved to take another look at it on his return. But, reader, he never did. Strange human nature! Heaven lies round about us, only a few steps, and we are in its very sanctuary. But we go not, and complain of the dullness of our surroundings. Cupples often wished he were in fairy-land. An evening on the river would have gratified him. But it was easier to stay at home and grumble.

We may laugh at Cupples, but we do the same thing ourselvs. We curse our unhappiness, when we might have roses and raptures, if we were not so indolent.

They landed silently on the other side, passed along the outskirts of the village of H——, and by a short-cut through the woods reached the lonely highway that stretched along in the direction of B——. It was not a good road; it was extremely uneven, with huge ruts and enormous patches of mud that stuck to one with massive affection. The dome of night bent over blue and sparkling. But Cupples could not say:

"Ye stars that are the poetry of heaven."

He was occupied with the cussed road, as he called it, of the earth. Who can think of beauty and joy when his corns are aching; or watch the jeweled canopy when his back is lame? What slaves we are to our poor flesh after all! How soon it gets the better of our spirit! Quite easy it is to be complacent when we have no pain or weariness. We may feel gigantic and exultant then. But when every bone is aching, we realize how puny we are, and that our powers are limited. Not even a thousand beckoning stars can make us feel that we are gods. After going about ten miles, Cupples began to be dejected. The baby seemed rather visionary. His aching back came to the front and took up his attention. His battered feet continually suggested home, sweet home. The undertaking was evidently too big. There were twenty miles yet to travel that night, and twenty the next, and what good would result after all? Poor Cupples! this was the first time he had ever tried to be a hero, and he was a pitiable failure.

The sergeant trudged along with the vigor of a Hercules. He carried all the luggage, and it didn't seem to trouble him a bit. "He was cut out for a hero," thought Cupples, "but what a miserable devil I am!"

At last Cupples vowed he would go home. The sergeant tried to keep up his spirits; stopped to rest with him awhile, and then urged him forward. But it was useless. Cupples fell to the ground completely exhausted.

"I ain't worth a cent," said he, "for any such thing as this. I'll go home and trust to providence. It's his business anyhow, and not mine. This world is too big a machine for me to run, especially when the roads are so everlastingly bad. If I could go on the cars I'd try my hand at it. But my feet are too sore, and my back too lame for me to enter into any active partnership with the Almighty. I prefer to be a sleeping partner. I've done my part. I'm going home, and the Lord and the devil may fight it out to suit themselves. I'll pray a heap, but I won't take another step. Jordan's a hard road to travel. No 'Pilgrim's Progress' in mine after this. I'll take 'Saint's Rest.'"

The sergeant leaped to the front, and grasped Cupples by the collar.

"Look here, Cupples; you've started on this thing, and you've got to put it through. I didn't begin for any child's play. You shan't go home unless you can lick me, and if you don't go ahead I'll lick you. That's a fact now."

He drew back ready to strike.

"You are a pretty fellow," said Cupples, "not to let me go back when I want to. It's my affair, and not yours. If I don't want to get that baby, what difference does it make to you? Come, let's go home, and I'll stand treat; that is, if I can stand. I'm afraid I shall have to lay down for the first few glasses."

"Not by a jug-full," roared the sergeant. "It is my affair. It's not to my credit to go back like a whipped puppy. I'll get that baby or I'll lose my head, and you've got to help me; so come along."

Cupples knew Jones would strike. He turned and kept on his journey. When one finds he must do a thing, he does it somehow, no matter how impossible it seems. Cupples found that he could not retreat without a bruised head, and so he pushed forward. The sergeant's fist was to him the wheel of fate.

The silver rays of morning swept the tops of the trees as the travelers arrived at a tumble-down cabin in the midst of a wild solitude.

"This is our stopping-place," said the sergeant.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Epistle to the Romans.

Having noticed the prominent points of the other Pauline epistles, his letter to the Romans remains to be specially considered. We will just quote a few observations by Dr. Davidson:

"The manner and time in which the seed of the gospel was carried to Rome are unknown. . . . When Pompey the Great conquered Judea [63 B.C.], he sent large numbers of the inhabitants as prisoners to Rome, to be sold for slaves. Under Augustus, the friend of Herod the Great, many of them were liberated and made Roman citizens, having a dwelling assigned them beyond the Tiber. The young colony rapidly increased under the fostering influence of the emperor; for Josephus states that more than eight thousand belonging to Rome joined an embassy of fifty deputies from Judea to second a petition to Augustus (Ant. xvii, 2, § 1). But they did not enjoy constant favor, since Sejanus had four thousand transported to Sardinia, while the remainder were ordered to depart out of Italy on a certain day, unless they renounced their religion" (Tacit. Annal, ii, 85).

The "Annals" of pseudo Tacitus cannot prove anything; but Josephus attests the banishment of four thousand Jews to Sardinia, because they refused to become soldiers (Ant. xviii, 3, § 5).

"With the fall of Sejanus this edict lost its significance, and Tiberius's favor returned to the Jews. In like manner Claudius banished them from Rome A.D. 49 or 50; but many must hav returned soon after. Dio Cassius [A.D. 229] testifies that Judaism continued to increase at Rome, in spite of all the restrictions and decrees issued against it" (Hist. xxviii, 17).

"Were these Christians at Rome when Claudius's decree against the Jews was issued? This point cannot be determined for want of historical testimony."

"On the whole, it is probable that Aquila and Priscilla were Christians before leaving Rome; though the language of Acts xviii, 2, is not decisiv for or against it" (vol. i, p. 119).

It never occurred to Dr. Davidson that if Aquila and Priscilla knew Paul, it was in the reign of Augustus.

"No light can be thrown upon the state of the church at Rome when the apostle wrote, by the conclusion of the Acts where his personal arrival in the city is mentioned, because that narrativ is unhistorical. How could the leaders of the Jews be so ignorant of Christianity, when a numerous church existed near them, with many Jewish converts belonging to it?" (Ibid, p. 123).

To these pertinent and significant observations by an astute theologian, Antichrist will now add the following points:

1. This epistle may not hav been written to the Romans. The caption is no proof, and it so happens that the words, "at Rome," in chapter i, 7 and 15, are omitted in MS. G. (Farrar's St. Paul, p. 450). The only other evidence to prove that the letter was addressed to the Romans is contained in chapter xv, which did not exist in Marcion's copy. The passages bearing upon the question are these:

"From Jerusalem I hav made a circuit quite to Illyricum, and hav fulfilled the announcement of the messiah; while I was careful not to preach where the name of messiah had been invoked, lest I should build upon another man's foundation. . . . But now, since I hav no place in these regions, and as I hav been desirous for many years past to come to you; when I go to Spain, I hope to come and see you; and that ye will accompany me thither, when I shall hav been satisfied in some measure with visiting you. But I am now going to Jerusalem to minister to the saints. For they of Macedonia and Achaia hav been willing to make up a contribution for the needy saints who are at Jerusalem. . . . When, therefore, I shall hav accomplished this, and shall hav sealed to them this fruit, I will pass by you into Spain. . . . And I beseech you, . . . that ye labor with me in prayer to God for me; that I may be delivered from them in Judea who believe not; and that the ministration which I carry to the saints in Jerusalem may be well received; and that by the good pleasure of God I may come to you with joy, and may take comfort with you (xv, 19-33).

Now if the foregoing passages belonged to this epistle originally, then it was doubtless addressed to the Romans. But besides the fact that the last two chapters, xv and xvi, did not exist in Marcion's text, the most ancient of which we hav any knowledge, the earliest quotation from any part of them is by Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 189–202). Neither Irenæus nor Tertullian, who frequently quoted from the epistle, made any reference to these two chapters; and Justin Martyr ignored Paul altogether.

Again, at the end of the epistle, chapter xvi, is a doxology of three verses. This was placed at the end of chapter xiv in copies mentioned by Origen, Chrysostom, Cyril, Theodoret, and other fathers; and it appears both at the end of xiv and xvi in MSS. A, L, and in nearly all the cursiv MSS. Now how came it at the end of chapter xiv, if that was not the end of the epistle?

For these and other reasons the authenticity of chapters xv and xvi is rejected by such able critics as Baur, Lucht, Scholten, Schwegler, Volkmar, Holtzmann, Rovers, and Zeller, while Davidson, Weiss, and others reject only chapter xvi (Sup. Rel., vol. iii, part ii). But the authenticity of the whole epistle is questioned only by Evanson and Bruno Bauer.

2. The epistle is not addressed to a church, like those written to the Corinthians, Galatians, and Thessalonians; nor to elders and deacons, like the epistle to the Philippians. The words bishop, elder, and deacon are not used; and church occurs only in chapter xvi. The address is "to all those who are at Rome, beloved of God, called and sanctified" (i, 7).

3. We suspect the integrity of a part of the first chapter, containing not only the two references to Rome (omitted in MS. G), but also this passage: "Your faith is heard of in all the world" (8). This is incredible.

4. Presuming that the passages are genuin in which the writer speaks of Jesus as "born in the flesh, of the seed of the house of David" (i, 3); and of the sons of Israel, "from among whom messiah appeared in the flesh" (ix, 5); it must be conceded that Paul believed in an objectiv Jesus.

5. He says: "I long much to see you. . . . . I hav many times desired to come to you (though prevented hitherto), that I might hav some fruit among you also, even as among other gentiles, Greeks, and barbarians. . . . I am eager to preach to you" (i, 11–15). Here, as we hav before pointed out, is the only instance in Paul's epistles where the word Greek occurs in the Syriac codex. Perhaps this word is an interpolation, and possibly the context is spurious. But we are willing to accept it as genuin.

6. The Greek scribes hav changed Aramean to Greek in Rom. i, 16; ii, 9, 10; and x, 12, as we hav heretofore pointed out.

7. The epistle contains a clear enunciation of the Pauline doctrins of uncircumcision, of justification by faith, and of predestination.

8. "We cry Father our Father" (viii, 15). The Greek has Abba, ho pater. Abba is the Syriac for pater.

9. A singular doctrin is announced in the following passage:

"The Spirit prayeth for us, with groans not expressible; and the explorer of hearts, he knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit; because he prayeth for the saints, agreeably to the good pleasure of God" (viii, 26, 27).

10. Paul declares his status as a Jew by saying: "I also am of Israel, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin" (xi, 1).

11. In regard to his mission he says: "It is to you gentiles I am speaking; as I am a legate to the gentiles." But he admonishes the gentiles thus: "And if some of the branches were plucked off, thou, an oliv from the desert, wast grafted in their place, and hast become a participator of the root and fatness of the oliv-tree, do not glory over the branches" (xi, 14, 17, 18). This admonition has not been heeded by the Christian church.

12. Paul's doctrin in regard to food and drink is not very clear: "And man believeth that he may eat everything; and he that is feeble eateth herbs. . . On account of food destroy not him for whom messiah died. . . . It is proper that we neither eat flesh, nor drink wine, nor do anything whereby our brother is stumbled" (xiv, 2, 15, 21).

13. In regard to the observance of holy days, the apostle is extremely liberal. "One man discriminateth between days; and another judgeth all days alike. But let every one be sure in regard to his knowledge" (xiv, 5). Or as the revised version has it, "Let each man be fully assured in his own mind."

14. The question whether the church at Rome was composed mostly of Jews or gentiles has perplexed many critics. But it does not trouble us. If the writer of Acts tells the truth, Paul found very few believers at Rome—probably not enough to form a church—nor does he appear to hav founded a church there during his two years' stay, unless at his own house. On the other hand, if the epistle was addressed to the Romans whose faith was "heard of in all the world," we must admit that there were many believers in that city. But again, if we accept chapter xv as genuin, are we not to understand that after the apostle should hav been satisfied in some measure with visiting the saints at Rome, he wished all those brethren to accompany him to Spain? (xv, 24.)

On the whole, therefore, we suspect the integrity of the passages in the epistle which imply a great number of believers at Rome. But if they were numerous, they were doubtless nearly all Jews, with enough of the other sort for the apostle to say, "I speak to you gentiles" (xi, 13).

15. Chapter xv ends with an "Amen," and chapter xvi, as we hav already observed, has a doxology at the end, which some ancient MSS. insert also at the end of chapter xiv. The doxology is not in Paul's style, and most of the rest of the chapter is made up of salutations and commendations. The brethren and sisters named are Phebe, Priscilla, Aquila, Epenetus, Mary, Andronicus, Junia, Amplias, Urbanus, Stachys, Apelles, Aristobulus, Herodion, Narcissus, Tryphena, Tryphosa, Persis, Rufus, and his and my mother, Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, Philologus, Julia, Nereus, and Olympias.

Not one of these has been identified as a resident of Rome at the time the epistle is supposed to hav been written. Rufus's mother is termed Paul's mother, and he calls Andronicus and Junia "my relativs, who were in captivity with me, and are of note among the legates, and were in the messiah before me." Aquila and Priscilla were at Ephesus when Paul wrote 1 Cor. xvi, 19, and again at Ephesus when he wrote 2 Tim. iv, 19, if the latter epistle is genuin.

These and other considerations (aside from the omission of a salutation to St. Peter) hav compelled some orthodox critics to believe that this part of the epistle is a fragment addressed to some other place than Rome (Farrar's St. Paul, p. 450, note).

The following salutations are sent by the writer from brethren at the place of writing, supposed to be Corinth:

"Timothy, my fellow-laborer, and Lucius [Luke?], and Jason and Sosipater, my kinsmen salute you. I, Tertius, who hav written this epistle [from dictation?] salute you in the Lord. Gaius, hospitable to me and to all the church, saluteth you. Erastus [Aristus?], the steward of the city [Corinth?], and Quartus, a brother, salute you" (xvi, 21–23).

What could the brethren at Rome know about these persons? But they might be known to the brethren at Ephesus.

Presuming, however, that these salutations are authentic, though not addressed to the Romans, we note again the name Aristobulus, and immediately following it, "Salute Herodion, my kinsman," as evidence that Paul may hav been related to the family of Herod the Great, and therefore by birth or privilege a Roman citizen.

No Surrender.

When the League Congress made the seventh demand, saying that "temperance (prohibition) laws are insulting restrictions of personal liberty," it was equivalent to demanding of liberal prohibitionists a surrender of their convictions on the rum traffic, in order to work harmoniously for the other demands made. Hav the Liberals attained to such dominion of numbers and power that they assume to make professions of faith for all parties in the country? If not, why single out the prohibitionists? We are always accused of making a hobby of temperance, but we did not bring it in. Liberals can, and some do, get drunk, the same as Christians do. They can vote with, and for, the rum power, and also sell rum, as the Christians hav always done; but when they make a demand that we must indorse, at least, the sale of it, silence might be construed to mean a surrender; hence we must show our abhorrence of that demand; even though it "has grown wearisome to some of the disputants." Why do Liberals, who approve of the seventh demand, make rules (insulting restrictions) to control the conventions and Leagues? Why not let any one speak when he chooses? We are all self-sovereigns. If a self-sovereign insisted on his right to speak in violation of the rules, he would be likely to find his way to the door. Cannot Liberals be left to their own personal liberty in a gathering of their own? Why does not the League Congress take issue upon every question in the country? Why single out the temperance question? Is the separation of church and state so nearly accomplished that Liberals hav nothing to do? The law will not allow anyone to keep a barrel of gunpowder in his house. Why don't the League make a demand against such an insulting restriction? A barrel of powder is dangerous, you say—so the prohibitionist says—but nothing in comparison to a barrel of rum. All in the house, knowing the danger of igniting powder, will let it alone. The rum kills more than the powder, but not so quickly; therein lies the danger. I go to Europe, and on my return, on landing at the wharf, my trunk and bag are taken possession of by strangers, and their contents examined, while I impatiently wait and am helpless to resist such an insulting restriction on my personal liberty. Why don't the League come to my assistance? Would it tend to subserve the cause of Liberalism if they did? A fire is raging—is thought to be getting beyond control—my house is blown up or torn down, according to law, to save yours. You object not, but make the seventh demand say no law shall be enacted to prevent the sale of liquor that often causes fire. You say liquor will not hurt anyone if only it is let alone. Why not say so of the fire? They both come to us whether we will or not—at least their effects do—which givs me the right to protect myself by prevention instead of being obliged to use remedial means after the damage is done. A new street is laid out, or a railroad projected; unfortunately my house is in the way. It matters not what care I hav bestowed on it, or how long it has been a home; my desires are as nothing; it must go. Where is the personal liberty to enjoy the fruit of my labor, and where is the demand for my right? The seventh demand, giving aid and comfort to the liquor traffic (whether intentional or not), by the absurd use of personal liberty, recalls the fact that the greatest crimes in the ages past hav been committed by Christians in the name of God. E. C. Walker says: "Prohibitory conventions resolve that the Sunday laws should be enforced." Prohibition conventions hav nothing to do with the enforcement of Sunday laws any more than of Friday laws, and when the League Congress goes outside of its legitimate work to say that temperance laws are insulting restrictions of personal liberty, they step on the same plane of bigotry as the church bigots do. The church does not monopolize all the bigotry; but what those conventions do put forth keeps many Liberals from being prohibitionists, and what the League puts forth in its seventh demand keeps many prohibitionists from becoming Liberals. Those church members, and their abettors, who control those conventions seem to act upon the principle of inducing men to become total abstainers in order to hav them come to Christ, thereby making temperance a secondary matter, while the League appears to desire people to become Liberals in order to put down prohibition. E. C. Walker says: "I know many Liberals who voted for prohibitory amendments who to-day are anti-prohibitionists." I know many who once resented it, if not called temperance men; to-day they are drunkards. Is that a reason for my being one? He says "prohibition is not a success in Kansas, and reliable men say it is not in Maine." Can he name anything that is a success, in the sense that he uses it, in reference to prohibiting the sale of liquor? Stealing is prohibited by law and penalties prescribed for thieves. Do they prohibit to the extent that there are no thieves in Kansas? Laws prohibit stealing everywhere; none can be found that advocate theft, yet no one dare leave a dollar on his doorstone overnight, expecting to find it in the morning, unless he hired a watchman, and the chances are many that he would take it. The lock and safe business are the best in the country. Public sentiment, about which we hear so much on the liquor question, is opposed to counterfeiting money. No one can be found to advocate it. Laws, with penalties, are enacted for the counterfeiters. The possession of a die is proof against them. Is there any counterfeit money? The government keeps a force of detectivs all the time, and yet large amounts of counterfeit money pass as current or gold. Why not abolish the law because it does not prohibit? Let the League attend to its legitimate work, hasten the time when churches pay their share of taxes, and we are not taxed to pay for chaplains, nor for any poor that are made so by the liquor traffic. The prohibitionists hav too much earnestness of purpose and indomitable will to tamely submit to any other result. CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

Religion Destroyed the Republic.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In my opinion, now is the accepted time to make a stroke for Socialism. Grant the claim of the protectionists, that our laborers must not be put on a level with foreign labor; forbid foreign laborers of all kinds as well as Chinese. Do not, however, allow a handful of capitalists to get the sole benefit of protection, but supplement prohibitory tariff, with the proviso that government supervise all protected industries, and by means of examiners (as in the case of banks), cause a just distribution of the benefits of protection; allowing dividends on capital, requiring wages on a certain scale paid to laborers, who shall hav right to appeal to a government board when discharged, and requiring all surplus above this paid to the government.

So much for manufacturing. In the matter of banking, the government now receives deposits in a restricted way, and issues certificates; let it receive them at every post-office in all ways that banks do. It sells exchange in small amounts; let it sell in all amounts. It lends currency to national banks; let it lend to all who can giv a good note just as banks do (some of the notes would be lost just as bank discounts sometimes are).

Congress can maintain a navy; let it use ships to do all carrying allowed to come to or go from our shores, and hav them ready for war when it comes.

It was decided by Chief Justice Marshall and associates in the celebrated case of McCulloch vs. Maryland that Congress may charter a bank as its fiscal agent, and such agent may incidentally do a general banking business for the public. Apply this to mail routes. Congress may build railroads to carry the mail, and may incidentally use them for general traffic; so of telegraphs.

Why not run a Socialist ticket in New York? Though I am no Socialist, I see that under precedents already established and decisions made by the supreme court, the United States can be made a commune without changing its constitution. And Socialism can not be worse than existing administrations, here or elsewhere, bigod.

The republic of Washington and Jefferson has passed away. The American people has abdicated. The field is left to two parties or forces—government socialism and aristocracy of money. To-day the latter has the advantage; the confederated rings rule.

The cause of the decay of the republic was the selfishness of the individuals composing it. Unjust, immoral, dishonest, each one industriously undermined the house in which he lived in order to become private owner of what he took out.

But why should they not? "This world is not our home." As well amuse oneself as a member of a ring as any other way. If there is anything wrong in it, Jesus Christ (who pardons everything except saying that he is a partner of Beelzebub) will send anyone straight from the deathbed to eternal bliss. He will do equally well by those who, robbed by rings, pass their lives in a hard struggle with poverty.

Though men must suffer here, the consequences of selfishness, immorality, injustice, dishonesty, religion promises them another world wherein cause and effect bear no relation to each other, and where the effect of causes that worked in the life of this world are retroactivly destroyed. Dropping out the middle terms, it is seen that religion destroyed the republic. It will destroy any society that adheres to it. W. M.

The Liberal Club.

"The 327th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club took place at 220 East 15th street, on Friday evening, Feb. 16th, T. B. Wakeman presiding. After minutes of previous meeting were read and accepted, the chairman introduced the speaker of the evening, Mr. Mark M. Pomeroy, who gave the lecture announced on the program, entitled 'Panics and their Causes.' The discussion which followed was participated in by Messrs. Palmer, Langerfelt, Dr. Foote, Jr., Andrews, Cohen, and Stone, and closed by the speaker."

The foregoing is all that posterity will learn, from the official records of the Manhattan Liberal Club, of what took place at its last meeting, except what is conveyed in the additional statement that "at the usual hour the club adjourned. A. C. Macdonald, sec'y." It is the province of THE TRUTH SEEKER to giv the proceedings more in detail, that the light of the knowledge there divulged may be diffused to the utmost parts of the earth, and that those dwelling outside of New York and in other heathen localities may be not altogether shut off from the means of grace.

The audience that assembled on this occasion filled the hall and the vestibule, sat upon camp-stools, stood in the aisles, and leaned against the walls. The steady increase in the attendance, and the augmented interest manifested, may be due to the series of reports of these meetings which has appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, or they may be attributable to other causes. Nevertheless they are assured and recognized facts. At the appointed hour Mr. Pomeroy appeared upon the stage, saluted the chairman, and then turned his attention to the solution of the matter of panics. When he was a young man, the speaker said, he had a friend at college who was called upon to write an essay on delirium tremens. The essay was short, and set forth that the cause of the disease was too much whisky; the effect, a bad feeling in the head; the cure, sleep or death. The cause of panics, Mr. Pomeroy proceeded to say, was lack of intelligence and contraction of the currency; the effect, financial distress; the remedy, more money. Panics had been of periodical occurrence for the last twenty years. When at the close of the war the government called in the greenbacks and substituted interest-bearing bonds, the foundation was laid for the subsequent financial crises. The government should pay off the bonds in greenbacks and stop the drain of interest upon the tax-burdened people. This was the simple and effectual remedy which it was the object of the lecturer to advocate. Mr. Pomeroy is a breezy and activ speaker, a Greenbacker, and, perhaps, a repudiator. His oratory is distinctiv. While on the platform he is in constant motion, sitting down when speaking of anyone in that position, and jumping to his feet again with a change of subject. The effect of his method is to keep a popular audidence awake and in good humor. The sedate and more thoughtful might regard him as inclined to reach out after effect, and as throwing more physical exertion into a speech than is necessary to the discussion of a grave subject. These appearances, however, may be deceitful, and perchance arise from the eminently natural ebullitions of earnest conviction and a powerful physique, which are prominent characteristics of Mr. Brick Pomeroy. He is Liberal in religion, progressiv in politics, and enterprising in business.

At the close of the speaker's remarks the chairman announced that the interesting and remarkable lecture to which we had listened was now open to discussion in speeches of ten minutes each. Members of the club had the preference.

Mr. Palmer was in accord with most that the speaker had said. He could not, however, see any way open for the nation to repudiate its agreement with the bondholders and still preserve its honor. He had paid debts which in equity he could hav got out of, but as he had promised to pay them, he did so. The nation must keep its pledge, and look to some other method besides repudiation as a preventiv of panics.

Mr. Langerfelt was the next critic to assert himself. In listening to the lecture he had seemed to feel the fresh br ezes of the West. As a matter of fact, it was the fresh st lecture he had ever heard. He could not agree with the speaker at all in regard to greenbacks. Money represented value, and value could not be created by an act of Congress. Mr. Pomeroy's speech was all nonsense; this for the reason that there was no sense in t. The gentleman's heart was probably all right, but, as Mr. Pomeroy had himself said, there was need of intelligence. This is the substance of Mr. Langerfelt's remarks; but it appeared afterward, when other speakers came to criticise him, that it is not what he intended to say.

Dr. Foote, Jr., the inventor of the polyopticon, and author of a distich on the merits of that amusing and instructiv implement, stated that he had always been a Greenbacker. It came natural. Still, he was not so much a Greenbacker as formerly. He had read the arguments on the other side, and became convinced that money should be based upon something. Dr. Foote was candidate for political office on the Greenback ticket in this city last fall, with unfavorable results. This only shows, however, the necessity of hastening that time shadowed forth by the Pantarch, when the best men shall drift into places of trust as naturally as water runs down to the sea.

Mr. Andrews assumed the platform to correct some of the errors into which Mr. Langerfelt had fallen. He first took up that gentleman's statement that money must represent instrinsic value, whereupon Mr. Langerfelt denied that he had said anything of the kind. Mr. Andrews went on to say that the value of money was founded in the confidence that the next man would take it. That was practical redemption. The amount of money which a government might issue was therefore limited only by public confidence; and as the limit of that confidence could be reached, it followed that inflation of the currency could be run into the ground if carried far enough.

Mr. Cohen made a speech that appealed largely to the sense of humor, and created side-aching laughter, partly because it was essentially funny and partly because of the accent of the speaker, who is a Hebrew. He told the story of the man who instructed his son, if he ever bought a cow in partnership, to take the hind part, because it gave all the milk, while the front part consumed all the hay. Unfortunately Mr. Cohen's version of the anecdote reversed the cow and gave the shrewd young man the front part. Mr. Cohen was therefore under the necessity of revising his joke. This having been got along with, he proceeded to repeat the conversation which he had held with Mr. Rutherford B. Hayes. The president broached the subject of currency, and said there would be no settlement of the problem while there were fanatics who believed that the government stamp on a piece of tin made it money. Mr. Cohen had given him the direct snub by saying: "Mr. President, I hav no time to discuss that question with you; but I hav my opinion of a chief executiv who hasn't confidence enough in the people over whom he presides to accept their promis to pay." The audience could not help applauding this exhibition of "crust," and a man remarked in a consolatory tone that "Hayes was a fraud anyway."

Mr. Stone made a brief speech following out the line of thought which Mr. Andrews had taken up; and then Mr. Pomeroy took the floor again to answer his critics, paying his respects more particularly to Mr. Langerfelt, and defining money to be simply a legal tender.

A pleasant feature of this meeting was the raising of a sum of money to aid in defending free speech in Massachusetts, now assaulted in the person of Mr. E. H. Heywood. THE TRUTH SEEKER set the ball in motion by offering a tableful of literature to be sold, the proceeds to be devoted to that end. Those who were not in need of the literature were informed by the chair that they might contribute direct. Mr. Pomeroy laid down a greenback with a V on it, and Dr. Foote, Jr., and Mr. Courtlandt Palmer followed suit. With these and the returns from the sale of books and papers, together with other contributions, the sum of $31.03 was raised, and a check for that amount forwarded to Mr. Heywood the next morning, with the best wishes of all concerned.

The next Friday night lecture will be by Mr. Palmer, on "Liberal Lessons from the Character of Washington."

Hamburg, Erie County, N. Y.

Liberals here hav for some time had a Liberal League charter, but never fully organized or got to work. Under the stimulus of a course of three lectures by ex-Rev. C. B. Reynolds, of Rochester, on the 8th, 9th, and 10th of February, and the earnest appeals made by him, they hav now decided on activ, united work.

Heretofore expenses of lectures hav been defrayed by a few zealous ones, no charge being made for admission to the lectures. Under the advice and in compliance with the urgent appeal of Brother Reynolds, and encouraged by the large attendance and deep interest awakened by his first lecture on Friday evening, on "What Liberalism Teaches," it was announced that an admission fee of 25 cents would be charged on Saturday evening, the Sunday lecture to be free. This worked well—proved to be a move in the right direction—all readily paying admission.

One of the worst mistakes is to suppose people will best appreciate what costs them nothing. When we invest our money we are far more likely to take activ interest and devote our attention to the matter. The great need of the hour is organization. Iconoclasm is not enough; we must build up. Liberals can only carry on their grand and noble work effectually by rallying and uniting their forces. Let us hav an efficient organization of Liberals in every village, town, and city; and let every member pay regular dues. This need never exclude the poor; there are always generous and intelligent Liberals who will find some profitable work for the deserving needy, so they can earn for themselvs enough to pay their way without sacrificing their independence.

The lecture here on Saturday night, "Why I Left the Pulpit," despite the extreme inclemency of the weather, drew a good attendance, and proved the wisdom of charging admission.

Hamburg is fortunate in having some of the best possible material of which to form a powerful Liberal society. The leading Liberals, J. A. Taylor and J. Nuessle, are Liberals in the fullest, highest sense of the term. They not alone reflect credit on the cause, but their influence has an elevating tendency. Despite their outspoken Infidelity, their exemplary lives, enterprise, and benevolence, cause the orthodox to moan in anguish, because all their efforts to counteract the influence of such men are vain. The poor know Brothers Taylor and Nuessle to be their best and truest friends, providing them employment, and inspiring and encouraging them with a spirit of industry, economy, and independence, while the wealthy devotees of supernaturalism, and most abject slaves of the church, and Mrs. Grundy, are compelled to admire their public spirit, enterprise, and integrity.

After the Sunday lecture on "The Bible in Public Schools," which attracted a crowded house, and was a wonderful eye-opener and thought-awakener, Bro. Reynolds appealed to those present to organize and commence holding regular meetings; called attention to the necessity of earnest efforts in behalf of the children, to provide them scientific, educational, and social advantages that should be in all respects superior to the church and Sunday-school.

Arrangements were promptly made to hold regular weekly meetings, and we predict a brilliant future for the Liberal League of Hamburg. PECULIAR.

Professor Adler's Appeal for the Poor.

Professor Felix Adler renewed his attack on the tenement houses last Sunday at Chickering Hall before a large and sympathetic audience. He opened with certain general propositions regarding the development of the intellect, taste, and moral faculties of man, saying there were degrees of humanity; that in some persons only possibilities of humanity existed, and that anything approaching perfection was the result of careful culture and nice harmonization of all the mental qualities. He then took up his main subject in these words:

Let us turn from this ideal to look upon the tenement house population of New York. What blackness falls upon the sight! What a descent there is from a mountain-top to a miry swamp! Among old superstitions is there any more pernicious than that which holds that some persons are born with blue blood; that a small part of the population is to hav the advantages of culture and refinement, while the majority grow up in neglect; that the few are to sit upon thrones built upon the bodies of the many? I hav heard in this country even—in this land of liberty—utterances which show that the tradition lingers among us that some are born with gold in their souls and some with baser metal. I was present once at an Independence Day dinner which occurred shortly after a great strike, which had excited more public sympathy than is usual. My neighbor was particularly violent in his denunciation of the strikers, and at last he said, "It is my belief that some men are born to drink champagne and others to carry the hod." Just then he was called upon by the chairman to respond to the first toast. He stood up, and, lifting his glass, exclaimed, "Let us drink to our Declaration of Independence and our glorious Constitution."

You would not put wine into a dusty goblet; you would not place the luscious summer fruit upon a broken plate. How does it happen, then, that you, who believe that every man has an immortal, precious soul, would place that soul in a soiled and shattered vessel? "The poor man should cultivate greater refinement," says one. How, when even his grosser senses are offended day by day and hour by hour with his surroundings? "He should be better educated; ignorance is his great fault," another says. How shall he be educated? Has he not been taken from school in his very infancy to work in a factory, or be a cash boy, to help to keep starvation from his parents' door? "Greater morality should prevail among the lower classes," says a third. How shall the poor man be virtuous, when all the surroundings of his life are destructiv of morality? I tell you there is room for a new abolition movement here as broad, as grand as that other which is just finished against negro slavery. But so difficult, so complicated, are the necessities of this case that it is a blessing if any settled point can be found from which to start the movement for the abolition of pauperism, if to the helpless people and their still more helpless benefactors any certain course can be laid open. This certainty, this starting-point, I believe is to be found in the tenement house problem. Here it will not be necessary to convince; here you can appeal from a sure basis to the morally lazy, who know their duty but do not do it. You can call to them in the words of the scripture, "Let my people go free"—free from the extortioners who are squeezing the last penny out of the poor, free from the reeking dens in which they pass their lives.

The case is this. The decent working people of New York to-day pay, on an average, rents from $8 to $14 a month. That is a fixed quantity. They can giv no more. Their wages will not allow it. Now, if the tenements must pay from ten to fifteen per cent to the landlords, it is plain the capital invested must be very small. If the capital is small, the comforts and conveniences must be very limited. If the capitalist would be content with six per cent, so much more comfort would be assured to the tenant. Now, we may hope, judging from examples in this city and Brooklyn, that we can make six per cent in our new tenement enterprise, and yet giv good light, ventilation, and plumbing. Our plan is to be content with half that and make the rest a sinking fund for the tenements—to brighten the lives of these poor people with the idea that in old age they may liv rent free. To carry out these plans only money is wanted. You are not asked to giv, only to lend. Is it very hard to lend to the poor at three per cent?

The newspapers object that we cannot get men to furnish capital at three per cent when they can make fifty. Are men only dirt? Will people who own capital only respond to one motiv. But what about the churches. They claim to be the guardians of the public morality; let them see to what a fine condition of morality we hav come. There are churches in this city so rich that they could build whole blocks of tenements. Let us do our part, and perhaps when they see us, a band of radicals, going forward they may be goaded into action.

Others object that some of the people are too degraded to liv in clean houses. They do not seem to see what a reproach that is to themselvs; they do not see what an argument for haste it is lest the rest of the people should become as bad. But at any rate these degraded ones are the minority; why then compel the decent poor to liv amid associations they abhor?

Then I am asked why I attack the houses and pass over the matter of food and dress. I reply, the home is the foundation of everything. Where homes are well all is well. But when, as I hav seen, two families and night lodgers are crowded in two rooms, one of them dark, is it wonderful that health is bad, morals are low, and politics are corrupt? I hav no paence with movements that attack the symptoms and disregard the causes of disease. Are we sure that if we lived in squalor we could resist the temptation to drown in drink our remembrances of our lot—of what we are and what the civilization of the nineteenth century has made us?

I hav known a man to brutally kick his wife at a time when she ought to hav been the subject of his tenderest care; I hav heard the story of a fair-haired little girl on whom a brutal father drew a knife; I have talked with a little girl of eleven who already had tasted of the fruits of the tree of knowledge, because she and her father and mother and brothers and sisters were crowded, regardless of all decency, in a single room.

It is because I know these things and you know them that I tell you we are responsible for the lives and destinies of these people; and if we do not try to rescue them their fate is upon our heads.

Dr. J. L. York in Seattle.—Another County Heard From.

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its many readers at large will no doubt be glad to hear a short report from this part of the great field of Freethought.

I reached here on the Queen of the Pacific in time to speak two Sunday evenings preceding the Paine celebration, for which purpose I was called here. And as all are open to flattery in some degree, I must confess I felt a little flattered to appear before a Seattle audience the fifty-fourth time, numbering over five hundred people, the full capacity of the hall. My first lecture was upon "The Demands of Liberalism," and showing the great need of a union of all Liberals, Materialistic and Spiritualistic, in a common cause against superstition and the combined efforts of a civilized paganism to still further infuse itself into our political and social relations.

This was the marked feature in the life-work of our friend D. M. Bennett. He drew no line of separation between Liberals on the ground of belief in after-life; and always sought to make a common ground rather than divide and weaken the forces in the presence of a common enemy. This fact was the basis of my strong attachment for this good and noble worker in the cause of truth; and, like Thomas Paine, his great service will be remembered and more appreciated in years to come. And I hope that the same policy will be pursued by THE TRUTH SEEKER to the end of the chapter. Liberalism in its best and highest sense is divested of all technical issues, and means mental liberty.

This implies more than some Liberals are inclined to concede. I mean such as are constantly harping for, or against, continued life. The extreme in either case seems to me equally full of mischief.

My sympathy is on the side of the Spiritualistic thought, and I hav never sought to hide my convictions on that subject; and yet I would not think it compatible with a generous Liberalism to teach dogmatically upon that subject, and much less to treat lightly or trample upon the feelings and antagonize the views of good Liberal people upon a subject the nature of which, of necessity, involves much doubt. You will excuse this abrupt turn in my letter; and let me say that one might suppose that away up here, by this most beautiful body of water in the world, Puget Sound, surrounded by evergreen hills, with the grand, proud, old Raineer, in snow-capped majesty, so pure and white, looking down upon the beautiful, stirring city of Seattle, spread out, as it is, like a city upon a thousand hills, with such an equable climate, and where every prospect and surrounding pleases, it would be sad to know that "only man is vile."

But such is the fact; Christians not only can, but as elsewhere do, stretch the truth, and sometimes lie outright. Last week the Herald, a paper run by a Christian hypocrit, came out with an insulting editorial against the Seattle Liberal League, and asked, "What has Liberalism done for the world? Beyond teaching a Liberalism so like license that no ordinary man can tell the difference, it has done nothing; and the student will look in vain, two centuries later, for the names of Tyndall, Darwin, Ingersoll, and the rest of that ilk." Of course that fired me up some, and my second lecture was a red-hot review of the Herald, showing what Liberalism teaches, its philosophy and moral ethics, and what Liberals had done for the world in the field of science and social life; and I also pointed out, as well as I could, what would become of such men as the editor of the Herald, and cited him, being a Christian, to the fearful example of Ananias and Sapphira. The next day he came out with two columns of weak tea, to show that science and religion meant essentially the same thing, and that only fools interpreted science in such a way as to antagonize religion.

I ought to thank him for the above text, and on next Sunday evening will review the Herald again, and we shall see whether science and religion are the same, and who the fools in the case are. But here—how I am going on, almost forgetting to tell you about the celebration of the natal day of our author-hero, Thomas Paine!

Agreeable to a provision in the Seattle Liberal League, that its officers should be elected each year on the anniversary of Thomas Paine, the League came out in full force on that evening, and a board of officers were elected, consisting of D. B. Crane, a time-worn veteran and a warm supporter of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its cause, as president; C. J. Clark, vice-president; Walter Walker, secretary; and Laurie E. Hall, treasurer, after which, the audience having assembled, taxing the utmost capacity of the hall, fully six hundred people, the memorial exercises were carried out in a manner highly creditable to the League and satisfactory to the audience, consisting of music, songs, poems, and speeches. Mrs. Gifford rendered an original poem on Thomas Paine, doing credit to her head and heart. Mrs. Giddings recited a poem by Dr. J. L. York, entitled "No Royal Road," in fine taste, evincing marked elocutionary excellence. The choir, of which Mr. Brush is chorister, manifested a critical good taste in the selection of songs and music for the occasion. Miss Good enlivened the occasion with her solos, in such fine voice as to carry the house by storm. The meeting was opened by President Crane with remarks touching the life work of Thomas Paine. The oratorical honors we shared with our friend W. H. White, one of Seattle's ablest lawyers, a fine speaker and a true champion of our noble cause. And, on the whole, I must say that the Seattle Liberal League is one of the very best west of the Rocky Mountains.

And I could not help thinking, as I looked into the faces of this large audience on this occasion, how Freethought is growing in the minds of the people. Such an audience, and on such an occasion, would not hav been possible ten or even five years ago. This is certainly a pointer to the decay of Protestant Christianity and the incoming harvest of mental freedom.

On next Sunday the Seattle Liberal League will organize a Young People's Progressiv Lyceum. This is a step in the right direction. Let us save our children from the nightmare of old theology, and I will add right here that Mrs. L. E. Hall, of Seattle, is engaged upon a compilation of Liberal songs and hymns, Materialistic and Spiritual, set to appropriate music in the book, for the use of Liberal meetings, lyceums for the young, and funeral occasions, which will more fully meet this need among our people everywhere, and bespeak for her the encouragement she deserves.

I am engaged to speak here during February, and from here to Tacoma, Portland, and home about the middle of March, to rest up a little for the long trip through Nevada, Northern Utah, Idaho, Wood River, and Montana in the spring. And I hope that the friends along the line of this route will assist me to help them by dropping me a few lines to San Jose, California. Will the Boston Investigator please copy?

The Work in India.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir and Brother: I am surprised to learn that Rev. Joseph Cook had been misleading your countrymen as regards his Indian exploits. The Boston liar and slanderer was virtually hooted out of India, while our late lamented friend, Mr. Bennett, the Freethought martyr and reformer, had a very cordial reception from the whole people of India and Ceylon, not to say of other countries he visited. The Boston religious scab had been saying somewhere in Boston that Mr. Bennett had appeared in one of the liar's lectures at Bombay with a horsewhip under his coat sleeve. This assertion is quite false. We, the people of India, only regret that the blackguard was not actually horsewhipped. I am sure the rascal will be horsewhipped and mobbed if he, the friend of Anthony Comstock, comes out the next time to India, and he shall has to go back scarred all over. His Calcutta friend, another slanderer and liar, the Rev. Mr. W. Hastie, has been ignominiously dismissed from the Christian mission work for his having slandered and libeled against the honor of an innocent "sister." This pious gentleman (?) was the only living man who stood by Joe Cook in this country. Joe Cook's Boston lecture teems with slander of the dead; to use my friend Remsburg's expression, "the ass was bravest when the lion could no longer defend himself." Cook's Tremont Temple lecture was a series of concocted lies from beginning to end. I wish it to be made known to the "defender of Christianity" that the people of India hav a natural tendency of hatred towards that rotten religion, and that the tendency of all educated men, in this country, is towards Freethought. My reprint of Mr. Bradlaugh's "Is there a God?" and "God in a Nut Shell," one of THE TRUTH SEEKER leaflets, an edition of 19,000 copies, has been exhausted in one month. My translations of some of Mr. Bradlaugh's, Bennett's, and my friend Remsburg's tracts hav an enomous circulation in this country. The Calcutta Statesman, a respectable daily, says: "Mr. Basu is a pronounced Freethinker, and his anti-religious Bengali tracts hav an enormous circulation." Translations of Remsburg's "The Decline of Faith" has an unprecedentedly large circulation. Works of Mr. Bradlaugh, Mrs. Besant, Mr. Charles Watts, Mr. Bennett, and others, are almost in the hands of every educated man throughout the country, and there is not a place in all India where Christianity and its black-coated defenders are not ridiculed by the people. I hope, Mr. Editor, you will publish this letter, with such remarks as you deem proper, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, to disabuse the public mind of the false impressions which might hav been created in their minds from the base slanderer and liar's fabricated stories. I also hope that all of the Liberal papers will copy and publish this letter. I am, for the cause of truth, Fraternally Yours, KEDARNATH BASU.

The Blunders of Bigotry.

Fifty-one years ago, in 1833, soon after England had removed the political disabilities of the Catholics, a boy was born in the eastern part of London to parents living in poverty. When the Chartist agitation was rekindled in 1848 the poor lad of fifteen found that nature had gifted him with a brain and a tongue. He sympathized with the cause of the people and became a street orator. When the Chartist crowd undertook to march to Westminster to present the monster petition calling for universal suffrage and the abolition of the property qualification, and was dispersed by the police, the boy was in the ranks. His name was Charles Bradlaugh.

Ten years later, in 1858, the property qualification was abolished.

In 1858, the year a Jewish member was first admitted to the British Parliament, Charles Bradlaugh started a journal advocating republicanism in politics, Freethought in religion, and the doctrins of Malthus in social economy. The publication was bitterly denounced. The Gladstone ministry in 1869 endeavored to suppress it because its proprietor refused to apply for a license. But Bradlaugh, pleading his own case, defeated the government in the courts. The journal rose to a circulation of many thousands.

In 1868 Charles Bradlaugh ran for Parliament in Northampton. He received 1,000 votes in a constituency of between 9,000 and 10,000. Ten years afterwards, in 1878, Sir Charles Dilke said that Charles Bradlaugh had the largest following of any man in England.

In 1880 Charles Bradlaugh was elected Member of Parliament for Northampton. When he entered the House on May 3d he declined to take the oath of allegiance and offered to affirm. The House denied him the right of affirmation. He refused to withdraw and was taken into custody and imprisoned in the Clock Tower. In June his affirmation was accepted on Mr. Gladstone's resolution and he affirmed and voted in the House. A regulation suit was commenced against him for sitting and voting in the House without having taken the oath, and under an English statute he was convicted and fined £500. Bradlaugh resigned, returned to his constituency, and they re-elected him. In April, and again in May, 1881, offering to take the oath with mental reservation, he was forcibly ejected from the House of Commons. This farce has continued ever since. Mr. Bradlaugh returns again and again to his constituents, and again and again they send him back to Parliament, where the stupid fanaticism and pig-headed obstinacy of the English statesmen meet him, and Northampton remains disfranchised.

This farce has just been repeated. Parliament assembles, Mr. Bradlaugh appears at the bar and his oath is refused. But he is no longer forcibly ejected nor confined in the Clock Tower. Thus far he has progressed towards victory. This time he resigns by the acceptance of the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, which vacates his seat. He will be immediately re-elected by his constituents.

There is no doubt how this will end. Despite the stubbornness of English prejudice Charles Bradlaugh will bend Parliament to his will. Bigotry and intolerance will receive another wound. But the bitterness of the fight which in their fatuity they hav made only renders it the more certain that in a very few years not one but many Charles Bradlaughs will sit on the benches of the British House of Commons.—The World.

Was Sir Walter Scott an Atheist?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been perusing Lockhart's "Life of Sir Walter Scott," and in vol. ii of this biography, commencing on page 234, and ending on page 236, is a letter from Scott, dated Edinburgh, March 2, 1810, to a particular friend of his, J. B. S. Morritt, Esq., 24 Portland Place, London. In the course of this letter occurs the following: "Miss Baillie's play went off capitally here, notwithstanding her fond and over-credulous belief in a creator of the world. The fact is so generally believed that it is the man who makes the deity, that I am surprised it has never been maintained as a corollary that the knife and fork make the fingers." It would seem from Sir Walter Scott's allusion to Miss Baillie's "over-credulous belief in a creator of the world," as also to the fact "generally believed, that it is man who makes the deity," that he entertained Atheistical views. Another addition to the long list of thinking men who are not led by the clergy and the old book of contradictions and immoralities. Very truly yours,

EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

Infidel Philosophy.

The days of miracles are past. The waters of the flood hav long since dried up. The ark is laid up for repairs. Wise and holy men, with a thousand fancy women each, are as scarce as white crows. Barnum offers a hundred thousand dollars a season for a magician who can turn all the waters of any country into blood.

The gates of hell are closed and the fires hav gone out. The devil has engaged with Tony to carry his smut-bag. Samson's fiery foxes are to be put on exhibition the coming season. Water from the dry jawbone of an ass is now worth fifty dollars per drachm. Sitting Bull wants the mate to the jawbone which Samson used to such advantage among the Philistines for a war club. He will pay in healthy young squaws who can be disposed of to ministers to good advantage ; every revivalist will take two or three at good prices.

Jonah has gone back on sea voyages; he don't like the cabin arrangements. It is now ascertained that a little more fire in the furnace would hav kept the three Hebrew children from frosting their feet. It is found out that Old Lot holds a claim on all the salt-beds recently discovered in the state of New York. Joshua has entered into contract not to put the brakes on the solar system until requested by the chief officer of the signal service. The prophets are on a strike because God did not hav events transpire as laid down in the program. Mrs. Adam says, since the whole human family hav to be damned, she is sorry she did not eat another pound sweeting. The devil says that God is an "old seed," and got beat on every corner.

My friends, the morning of reason is dawning. The clouds of superstition are lifting. Those who hav so long held the race in mental bondage are losing power. The voices of those who are coming to deliver the race can even now be heard in the distance. Ministers are leaving the church to unfurl the banner of Freethought. Science will soon wave her magic wand, and the civilized nations will own her sway. Superstition and gods and ghosts and creeds will disappear as savage life givs way at the approach of civilization.

This is eminently an age of reason—an age when every idea, new or old, is subjected to the severest criticism. All truth has come to be sacred, and falsehood and absurdity can no longer be imposed upon the people by calling them holy. Books are now taken at their real value, and calling them holy does not raise them in the estimation of sound-minded men a single farthing.

All men are being impartially weighed in the balance of public opinion, and calling a man reverend does not add one pennyweight to his avoirdupois.

Men now conduct their business according to their best judgment. Overruling providence is no longer a factor. Men who liv at the present time are of vastly more importance to the world than those who lived in an ignorant age, even though they were instructed by God. Those who were instructed by God knew far less than those do who hav been trained in our schools of science.

The masses are losing faith in prayer, and fast learning that everything must be accomplished by personal persistent effort. Men advanced in thought are no longer striving to please God, but are trying to better the condition of man. Comfortable houses and happy families are occupying the minds of men more than an imaginary heaven.

The great lesson of the day is not how to go to get to heaven, but how to hav a heaven all around us.

It is found far better to teach men how to liv than how to die. If they are taught how to liv good and useful lives here, they will certainly die without any trouble on their part, and find all the enjoyment there is in it. And if, as Christians say, there is a world beyond, they will be as well prepared to enter that as Christians are who never hav learned to properly liv in this.

The time has come for men to think, scan and compare and investigate, and arrive at reasonable conclusions without fear of a designing priesthood, or the hope of heaven or the dread of hell.

We go back and arraign the old Bible worthies before the bar of public opinion as though they were living to-day. Because Brigham Young claimed a divine commission, he cannot escape this ordeal; neither can they. If they were under the guidance of an all-wise and just God, they will come out like pure gold from the crucible. And if it should turn out that God had no more to do with them than he has with men to-day, and the whole thing is only a pretense and a sham, then the sooner the truth is separated from falsehood the better.

If polygamy is a thing to be loathed and cursed, then Solomon is to be loathed and cursed more than Brigham Young, in the proportion of a thousand wives to twenty. If the Bible account of Abraham offering up his son Isaac be true, why should we discredit the claim of Freeman? Let those who claim that God directed Abraham deny the claim of Freeman, if they can, with any show of consistency.

If King David murdered Uriah in order to make his wife a victim to his lust, he was guilty of a meaner crime than Guiteau was, and deserved a hangman's noose a hundred times more; and calling him a man after God's own heart does not abate the heinousness of the crime one iota. It is claimed that David repented of this great crime before God. Did he giv up Uriah's wife? Not a bit of it. His example is followed by many of our modern ministers; they sin and repent, and repent and sin. Repentance follows crime, and crime follows repentance. One treads upon the heel of the other, and all the time they grow no better.

We go farther. We arraign the Bible and the Bible God. Is there any wickedness in that? If God has given us the reason we possess, must we not measure all things, the Bible and God included, by the reason which he has given us? And if the Bible represents God as a monster, may we not reasonably conclude that a decent God had nothing to do with it, and that those who wrote it made their God reflect their own savage dispositions.

Did an unchangeable God ever create man and pronounce him very good, and then repent of making him? If the eating of an apple damned the whole human family, did not God, by planting the tree in the garden, he having fore-knowledge, make himself accessory to the crime? And if God had killed Adam and Eve right there and then, would not the consequences of the transgression hav been far less disastrous? Would it not hav been better to kill a single pair than to drown a world?

But it did not stop here. Even after this terrible visitation the sons of men continued right on in their transgressions, until God got so mad that he had to kill himself to appease his own wrath, and open up a way whereby not more than ninety-nine out of every hundred need be compelled to roast in hell.

To a reasonable mind this redemption business seems not only ill-timed, but badly planned. If the eating of an apple brought the primal curse upon the world, and there was no escape only through the blood of Christ, then all who were born before the flood must hav been used for kindling-wood to keep up the fires in the regions down below.

And those who came after the flood could hav fared no better up to the time of the crucifixion. So that from man's advent into the world there hav been less than two thousand years that man stood any chance to escape hell. Whereas if the savior had been trotted out immediately after the eating of the apple, there might hav been a chance for one out of a thousand of the countless millions who were born before the crucifixion to twang a heavenly harp.

In view of this whole transaction, it has always appeared to me that God could hav had but one object in view, and that was to play into the hands of the devil. God is clothed with all power, and if the above conclusion is not correct, how could the weaker being worst the stronger every time?

All the time Noah was sweating to build the ark, didn't God know just how it would all turn out? Didn't he know that he was putting poor old Noah to an awful sight of trouble, and that neither himself nor the human family would be any better off? Were not the people just as wicked after the flood as before it?

And then to giv old Noah such a chase after the animals to get them into the ark, when he knew all the time it wouldn't do any good, was using him meaner than a cow-boy. Don't wonder he got drunk, the first opportunity, to drown his trouble.

My mind can conceive of nothing more wicked than to teach the young that such nonsense is the word of God. And to teach them that God ever spoke to man, or held communication with him, more than he does with man to-day, is equally wicked and absurd. I take it upon myself to say that every one of the "God saids," and the "God spakes" throughout the scripture has only a big lie to rest upon. However, God had no more to do with the scriptures, than he did with the Koran, the book of Mormon, or any other writings. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." Did God write that? If so, he wrote what no man ever understood, for it is positivly without meaning.

Suppose an Indian chief should see an improved printing-press, never before having learned that such a machine was in existence. And suppose he should desire some one to giv him a history of it, as to who first conceived the idea, and how it came to be suggested, and how many changes had been wrought in bringing it up to its present degree of perfection. And suppose he should be told that Smith or Jones invented it. He could put all he had learned into his Indian pipe and smoke it, for the answer would convey no idea. And "God created the heaven and the earth" is equally barren of an idea.

"And the earth was without form." An utter impossibility. The human mind cannot conceive of a particle of matter without form. "And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." How? As a boat moves upon the face of the water, or as a general "moves upon the enemies works." I must confess that I am at a loss to know.

Now remember this is God's writing. It is also claimed that he constructed the machinery of my brain, and that it must produce thoughts peculiar to the machinery. Now if my mind cannot comprehend his word; in other words, if he did not adapt his word to the capacity of my mind, did he not make a blunder?

"And God said, Let there be light." Who heard God say that? Is it possible for any human being to know that God used that language? Did he speak in ancient Greek, or Hebrew, or Sanscrit? Could it make any kind of difference what tongue he spoke in, or whether he spoke at all, when there was no ear, not even the ear of a brute, to hear what he said?

Now I want some one well up in this God business to tell me how it is possible for him to know that God said, "Let there be light." To whom did he say it, or what was the use of his saying it, before he had made an ear to hear it?

Now, whether he said so or not, or whether he picked his teeth, or scratched his ear, or blew his nose, or stubbed his toe, or got some dirt in his eye, no human being has the power of knowing, for as yet no human being had been created on the face of the earth.

"And God divided the light from the darkness." This is a very peculiar statement. God had created neither sun, moon, nor stars, so that for three days at least neither of these luminaries could hav been the source of light. What produced the light for the first three days, and how the light and the darkness got so mixed, is still a conundrum. And how he "divided the light from the darkness" is equally a mystery. It must be that he put a long partition through, and then bailed out the darkness and poured it over the partition.

Now I want every reader to open his Bible, and turn to the first chapter of Genesis, and see how the work opened on the fourth morning, as three mornings and three evenings hav elapsed without any sun.

Gen. i, 14: "And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven to divide the day from the night." Now how could there hav been three evenings and three mornings, and three days, before God got the apparatus in running order to produce these evenings and mornings, or to divide time into periods of day and night?

Verse 17: "And God set them in the firmament of the heaven, to giv light upon the earth. 18: And to rule over the day, and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness." Now it is clearly apparent that this was the first machinery he had arranged for dividing the light from the darkness, and how could he hav divided the light from the darkness, as set forth in the fourth verse?

I tell you the bailing process is the only solution, but I apprehend it was only a makeshift until he could carry his plans into execution.

Now if my everlasting salvation depends upon believing that such stuff is the word of God, I may as well be put down as a candidate for hell at once.

Verse 21: "And God created great whales." How did he know that they were whales. It will be seen by consulting chapter ii, 19, that none of the animals had yet been named, for it is there stated that "whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof."

If God knew the name of every "living creature" beforehand, he fooled away his time when he "brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them."

Gen. i, 22: "And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful and multiply," etc. Now, when God spoke to the beast and the fowl and the fish, in what language did he speak? When the ass spoke to Balaam, it must hav spoken in language which Balaam could understand. So when God spoke to the beasts and fowls and fishes, he must hav spoken in language intelligible to them, or he might as well not hav spoken. What a pity we could not, in some way, get hold of the language he used, so as to be able to converse with the horses and cattle, etc. Wouldn't we speak to the bed-bugs and fleas and musketoes in unmistakable terms!

It is still a question how man found out that God did all this talking before a human being was created.

It must be that some enterprising newspaper reporter interviewed him a long time after it all happened.

Working Men

Of America! You are slaves to Shylocks, and your children are becoming greater slaves than yourselvs, and your posterity will bite the dust in the agonies of starvation if you do not arise and rescue your and their birthright to land from robbers and thieves. Circulate at once petitions or orders to the thieves in Congress for the following laws, viz: First, a law that no more land shall ever be given to schools, colleges, churches, railroads, or any other corporations. Second, a law that no man shall ever hereafter come into legal possession, by purchase, will, or bequest, of more land than he and his own family can cultivate—say seventy-five acres, more or less, but not over one hundred. Third, a law that every man who desires it for cultivation shall hav one such lot of what is called the public lands, by paying only the price of surveying and fixing the bounds. Fourth, a law that such farm lot shall be inalienable to himself and family, as a permanent and perpetual inheritance, never to be taken by debt. Fifth, a law that when a large land-owner dies, each of his heirs may take enough of his land for one such farm lot, and that the balance be returned to the government at the price he gave for it, or sold at auction in farm lots only to those who own no other land. Sixth, a law requiring railroads and other large land-owners to set a price on their land, and the government hav the option either to buy the land or else tax it at the owner's price.

The moment these laws are enacted, the speculation in land will be killed, as it should be, and land will be worthless (as it should be) to all who do not need it to cultivate. Every man will hav an opportunity to secure a home, thousands will go to farming from cities and manufacturing districts where they now hav to underbid each other in selling their labor, and those who remain will command better wages, instead of selling their labor for half price, as they do now; while a bloody war for natural rights will be avoided.

But the workers are yet in the majority, and you can hav these laws if you will; if you do, your children and their children will "rise up and call you blessed;" if you neglect this duty, they will curse your memory with bitter tears. Circulate petitions for these laws and shower them upon Congress, and if the present members will not grant your petition, elect men who will, and giv yourselvs no rest till you restore the stolen birthright to land. And now, readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, farewell; you may never again find my name in this paper.

The Prohibition Question.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: For one I am glad to see the prohibition discussion go on. It is doing good. Not that it is calculated to change the deep-seated convictions of adult people, but you must remember that there is always a "rising generation" coming on who need to be properly enlightened. The churches are all fully alive to the importance of indoctrinating the young. Let the old sinners go. It is a waste of ammunition to fire at them.

When I read the illogical and sentimental ravings of some of your prohibition advocates of nursery protection, I am reminded of old Col. I—— R——, of Topeka, Kan. After lying in the gutter for years, until his whisky appetite was exhausted, he "reforms," joins the church, goes to the very utmost verge of the opposit extreme, and becomes a greater nuisance and a more dangerous member of society than before. With a cocked revolver in his hand and a mob of women at his heels, I hav seen him wreck saloon after saloon, smashing down locked and bolted doors, and destroying stock, fixtures, furniture, and all. To cap the climax of prohibition glory, and that grace might still more abound, he shot and killed an officer who was approaching him with a a warrant for his arrest. He surrendered himself to a justice who was worthy Chief Templar of the Good Templars' Lodge, was examined and discharged.

Now there is your full-fledged "prohibitionist." If they are not all thus it is because they lack the pluck or as yet hav not attained to the higher degrees.

Five out of every one hundred men are constitutionally intemperate, without self-control, and become either inebriates or rabid prohibitionists. The latter is the worst of the two, as he is likely to do mischief far-reaching and serious. He does not reason. He feels. His impulses lead him. He is the material out of which to organize mobs and crusades. He is a creature of unaccountable whims, freaks, and fancies. Some of them hav become arrayed against the traffic in a spirit of revenge because some relativ or friend was infernal idiot enough to undertake the job of drinking all the whisky in the world and failed. Others are down on saloon-keepers because they envy them their easy profits. Others do not like strong drink, and hence want to regulate their neighbors' appetites by their own. Others like it, but love money so much better that the keeping of it affords them greater pleasure than drinking the whisky. Others fight the traffic because it is in their nature to fight and be raising hell about something, and they experience pleasure in so doing. Others, and the larger class, including the majority of women, are mere motivless jumping-jacks in the hands of designing persons, blindly following their bell-wethers wherever they lead. A few—a very few—are real unselfish philanthropists, and honestly believe that prohibition opens the door to the heavenly kingdom. With the exception of these, they are a bad lot, and one that I hav as little use and respect for as I hav for the majority of saloon-keepers.

I would rather liv in hell than in a country run by preachers and prohibitionists. For who is so destitute of intelligence as to suppose they would stop at prohibition. It would only be a beginning. Read history. It isn't whisky the church is after; it is after Infidels. That is the real issue. And the simple-minded "Liberal" who givs aid to it in this cause exhibits the wisdom of the silly chanticleer who, unable to "prohibit" his brother by his own process, went in search of a hungry fox to help him out. He stood by and laughed heartily while the fox ate his foe; but it was his last laugh, for the fox finished his meal on him.

It is a church struggle for empire—for conquest—precisely as England struggled to subdue the brave colonists. And I cannot regard these prohibition "Liberals" in any other light than as tories and traitors to our cause. E. C. Walker is our Thomas Paine. As a deep thinker, a calm, clear reasoner, and a forcible writer, he is unsurpassed. He never "turns livid with rage" under any provocation, especially upon occasions where only pity and disgust would be appropriate. S. R. S.

Prohibition Logic.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: W. F. Jamieson asks for proof that he is illogical. I think it is illogical to brand the Liberal League with being a "tool," even, of the "rum power." It is worse than illogical. It is false. And if he did not know it was false when he uttered the charge, so much the worse for him. The Liberal League and the "rum power" both declare against prohibition. Maybe the rum power is the tool of the Liberal League? Who knows? If both being on one side makes one a tool of the other, then Jamieson must be a tool of the church, for they are fighting side by side. When you turn his own logic against him, then it is illogical; but it is all right so long as it is turned against his enemies. Again he says, "They may be as temperate as I am, but they hav a queer way of showing it." Now turn this the other end to, and sayJamieson may be honest, but he has a queer way of showing it; or Jamieson may not be a designing knave, but his conduct unqualifiedly confirms that conclusion, which is the same thing, and how would he like it? It is the sum of many prohibitionists' logic to apply such epithets as "rummy," "defender of rum-holes," etc., to the opposers of prohibition. Everything that emanates from them is logic—prescribe for them their own medicin and it is the worst of billingsgate. If the League favored prohibition, would it be a tool of the church? Oh, no, I suppose not. Grant the right of half a dozen persons to take a plank out of the platform and not a sliver would be left. Perfect and absolute unanimity cannot be had on any point. Ninety-nine and nine-tenths per cent of Liberals are no doubt well satisfied with that seventh plank as it is. Giv us a rest. W. W. HAZZARD.

A Tenth Demand.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav noticed in your issue of Dec. 8th a suggestion that one of the parties attach the "Nine Demands of Liberalism" to its platform. Permit me to suggest that the Abolitionists made slow progress until they formed a third political party. The Liberals should follow their example, and form a party with the following tenth demand to their excellent platform:

> We demand that as Christian civilization has not improved the moral status of the Indians, and as their average capacity for mental culture is equal to the average white man's, they shall hav legal protection in the enjoyment of their rights as fellow-men, and also as fellow-citizens, whenever they desire to become such, without the imposition of any religious creed against their will.

This would, indeed, afford issues new to many, but acceptable to the humane and Liberal of all parties. It would giv vitality which no other parties possess. And until it is made in behalf of the race from which we hav derived our country, and two (Randolph and Jefferson) of the framers of its Constitution, our Liberalism is improperly limited; while the mere announcement of this demand will carry conviction of its justice to all who hear of it.

The tenth demand is necessary not only to show the clear, comprehensiv sense of justice of the Liberals, but to correct and elevate the national sentiment relativ to the oppressed races. Here is a fact by way of illustration: For years some of the newspapers on the Pacific coast hav affirmed that the Indians possess no attribute but what is common to the wildcat and wolf, and as such they should be destroyed. An item has recently been published that Rogue River Valley was so called on account of the roguish Indians who occupied it. The subscriber sent to two of the papers the following testimony to prove the statement a falsehood, but they refused to publish it. Its name came from Captain Rogue, who discovered the river: Hiram Culver staid alone in the valley, with a thousand Indians about him, for three months, while his brother went to the Wallamet for provisions. He had a variety of tools and other articles of value, yet he missed nothing but a small file, which, on telling the chief, was returned before sundown. Mrs. Jessie Fremont, with only one white woman, lived with the Indians two years, lost not a thing, and was treated by them with the utmost kindness. H. W. Beecher said in a lecture after his return from the Pacific coast, that he had made special inquiry as to the moral status of the Indians, and the answer was that "when fairly treated they are reliable and trustworthy." Out of two hundred treaties, they hav never been first to break one of them. The late report of the secretary of the interior says that the government owes the Indians five million dollars in unfulfilled treaties. Surely those who believe with Thomas Paine, "All men are my brother," should make a demand in behalf of equal rights for these people. JOHN BEESON.

Junius and Paine.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Bro. Wakeman is not quite convinced that Paine was Junius, and raises three objections to their identity. I beg leave to answer those objections just as I hav repeatedly done heretofore. He says:

> "The style of Paine seems to me against that theory."

What writer of that time comes so near to the style of Junius? Not one. Lord Brougham, never suspecting that so lowly a man as Paine could hav been Junius, said in 1840:

> "His style was a model of terseness and force. . . . In this respect he comes nearer to our own remarkable writer, Junius, than any known writer in the English tongue."

Mr. Wakeman's second point is:

> "The fact that Paine had not at that time of his life sufficient acquaintance with the men of England has seemed against it."

Mr. James Parton answered this objection in 1874 most emphatically. In gathering material for the life of Franklin he became familiar with the lives of the men whom Junius descanted upon, and "discovered that he knew them not, that he was not within the circle of the well informed." This was the only objection that weighed with Prof. Denslow, but when confronted with Mr. Parton's testimony, and with confirmatory facts, he frankly gave it up. The private letters of Junius to John Wilkes, first published in 1812, show that Junius was not within the circle of the well informed. And in a private letter to Lord Chatham, Jan. 14, 1772, recently brought to light, Junius says, "Retired and unknown, I liv in the shade, and hav only a speculativ ambition.

Lastly Mr. Wakeman says:

> "The fact that Paine with his open heart kept that secret is against it."

Almost the last words of Junius were, "I am the sole depository of my own secret, and it shall perish with me."

Now, Brother Wakeman, what would you think of Thomas Paine if he had broken that solemn and deliberate promis? Nor is it true that he had an "open heart" in the sense you imply. His heart overflowed with sympathy, but not at the expense of secrecy, which was one of his strongest traits, and enabled him more effectually to do his great work. He was unknown to the world until it became necessary to throw off disguise when he answered Edmund Burke in 1791. And when he began his "Age of Reason," two years later, he believed it was his last offering to "his fellow-citizens of all nations." Up to that time he had never in his writings disclosed his religious views. I say, then, had he at any time avowed the authorship of the Junius letters, his character, now without a smirch, would hav suffered unending reproach. W. H. BURR.

Misrepresentation.

From the Boston Investigator.

This is a very bad peculiarity in any one, even if indulged privately, and it becomes much worse when published. For instance: one F. B. Livezey says in the Light for Thinkers (we are sorry to see it giv light for misrepresenters) that:

> "Freeman [who murdered his child when religiously crazy] has lately been sentenced to a mad-house for life. Last summer, after reading editorial maledictions against him in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, equaled only by those of the Christian (?) Advocate," etc.

This is a misrepresentation. Neither THE TRUTH SEEKER nor the Investigator ever published any maledictions against against Freeman, for they knew he was crazy. They simply condemned the "religion" which brought him into that unfortunate condition, and they did their duty in so doing. Mr. F. B. Livezey is probably a Christian of some sort, but whatever it may be, it makes him quarrelsome and addicted to misrepresention. Let him remember and practice the commandment, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

JOHN'S WAY. Price 15 cts.

For this small sum of money is to be found the essence of multum in parvo. With all its wise and witty sayings it is as good as a double dose of laughter is to cure dyspepsia, for "John's Way" is a merry way, bordered with flowers and vocal with the wild bird's notes. If all men's ways were like John's, the millennium would stand tiptoe on the mountain-tops of thought.—Woman's Herald of Industry.

More Heresy.

Much talk has lately been occasioned by the indiscretion of a Chicago clergyman, who made public the opinions given in a ministerial conclave, which were intended to be strictly private, like the ministerial demijohn.

The Rev. Dr. Curry, one of the foremost Methodist preachers in the country, is the heretic. He is generally regarded by his brethren, and recognized by outside communions, as perhaps the best of the Methodist scholars, and his defection is viewed with alarm by his church. The divulger of clerical secrets is the Rev. Dr. Thomas, who is an expelled Methodist exhorter—his expulsion having been caused by his disbelief of some of the Methodist doctrins.

Dr. Curry having made some remarks to the effect that Heber Newton was not alone in his antagonism to portions of the scriptures, Dr. Thomas the next Sunday preached a sermon in which he spoke of Dr. Curry's words as affording proof that "the doctrinal conception of religion in our day is seeking new forms." "Many orthodox ministers," he declared further, "are embarrassed by the too narrow limitations of the creeds they hav promised to believe and teach."

Dr. Curry's attention having been called to this reference to him, he said that Dr. Thomas was "no gentleman." That, says the Sun, was no denial of the truth of what Dr. Thomas said, for a man may be "no gentleman," and yet a specific statement of his may be true. Dr. Curry may hav meant merely that Dr. Thomas was "no gentleman" for exposing him to the criticism of his brethren, and for trying to get him classed as a fellow-heretic. He doubtless intended, moreover, to break the force of the other's assertions, if not to deny them explicitly. But it seems that he could not so deny them, for on the following Sunday Dr. Thomas read a verbatim report of what Dr. Curry actually spoke at the meeting of Chicago preachers made by a stenographer present, who is also himself a Methodist preacher, and who is ready to take his oath as to its accuracy. This is what Dr. Curry said:

"We hav no Hebrew literature of any older date than the time of the Jewish captivity, and we hav no Hebrew scholars now, or so few that you might count them on your fingers. The time may come when there will be thoroughly educated Hebrew scholars, but that time is not now. But we are now standing on the eve of the most stupendous revlution in reference to the doctrins of the Bible that the church has ever known. Uncertainty and doubt are pressing upon us. We are not certain of the authorship of the Old Testament. We cannot tell what part was written by Moses what part by other hands of the books attributed to Moses. We say David wrote the Psalms, but we know that the Psalms were not all written by David. They were written by different persons, at long intervals. No one can tell who wrote the book of Job. It contains evidence of being one of the oldest books in the Bible. The Old Testament abounds with ten thousand old wives' fables, which will finally drop out like a tadpole loses its tail when it has no further use for it. It would not be prudent now for us to attack these fables in the pulpit. But I must say there is a great deal in the Old Testament that is of very little value to religion. It is not all given by inspiration. When you hav to giv up what your mother taught you, do it honestly, but do not say much about it publicly. The Revised New Testament is incomparably superior to the old version; but there are still many things that will hav to be changed. But I am awfully shy of the Old Testament. It has got to be thoroughly revised, and if criticism says that any of the books are not genuin, they must go overboard. Many of the prophecies of Isaiah and other prophets that are applied to Christ and the church had reference to the return of the Jews from their captivity. Let those who attack Robinson [Robertson] Smith and others with him move slowly, for they may find themselvs standing on the same ground in the near future."

The position of Dr. Curry is not an enviable one. He is undoubtedly a heretic, and as undoubtedly a hypocrit—a combination of qualities rarely found—never, we may safely say, except in the case of a minister who is profiting by his preaching. Dr. Curry is intellectually dishonest, and we hope he will stay in the church. If the Bible is not all given by inspiration, then the only logical conclusion is that the whole is without inspiration, for who so foolish, in this age, as to claim divinity for "ten thousand old wives' fables?"

An interesting question, and one we hope the theological statisticians will devote attention to, is, how many more Dr. Curry's there are in the various churches who, knowing the gross imposition the Christian theology is, yet deem it the wise and prudent course to keep silent concerning their doubts.

Sectarian Diversion of Public Funds.

New York state and city are undoubtedly worse priest ridden than any other state and city in the Union, but they are only a sample of what may be looked forward to when the church has obtained that plenitude of power she is working for.

In this state the giving of money to sectarian societies has reached an extent perfectly astonishing, and certainly calling for remonstrance and remedy. At the close of last year the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of this city appropriated for the month of November from the excise fund, to various Catholic institutions, and one or two asylums of other sects, the sum of $34,533. This is at the rate of $400,000 a year, mainly to Roman Catholic charities, while at the same time two Catholic institutions, the Protectory and the Infant Asylum, are receiving also from the state treasury more than $400,000 per annum. In the list of those provided from the excise fund we find that the Institution of Mercy received in November $8,557, the St. Stephen's Home for Children, $3,076, the St. Joseph's Asylum, $2,608, the Missionary Sisters, $3,867, the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin, $4,722, the Sisters of St. Dominick, $3,144, and so on.

These sums are allotted at the rate of two dollars per week for each child cared for. The number is swelled every fall, reports the Times, by the trick of many poor Catholic parents who transfer their children to these missions to be taken care of during the cold months. The parents are tempted to idleness, and to the neglect of their offspring, by the ease with which they can transfer their support to other people, and by the fact that they can recover their children when they become more useful to them. Such an arrangement has, of course, a pauperizing and demoralizing influence, to say nothing of the wrongfulness of the proceeding.

We notice that, in commenting upon these abuses, the secular press are careful not to let the careless public know that there is any principle underlying the question of subsidizing religious charities. With them the amount appropriated is the issue. Such shortsightedness is due, of course, to the powerful influence of the church party. It doesn't sound nice, and the editors would probably resent being told that they are cowards controled by religious thieves, but it is a fact, nevertheless. We hav fully as much respect for the stalwart religious papers who know that they are pilfering paupers, and stand up and defend their actions on the principle that the earth being the Lord's, and they being the Lord's stewards, they are entitled to all the fulness thereof.

Crazy Religion.

For the salvationists now perambulating the country to the temporary diversion from their ways of a few rum-soaked individuals, and the permanent detriment of much maidenly morality, the high-toned Christians of the Buckley and Hall stripe are responsible, although they repudiate them and their ways. In Canada recently a rector was deprived of his pulpit by his bishop for countenancing and aiding a mob of crazy men and women calling themselves salvationists. This action of the bishop is strictly in the line of the whole theological scheme. God made men to sin, and then punishes them for it.

But there is nothing essentially different in the nature of proceedings between the Episcopalians, the Methodists and the Salvationists, and the belaborings the two former bestow on the latter are not deserved. Episcopalianism is sentiment plus a creed; Methodism is organized insanity; the Salvationists are poor devils without the wit to comprehend the creed or sufficient stability of character to stay in the organization.

There is no question of the damage to morality the Salvationists do, and it is equally clear that the regular churches are responsible for it. Where else but in a Methodist prayer-meeting could the Salvationists learn such expressions as "Lord, hold me!" "Send down the power!" as though some invisible cook were preparing a dish of power and the exhorter were ordering her to send it down by the dummy; "Come down, Jesus, quick!" is a thoroughly Methodist way of asking for "divine grace," and who that has attended these religious orgies has not recognized such expressions as "Roll in glory!" "Praise the Lord!" "Open the gates!" "Carry me up!" and so on, to be relics of an early Methodist training?

It is cruel of the churches who hav the advantage of being "regular" to cast off their illiterate emotional children, who belong to that class of society with whom it was Christ's delight to associate. The Salvationists preaching communism, renunciation of reason, and abject faith, are much truer followers of Christ, and therefore better Christians, than the broadcloth gentry who doze in cushioned pews and sleepily listen to stilted sermons from a clerical dilettante. No matter if they are a butt of ridicule for sensible people; they belong to the church, and it is rank ingratitude and base cruelty for well-dressed Christians to make fun of them as they do.

Titles of the New Testament Books.

A correspondent wishes us to giv a few samples of the ancient titles of the books of the New Testament. We will take the three oldest Greek codices, namely, the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Alexandrian, and the Peshito or Syriac codex, which is more recent, though the latter version is claimed by some biblical scholars to be as early, if not earlier, than the Greek. There was also an early Latin version, called the Vulgate, translated by the Catholics in 1582; but the titles in this version appear to be made up by the translators. We will indicate the four codices by their initial letters, S, V, A, and P.

S. and V. After Matthew. A. Title wanting. P. The holy Gospel, the announcement of Matthew, the Apostle.

S. and V. After Mark. A. The Gospel after Mark. P. The holy Gospel, the Annunciation of Mark, the Evangelist.

S. and V. After Luke. A. The Gospel after Luke. P. The holy Gospel, the Annunciation of Luke, the Evangelist, which he uttered in Greek at Great Alexandria.

S. and V. After John. A. The Gospel after John. P. The holy Gospel, the Proclamation of John, the Herald, which he uttered and proclaimed in Greek at Ephesus.

S. Acts. V. Acts of Apostles. A. Title wanting. P. The Book of Acts; that is, narrativs of the blessed Apostles, compiled by Saint Luke, the Evangelist.

S., V., and A. To the Romans. P. The Epistle of Paul, the Apostle, to the Romans.

S. and V. (A.) The first to the Corinthians. P. The first epistle of Paul to the Corinthians. S., V., and A. The second to the Corinthians. P. The second epistle of Paul to the Corinthians.

S., V., and A. To the Galatians. P. The Epistle of Paul to the Galatians.

And so on through the rest of the Epistles of Paul, except that V. and A. hav "To the Colassians," and V. lacks the Epistles in Timothy, Titus, and Philemon.

S., V., and A. To the Hebrews. P. The Epistle to the Hebrews.

S. Has no title to the Epistle of James. V. (A.) The Epistle of James. P. The Epistle of James, the Apostle.

S. and A. The first Epistle of Peter. V. The first of Peter. P. The Epistle of Peter, the Apostle; Simon Kepha. S., V., and A. The second of Peter. P. The second Epistle of Peter. But the original Peshito had no second Epistle.

S. The first Epistle of John. V. and A. The first of John. P. Again, the Epistle of John, the Apostle. S. and V. (A.) The second of John. P. The second Epistle of John. S. and V. (A.) The third of John. P. The third Epistle of John.

S. and V. Of Jude. A. The Epistle of Jude. P. The Epistle of Jude, the brother of James.

S. and A. The Revelation of John. V. Has no book of Revelation. P. The Revelation which was made by John, the Evangelist, in the island of Patmos, to which he was banished by Nero [!], the Emperor.

The original Peshito lacked second Peter, second and third John, Jude, and Revelation.

The subscriptions to the Epistles are quite simple and uniform in the three old Greek codices, S., V., and A. But in the Peshito, and as given in King James's version, being taken from more recent manuscripts, they are quite curious. We will indicate King James's version by the letter K.

P. End of the Epistle to the Romans, which was written from Corinth, and was sent by the hand of Phebe, a faithful servant.

K. Written to the Romans from Corinthus [and sent] by Phebe, servant of the church at Cenchrea.

P. End of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, which was written at Philippi, of Macedonia, and was sent by the hand of Timothy.

K. The first [Epistle] to the Corinthians was written from Philippi, by Stephanus, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, and Timotheus.

P. End of the second Epistle to the Corinthians, which was written from Philippi, of Macedonia, and was sent by the hands of Titus.

K. The second [Epistle] to the Corinthians was written from Philippi, [a city] of Macedonia, by Titus and Lucas.

P. End of the Epistle to the Galatians, which was written from Rome.

K. Unto the Galatians, written from Rome.

P. End of the Epistle to the Philippians, which was written from Rome, and sent by the hand of Epaphroditus.

K. It was written to the Philippians from Rome by Epaphroditus.

P. End of the Epistle to the Colossians, which was written from Rome, and was sent by the hands of Tychicus.

K. Written from Rome to the Colossians by Tychicus and Onesimus.

P. End of the first Epistle to the Thessalonians, which was written from Athens, and was sent by the hands of Timothy.

K. The first [Epistle] unto the Thessalonians was written from Athens.

P. End of the second Epistle to the Thessalonians, which was written from Laodicea of Pisidia, and was sent by the hands of Tychicus.

K. The second [Epistle] to the Thessalonians was written from Athens.

P. End of the first epistle to Timothy, which was written from Laodicea.

K. The first to Timothy was written from Laodicea, which is the chiefest city of Phrygia Pacatiana.

P. End of the second Epistle to Timothy, which was written from Rome.

K. The second [Epistle] unto Timotheus, ordained the first bishop of the church of the Ephesians, was written from Rome when Paul was brought before Nero the second time.

P. End of the Epistle to Titus, which was written from Nicopolis, and was sent by the hands of Zenas and Apollos.

K. It was written to Titus, ordained the first bishop of the church of the Cretians, from Nicopolis of Macedonia.

P. End of the Epistle to Philemon, which was written from Rome, and was sent by the hands of Onesimus.

K. Written from Rome to Philemon by Onesimus, a servant.

P. End of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which was written from Italy, of Rome, and was sent by the hand of Timothy.

K. Written to the Hebrews from Italy by Timothy.

The rest of the subscriptions to the Epistles in the Peshito are simply "End of the Epistle of James the Apostle," etc., while King James's version has no more subscriptions. And the Peshito concludes as follows:

"End of the Revelation of John, the Evangelist [not the Apostle], and of the whole New Testament as translated into the language of the Syrians."

It is certain that the Apocalypse, and probably second Peter, second and third John, and Jude, were translated from the Greek into the Syriac, but not the rest of the New Testament, for Syriac was substantially the vernacular of Judea and Palestine in the first and second centuries.

Editorial Notes.

E. H. HEYWOOD's trial has been postponed till May. In doing this District Attorney Hopkins does not intimate that Mr. Heywood will not then be pushed to trial, but this breathing space will, the victim thinks, giv his "Christian accusers more time to pray over it; others to swear about it; and liberty to gather strength for the final wrestle."

A FRIEND of THE TRUTH SEEKER's wishes to know if some one can giv him reliable information as to which part of the state good government land in Florida can be found. He desires to locate on high and healthy ground, where profit can be obtained from a small investment. He will return stamps to those who forward information to Box 75, Main Avenue, Cumberland county, New Jersey.

THERE slumbers in one of the assembly committees a bill which should become a law. It has already passed the senate. The measure provides for freedom of religious worship in the penal institutions of the state. Under the present order of affairs nearly all the religious exercises in the prisons are conducted by Protestant clergymen. Catholics hav practically no show at all.—Troy Standard.

A still better bill to pass would be one abolishing all religious preaching and substituting in its stead ethical instruction. The convicts get Christianity enough outside the prison walls. The most of them were brought up "within the fold" of either the Protestant or Catholic churches. They need morality now.

AFTER describing at length the partisan fight which recently took place in Dr. Newman's church in this city—a fight which would hav disgraced a political primary held in a bar-room—the Banner of Light says: "We hav taken the trouble to sketch this church fight thus in detail and at length, for two special and impressiv reasons: first, that the people at large may see for themselvs the kind of men these parsons are who assume to dictate to them the absolute and eternal right and wrong of things; and, second, that they may better realize what is to be their condition when these same parsons, preachers, and priests, reinforced by their blind, and heated, and frothing followers, shall come into supreme control of our present free government by working the patent they hav applied for that is to put God into the Constitution. We should treat the whole thing as a farce, if it were not the force which it happens to be."

OUR ANNUAL is well calculated to make men enthusiastic, and we are not surprised that our good friend, Byron Adonis, should write glowingly of its utility and appearance. Disclaiming any brilliancy for the editor, we nevertheless hold that the compliments to the ANNUAL are well merited. The Universe says: "A superb work is 'THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC FOR 1884,' issued from the office of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, and edited by our brilliant Agnostic friend, Eugene M. Macdonald, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The ANNUAL is filled with deeply interesting historical information, and besides contains eighteen full-page illustrations taken from the famous work, 'A Truth Seeker Around the World,' by the late D. M. Bennett. The Annual is printed in elegant style, the contents are practical and of the greatest utility, and, taken as a whole, being a volume of 106 pages, is the finest work of the kind we hav ever seen. It reflects the highest credit on the editor, and is an honor to Freethought literature. The ANNUAL is invaluable to every Rationalist."

THIS good and, we may hope, correct notice is from the Anti-Monopolist, published at Rochester, New Hampshire. It must roil some of the puritan deacons of that state to hav a paper of that kind published among them: "If any of our readers desire to read one of the best Freethought and Reform journals published, we should unhesitatingly recommend to them THE TRUTH SEEKER published by THE TRUTH SEEKER Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York, at $3 per annum. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a large sixteen page paper, and is filled each week with the choicest literature pertaining to Freethought and the overthrow of superstitions. It also ably discusses reforms politically and socially, and is really one of the best papers we hav ever read. It is bold and fearless in its denunciations of kingcraft, priestcraft, and all other ways and means by which the people are held in bondage and ignorance, and no one can read THE TRUTH SEEKER a year without becoming nobler and better. You can get the paper three months on trial for fifty cents, and if you try it you will not want to be without it thereafter."

THE Buffalo Liberal and Scientific League issue a challenge to the clergy of Denver or any other city, offering $50 in cash and $10 per year on subscription for five years if they will read in full the references given below, not omitting any word, and explain the meaning of the same to their congregations on any Sunday morning. The League will not accept as an excuse that these passages were written in an age of barbarism or ignorance—if they were, the League holds that it is a disgrace to the Christian world and advancing civilization to still incorporate such verses in a creed which is presented as a guide to a land where all is purity. While not denying what is true and beautiful in the Bible, call is made upon the Christian world in the name of decency and civilization to offer a Bible that they dare read before any company. The references are: Gen. xix. 36. Gen. xxx. 15. 16. Gen. xxxi. 35. Gen. xxxv. 22. Gen. xxxviii. 9. Leviticus xv. 24, 33. Lev. xx. 18. Lev. xviii. 1–24. Numbers xxxi. xxv. 1. Deut. xxii. 13–17. ON the authority of Joseph Cook (and our readers will at once perceive that we must take it for what it is worth) the German empire will in time be ruled by a man who if not a Freethinker is the next thing to it. "When the present emperor dies," he groans, "there will come to the throne in the German empire a man of most Liberal opinions in theology. The crown prince is not a Rationalist. I do not regard him as an opponent to Christianity, but he is married to a daughter of Queen Victoria, who thinks that any man who believes in miracles is either a hypocrit or a fool. She was a pupil of Strauss. One of the first important remarks I heard on going to Germany nine years ago—and the sentence came from no less a man than Prof. Tholuck—was that the crown prince had married a woman of frivolous opinions in theology, and that great harm might ultimately come to the empire from her being a pupil of Strauss, the author of the mythical theory. A similar opinion I met often on a recent tour to six of the foremost German cities and universities." And, speaking of Cook, it givs us pleasure to quote the following estimate of him by a correspondent of the Poughkeepsie News-Press. The letter to that paper runs as follows: "It is a pleasing fact that the News-Press is disposed to show up in his true light that prince of liars and slanderers, that fraud and charlatan. Jo Cook, who is inherently not only these but an ill-mannerly boor and a coarse, disagreeable, self-conceited, and malicious literary pirate. Your correspondent, J. B. W., hits him hard, but the same charges made by him hav often been made against the Rev. Jo, notably so by John Fiske, one of the ablest men in America, who, in an article published in the North American Review, after an exhausted review of Joseph, closes up on this distinguished clergyman as follows: 'If we were to go through with Mr. Cook's volumes in detail we should find little else but misrepresentations of facts, misconceptions of principles, and floods of tawdry rhetoric, of which the specimens here quoted are quite sufficient to illustrate his "fundamental method of procedure." I hav not treated him seriously or with courtesy because there is nothing in his matter or in his manner that would justify, or even excuse, a serious method of treatment. The only aspect of his career which really affords matter for grave reflection is the case in which he succeeded for the moment in imposing on the credulity and in appealing to the prejudices of the public. The eagerness with which the orthodox world hailed the appearance of this new champion—whose very orthodoxy, withal, seems to be but little sounder than his science—cannot but remind one with sad emphasis of Oxenstjern's famous remark, Quam parva sapient in mundus regitur.'"

A PAMPHLET that is making considerable sensation among the Quakers is "The Decline of Friends: the Cause and Remedy." It is written by a birthright member of the society, but from its radical tone we imagin that is the only right he has among them. The cause of the decline he finds to be because the Quakers withhold their faith and consent from a scientific religion. While educating their youth in the direction of the highest scientific standard, they ask and expect them to accept a religion not based on nor supported by science. Their ministers are mainly those who, if not opposed, seem to see no necessity for such a religion. Most of them that are indorsed by the society really know little of science. The qualities that recommend them to this favored position are their attachment and devotion to the mythologic personifications and to the style, language, and tone of the interpretations that hav distinguished the teaching of the past. Our religious teachers are promoted for faithfulness to the methods, peculiarities, and traditions that we hav inherited. The remedy the author believes to be an adaptation of their religion to the advanced knowledge of the world. The education the children hav received has caused them to outgrow the religious conceptions of their fathers. The education, developing scientific thought and free criticism, is liberating the people, even the children, from all fear and reverence of any personal God, and those judgments and punishments on the one side, and loving care and rewards on the other. They see no data or evidence of them in nature, nor can they draw any such deductions from the revelations of the sciences, and the researches and reasonings of the great thinkers whose writings the modern teacher encourages his pupils to read. Our school lessons are dispelling all these terrors and gloomy superstitions from both the mind and feelings of the young. When they hear the sermon of exhortation, or read the religious literature that alludes to such subjects, they feel a disgust, if not a contempt, at efforts and for lessons that they know are false, and are intended to frighten, awe, and subdue, rather than instruct. They cannot respect nor patiently listen to the language of superstition—the old personifying, figurativ style of the illiterate, unscientific ancients, in which they refer to God as having all the functions, feelings, and fantasies of human beings. These pictures and pantomime representations of deity exercising himself like a man or woman, and exhibiting his anxiety and deep concern for our welfare, of doing all he can to save us, are by the young people now appreciated as pious mimicry, as merely fraudulent or misguided efiorts, intended in all sincerity, to save by strategem, by appeals to their marvelousness and credulity, the children whom they cannot, from their own ignorance and incapacity, control or influence by more rational, enlightened lessons and methods. Thinking young people despise such theories.

Book Notices.

The subjoined notices of "The Darwins" and "Godly Women" are from the Woman's Herald of Industry:

THE DARWINS. A Domestic Romance. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

We get wise bits of talk, beautiful views, and charming vistas of a pure home love in this volume. If young married people would buy the book and model their homes upon the plan of the Darwins' home, and rear their children in the natural, healthful (physically, morally, and mentally) way in which the Darwins reared theirs, we should be surrounded by thrifty intelligence, instead of squalid misery in hovels, and the misery of luxurious debauchery in palaces. In speaking of the importance to be attached to the three-meals-a-day system, Mrs. Darwin says (page 41): "Some people say, Eat but two meals a day, and no supper; but I never could think it a good plan to go so long without eating. Not only is one apt to overeat at breakfast, after so protracted a fast, but as the stomach gets empty, the gastric juices begin to attack the membrane and coatings, and this causes irritation, and often inflammation. I never hear of a child being punished by depriving it of a meal but I wish the ignorant parent could look with a physician's eye and see the state of the little stomach which is suffering from need of its wonted nourishment. I long for the great and glorious day to come when all punishments shall forever cease, and men become wise, gentle, thoughtful, and good. The world is full of unavoidable aches and pains, and people hav to undergo suffering enough without inflicting it upon themselvs. There was a time when men thought that the more they crucified the flesh, the nearer they were to heaven; but now they hav evoluted beyond that, and the sooner they progress on past all desire to inflict wilful pain upon others, the better it will be for the world."

GODLY WOMAN. Cloth, 75 cts.; paper, 60 cts.

Here we hav a strong, brave, woman's rights book. It makes woman herself responsible for much of her babyish helplessness. It shows that she forges her own chains in re'using to see and investigate cause and effect; that she takes everything second-hand and second-class simply because she is too lazy to get out the spade and pickaxe of thought and delve in the mine of investigation herself. Every unprejudiced mind will be improved and made stronger for life's battles for having read this book, which givs, in word-painting, such a keen insight into the highways and byways of the human family.

A Strange Cargo—Two Million Bulls.

Perhaps the strangest cargo ever carried on board ship was during Queen Elizabeth's time, when, says Hume, "one Thomas White, a Londoner, took two Spanish ships which, besides 1,400 chests of quicksilver, contained two million bulls for indulgences; a commodity useless to the English, but which had cost the king of Spain three hundred thousand florins, and would hav been sold by him in the Indies for five millions." Just imagin what dead loads of sin these papal bulls might hav gored into nonentity by clearing accounts between the Indian sinners and old Job's friend Satan. What in Old Nick's name ever became of these bulls? History is silent.

HOLP.

E. H. Heywood and Wendell Phillips.

From the February Word.

In Providence, R. I., January, 1855, I first heard Phillips, and at once moved to elect him anniversary orator of the literary societies of Brown University. After weeks of hard work we won, though I came near being expelled from college for it, so bitter then was the venom of Christians who cried "Infidel," and of politicans who shouted "traitor." Mr. Phillips came, spoke in Rev. Dr. Hall's church, delighting all sincerely intelligent listeners, and leaving hypocrits howling.

Already in the fight for colored children's rights in public schools, I was taken by my personal friends, Geo. T. Downing and James Jefferson, to Fred. Douglass and Chas. L. Remond, and made it my work to voice the slave's cause in prayer-meetings, Sunday-schools, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Franklin Lyceum, and the University Debating Societies, winning a hearing for, if not an indorsement of, my "Infidel traitors," the abolitionists, in every body of which I was a member. Liberalized out of evangelical pulpits, by the thought of Garrison, Beecher, Phillips, and Parker, leaving church to save my soul, shedding state in self-respect, I accepted Garrison's request to speak at South Framingham, July 4, 1858, and subsequently, by Mr. Phillips's urgency, became lecturer and general agent of the Antislavery Society, Mr. Phillips also opening my way to Theodore Parker's lyceum lecture platform. During all the fierce mob scenes of 1860–1, I stood be-between Phillips and foes of Free Speech. Knowing war to be immoral and impolitic, working for liberty and peace by evolution rather than bloodshed, our ways parted till October, 1866, when Mrs. Heywood and I were called by telegram to speak with him and others on labor in Faneuil Hall. He there said: "Don't discuss debt, don't meddle with the money or land questions, but stick to eight hours." I said to myself, "We will see whether you can do it!" He spoke in that strain till 1872, when, under this then unfinished roof, in a cordial interview, he explained to us his change of mind, and talked little but finance afterwards! "Why not come into the Labor Conventions again?" I asked. He replied: "After one has worked forty years, served in twenty movements, and been kicked out of all of them, he rather likes to paddle his own canoe!"

Gladly would I fill columns with personal reminiscences of this wonderful man, but can only just stop to say how he came to marry Annie Greene. Mrs. Phillips, relating incidents of their confluent life, once said to me: "It was in old stage-coach days; I, with other girls, was booked for Greenfield, Mass. Mr. Phillips and Charles Sumner, then both boys in Harvard law school, agreed to go also. Sumner broke his engagement; Mr. Phillips went. I talked abolition to him all the way up, all the time there. He listened, came again, and it sealed his fate!"

At the "World's Convention" in London, June 12–15, 1840, when women were denied seats on account of sex, and Garrison went into the gallery with Lucretia Mott and others, Mrs. Stanton speaks of Mrs. Phillips: "She had just returned from her bridal tour on the continent, and was in the zenith of her beauty; had a profusion of dark-brown hair, large loving-blue eyes, and regular features; was tall, graceful, and talked with great fluency and force. Her whole soul was in the pending issue. As we were about entering the convention she laid her hand on her husband's shoulder, admonishing him to be brave and firm." Grandly loyal to woman's personalities during all her subsequent invalid years, Mr. Phillips used to say: "She builds the platforms; I simply go on them and make speeches." The inspirational vigor and devoted activity with which his life was vocal from the Lovejoy meeting in Fanueil Hall, December 8, 1837, meet us on every page of his published speeches:

"Lovejoy stood within constitutional bulwarks defending the freedom of the press: the men who assailed him went against and over the laws. Shame on the American who calls the tea tax and stamp act laws! Our fathers resisted not the king's prerogativ, but the king's usurpation. The rioters of our day go for their own wills, right or wrong. When I heard the gentleman (Attorney-General Austin) lay down principles which place the murderers of Alton side by side with Otis, Hancock, Quincy, and Adams, I thought those pictured lips (pointing to portraits in the hall) would hav broken into voice to rebuke the recreant American—the slanderer of the dead. For the sentiments he has uttered, on soil consecrated by the prayers of Puritans, and the blood of patriots, the earth should hav yawned and swallowed him up. Lovejoy did not cry anarchy and let slip the dogs of civil war, careless of horrors which might follow. He took refuge under the banner of liberty, amid its folds; when he fell its glorious stars and stripes, the emblem of free institutions, around which cluster so many stirring memories, were blotted out in the martyr's blood. Accursed are those who 'damn with faint praise,' or load with obloquy the memory of this man who shed his blood in defense of life, liberty, property, and freedom of the press. Imprudent to defend the freedom of the press! Why? Because the defense was unsuccessful? Does success gild crime into patriotism, and the want of it change heroic self-devotion to impudence? Presumptuous to assert freedom of press on American ground! Who invents this libel on his country? It is this very thing that entitles Lovejoy to greater praise. The disputed right which provoked the Revolution—taxation without representation—is far beneath that for which he died. As much as thought is better than money, so much is the cause in which Lovejoy died nobler than a mere question of taxes. James Otis thundered in this hall when the king did but touch his pocket. Imagin, if you can, his indignant eloquence had England offered to put a gag on his lips. The question that stirred the Revolution touched our civil interests. This concerns us not only as citizens, but as immortal beings. Wrapped up in its fate, saved or lost with it, are not only the voice of statesmen, but the instruction of pulpits and the progress of our faith. . . . Woman stands now at the same door; open Congress, court-house, colleges, and giv to the sisters of the Motts and the Somervilles the same opportunities for culture men hav, and let the result prove what their capacity and intellect really are. Open to woman the same scenes, immerse her in the same great interests and pursuits, and if twenty centuries shall not produce a woman Charlemagne or Napoleon, fair reasoning will then allow us to conclude that there is some distinctiv peculiarity in the intellects of the sexes. Second-rate men doubt; but the mightiest intellects of the race, from Plato down, the rarest minds of Germany, France, England, concede that woman is, not perhaps identically, but equally, endowed with man in all intellectual capabilities. Often by her efforts, always by her economy, she contributes much to the stock of family wealth, and is thus entitled to a voice in the control and disposal of it. Neither common sense nor past experience encourages her to trust the protection of that right to the votes of men. Every class should be endowed with power to protect itself. Man has hitherto presumed to settle what is best for woman; prejudices never were reasoned up, and cannot be reasoned down. Take your rights; your suffrage claim is a great moral protest against the very fabric of society; it goes down beneath the altar at which you worship, beneath the social system in which you liv. . . . Giv us time, and talk is all-powerful; we feel ourselvs overshadowed in the presence of colossal institutions; we ask what can a few hundred or thousand persons do against the weight of government, the mountainous odds of majorities, the influence of the press, the power of the pulpit, the organization of parties, the omnipotence of wealth; yet a dozen earnest men pledged to ideas, silently maturing regeneration of public opinion, beget revolution. Nothing but freedom, justice, truth is of any permanent advantage to the mass of mankind; the accumulated common sense of the people outweighs the greatest statesman; every thoughtful man is a jury to which he answers, a tribunal to which he must bow; nothing can stand against opinions, and the tongue and press are parents of opinions reflecting eternal principles of justice and right; stand on the pedestal of your own individual independence; summon institutions about you, and judge them; giv me anything that walks erect, can read, and he shall count one in the millions of the Lord's sacramental host which is yet to come up and trample all oppression in the dust. . . . The idea of liberty is the great fundamental principle. A man is worth more than a bank vault. Better that human laws be trampled under foot and the order of societv be broken every day than that one man go back to slavery. Where is the battle-field, however ghastly, which is not white, white as an angel's wing, compared with the blackness of that darkness which has brooded over the Carolinas for two hundred years? Whether the states be separate or united, neither my brother nor any other man's brother shall go back to bondage. . . . Persecution is really want of faith in our creed. Let us learn that lesson the whole circle round. The whole of truth can never do harm to the whole of virtue; and in order to get the whole truth you must allow every man, right or wrong, freely to utter his conscience, and protect him in so doing."

Such are a few of the many noble words which during fifty years, came as gospels from those now silent lips! Who shall measure the moral service done, and yet to be ever activ in these potent inspirations? He was no mere priest, statesman, jurist, scholar, scientist, who with written discourse rose to speak. Impromptu, inspirational, off-hand, he was and is the living word, which creates learning, law, art, philosophy, religion—everything worthy in human society and compared with whose opulent divinity collectiv power, material wealth, are indeed unattractiv! While others sought money, position, fame, he, asking what is right, gave to the oppressed, the poor, the forlorn, his munificent strength, forgetting self to be remembered in the benedictions of grateful people through all coming years. The clear, girl vision and resolute, woman character which drew him to Annie Greene, blending their being in beneficent destiny, still liv in her whom he hoped to survive, and who, perhaps, has further work to do for millions whose hearts now beat in sympathy toward her. Phillips, the orator, Garrison, the editor, were moralists of victorious growth, in which liberated millions now rejoice. Equally clear discernment of principles and as decisiv action were hardly to be expected of them in later reforms. Thankful are we that they lived and wrought. Let us pay the debt due them by work well done in our day.

Thomas Paine and Benjamin Franklin.

W. H. BURR, AT THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTHDAY OF THOMAS PAINE, WASHINGTON, 1884.

Thomas Paine and Benjamin Franklin made this nation.

They first met in 1774—one 37, the other 68, years of age—a young old man and an old young man.

Paine had been removed from the excise office, where he had served the government a dozen years, at £50 a year. Franklin had been insulted at court, and was preparing to quit England forever.

Was Paine poor? No. His £50 a year probably never paid his expenses, and yet he always had money to spare. Whence, then, were his resources? For some years between the ages of 16 and 21 he had been at sea as a privateersman; and from the fact that he was called Commodore we may infer that he had risen to the rank of captain. This is not at all incredible in his case, for one of his biographers says that at 22 he looked to be a dozen years older.

Now, the business of a privateer is making a pile of money at great risk. It is therefore probable that the youthful captain quit the sea with a considerable sum of prize-money. And from what we know of his philanthropy, we must believe that he intended to use that money in a way that would be likely to do the most good to mankind.

Before the end of 1774, Paine sailed to America with letters of introduction from Franklin. His ostensible purpose was to seek employment as a teacher or surveyor. Did he do any teaching or surveying here? Not that we know of. In March, 1775, he writes an anonymous article for the Pennsylvania Magazine. In style it is a model of elegance.

But later in that year where is he? The papers of the time announce that he had started a manufactory of saltpeter. That was a blind. Saltpeter could not be made in any quantity short of three years. The caves of India afforded all the supply.

Without saltpeter there could be no gunpowder, and just as soon as hostilities began in America, England would stop the importation here of arms, gunpowder, and saltpeter. Hence it was that in October of that year, General Washington, though he had General Howe penned up in Boston, dared not advance one step, because his men had not five rounds of gunpowder. This fact was made known to Franklin at the time, but he always knew how to keep a secret. Had General Howe known it, the American army would hav had to disperse.

At this time I discover that Paine was in England. Franklin's arrival was on the 10th of May. I find no trace of Paine in America from April to December, 1775. By the time Franklin got here, Paine was in England. What took him back so soon? He doubtless went for gunpowder. After the 19th of of April, gunpowder was America's greatest need. The die was cast; revolution had begun. "No man," says Paine, "was a warmer wisher for reconciliation than myself before the fatal 19th of April, 1775."

I say he went for gunpowder, not only inferentially, because that was most needed, but because I discover that before he returned to America Franklin sent another man to France for gunpowder. He addressed a letter December 9, 1775, to Mons. Dumas, and sent it by Mr. Storey. In that letter he inclosed £100 to defray expenses in procuring the shipment from France of small arms, ammunition, and saltpeter.

What positiv evidence hav I that Paine was in England in the latter half of the year 1775? I will tell you. Just before Franklin left England, a little weekly paper was started called the Crisis. It advocated the cause of America, and denounced the policy of the ministry in unmeasured terms. The writers for that paper were anonymous. The first issue was January 21, 1775. In April appeared the first article by "Casca." (It was Casca who stabbed Cæsar.) The writer, I think, was not yet in England, but soon afterward, as appears from internal evidence and from notices by the publisher, he was in or about London, though never known to the printer. Ten articles by Casca are published during that year, and they continue on during the early part of 1776, though the writer is not there later than November, 1775; and the paper ceases to exist after the declaration of independence.

A republication of the Crisis was begun in New York in 1776, but went no farther than one volume, ending with the paper of July 29, 1776.

I hav a suspicion that Franklin started that paper before he left England, and as soon as practicable got Paine to write for it. A memorandum on a bound copy of the Crisis of 1775–6, reads, "By order of the House of Commons, burnt by the common hangman."

A copy of this Crisis of 1775–6, was first seen by me in the Congressional Library Oct. 14, 1880. I had never before heard of such a book—never knew of any by that title except Paine's "Crisis" of 1776–1783.

Four days later, as I was examining Sherwin's "Life of Paine" (1819) in the library, I read a note in substance as follows:

"In the edition of 'Paine's Political Works' recently published there is an error. The first number of the 'Crisis' there inserted is not by Paine. I find the same in a copy of what is called the English Crisis, a work entirely distinct from that written by Paine. The article is signed 'Casca.' The error first occurs in an edition by Eaton, 1796. The article is omitted in other editions except the recent one referred to."

This mysterious reference to the Crisis of 1775, and especially to Casca, surprised me greatly. But I was still more astonished to find penciled on the margin of the same page this note, which I afterward found to hav been written by the librarian, Mr. Spofford:

"It is by Paine, but does not belong to the Crisis. It refers to Gen. Gage's proclamation of July 17 [June 12], 1775, and is entitled, 'A Crisis Extraordinary.'"

Mr. Spofford further added that Eaton's edition of 1796 was simply Paine's works (i.e., his "Crisis," 1776-1783), with the paper referred to by Sherwin (i.e., "A Crisis Extraordinary"), tacked at the beginning.

I went to Mr. Spofford and asked him if he had a copy of that "Crisis Extraordinary." In a few moments he produced it in a volume of Colonial pamphlets. It was dated Aug. 9, 1775, which was later than the last number of the American reprint of the English Crisis that I had been examining. He also produced Eaton's edition of 1794, which contained the same "Crisis Extraordinary" prefixed to Paine's Crisis of 1776–1783, and signed, "American C. S." C. S. means "Common Sense," Paine's nom de plume in America. He never signed his own name to any paper, so far as I am able to discover, until 1786.

Paine was in England Aug. 9, 1775, when "A Crisis Extraordinary" was there published. Gage's proclamation was issued on June 12th, and it would hav reached London in about a month. There it afforded a proper occasion for the publication of "A Crisis Extraordinary," and Paine got it published as an extra. It begins with a quotation in Latin from Horace —Projicit ampullias—which he freely translates as follows:

"On souls of slavery more than death afraid,
Gage wastes his pardons and his gasconade."

And it closes with this paragraph:

"The die is cast in the great Divan (the wise council of the nation), and those who would rise again to the state of liberties of Englishmen must rise through blood. The parricides of the Constitution general, are to be found in England, not in America; nor can happiness, peace, liberty, and law be now restored (unless Providence miraculously intervenes), but by another Revolution."

The identification of Paine as Casca by Librarian Spofford was a little prior to my discovery of the same. He detected Paine in a single anonymous essay. I discovered him in a series from April, 1775, to April, 1776, all signed "Casca."

Mr. Spofford up to this time (1880) had withheld his assent to the claim that Paine was Junius. How he can now withstand the evidence I cannot conceive; nor do I know that he is still unconverted. The last words of Junius were:

"You are roused at last to a sense of your danger. The remedy will soon be in your power. If Junius livs you shall often be reminded of it."

Junius promised to come again. Casca's appearance three years later was the first fulfilment of that promis, though nobody discovered it until 1880.

Junius was unknown even to the publisher; so was Casca.

Junius said: "I am the sole depository of my own secret, and it shall perish with me." That promis he kept; and so he did the other, not only when he reappeared in England as Casca, but in America as "Common Sense."

For a hundred years nobody was able to discover Junius. Just one hundred years to a day from the date of his last letter, I announced his identity from a platform in this city, to an assemblage about as large as this.

But it was not I who discovered it. Mr. Joel Moody, of Kansas, had made the discovery and demonstrated it in a book which I on the 21st of January, 1872, first exhibited to the public.

So, too, it was a hundred years before Mr. Spofford and I discovered Casca to be Paine. Mr. Spofford was a little in advance of me. He said Casca was Paine; I went further and declared that Casca was Junius come again pursuant to promis.

"The cause of America," said Paine, "made me an author." That cause crops out in the "Letters of Junius," and is the principal theme of Casca.

Paine's work was for the most part secret. He did not come out before the public until 1791 in his answer to Burke on the "Rights of Man." And even after that he did much secret work.

Franklin, too, was excessivly secretiv. The two men worked together, yet appearing to keep apart; and, indeed, most of the time the ocean separated them. But for their secret work our independence would not hav been achieved. Hence I repeat, Paine and Franklin made this nation.

Letters from Friends.

SOUTHAMPTON, Jan. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As this proves to be a very severe winter, and all we can do is to keep ourselvs and stock comfortable, the "In God we trust" (the almighty dollar) has almost forsaken us. But as I am a life subscriber, and would not do without THE TRUTH SEEKER for ten thousand Bibles, please find inclosed $5.00. Fraternally, J. G. KENDALL.

CERESCO, MICH., Jan. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER has been born never to die. It is very much needed in this neighborhood as a light to enlighten the gentiles, and to bring to their right reason all these fanatical Christians who are worshiping a myth and are afraid to do anything else on account of that diabolical threat, "Believe in me and be saved, or disbelieve and go to hell and be damned"—the most wicked and villainous threat ever offered to the human family. You are on the right track; go ahead.

THOMAS KNIGHT.

FARMER CITY, ILL.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find five dollars to pay for your paper last year and this. I feel sorry for being so negligent in paying up. I cannot truthfully plead inability, for there has not been a day in the last year in which I might not hav paid you. I hope I may be more prompt in future, for the paper I must hav. It has become to me one of the necessaries of life. I hav read every number, from the first, issued in Paris, Ill., to the last, and I cannot do without it.

As long as I can raise the subscription price and remain on this earth I shall take it, unless it materially changes its character. To stop the paper while i is working to accomplish the ends of its founder would be dishonoring the memory of the revered Bennett. Yours for truth, O. J. SMITH.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Jan. 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order ($2.50) for my next term for your leading Freethought paper. This being my first letter to your office since the death of Friend Bennett, I desire to express a few words for our departed hero, whose life was spent in pursuit of knowledge and truth. I had the honor of entertaining Brother Bennett on his around-the-world trip, which gave me an opportunity to comprehend and appreciate his value. The world has lost a friend and hero whose place is seldom filled in a generation. I trust our loss is the gain of the life beyond; and should death end all, his labors will stand like a bright and guiding star for generations to come. The fairness of Mr. Bennett, like THE TRUTH SEEKER he founded, is seldom equaled. Hoping the world will soon learn to appreciate its best productions better, R. H. SCHWARTZ.

WYANDOTTE, KAN., Jan. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please renew my hold and lease upon the dear old TRUTH SEEKER. Let me read my title clear another year.

You will notice by the slip of newspaper inclosed from a Kentucky journal that we are hanging by the "skin of our teeth on the ragged edge of eternal damnation—on the very brink of hell-fire and brimstone." It reminds me of old Mrs. Brown in Jerseyville, Ill., who prayed for the conversion of her husband, and said: "O Lord, hold him over hell, but don't drop him in, Lord." You will see that Dr. Bell wished to discuss hell, but the chairman of the advisory committee would report favorably when they got to hell. The Rev. Dr. Hull's remarks were the best of all, when he said that a great many preachers were unconverted; that they were made to order, and were ready to plead law, practice medicin, or preach—anything that solved the bread-and-butter problem.

J. A. DAVIES.

CANTON, ILL., Jan. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed post-office order for the before mentioned four persons and my own subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

In convassing for your paper I go among those who hav had sample copies. I find fully three-fourths of them Liberal, but I cannot get over one-tenth of that number to subscribe. Their different excuses are: 1. They are taking more papers now than they hav time to read; 2. They hav time to read only that which pertains to their business; 3. They are too poor; 4. Their women would object to their bringing it about the house. And I will add two more: 1. They are afraid it will hurt their popularity; 2. They are too stingy. On the first, it reminds one of the story of Betsy and the bear. On the second reason it would be well enough to quote Chainey and Ingersoll's "Lights and Shadows of Liberalism."

Yours truly, JOHN W. ABBOTT.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The 147th anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine was celebrated by Friendship Liberal League, No. 257, on Sunday, the 27th ult., afternoon and evening. The afternoon services were opened by an introductory address from the chairman, Mr. W. F. Porter, who introduced the speaker of the day, Mr. George Chainey, of Boston, who delivered his lecture entitled, "The Nature and Progress of Freethought in America." He was followed by Mr. J. Clegg Wright, of Vineland, N. J. The evening exercises consisted of music, recitations, short addresses, etc., and were of a social nature.

At the banquet, to which about three hundred friends and admirers of Paine and Freethought sat down, several toasts were proposed, among them one to "Man," which was responded to by Mme. El-D. Louie. W.

CEDAR SPRINGS, MICH., Jan. 10, 1884

MR. EDITOR: It is with a sad heart that I write you a few lines to anounce to you, and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the death of my husband. Ambrose S. Croxton. He passed on, on the 23d of December, after a short sickness of three days. Your readers are familiar with him through his article on prohibition, which appeared in a March number of your paper, and which brought him many flattering letters and cards. I would say to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that he died as he lived, a foe to all superstition, and a great worker in the cause of right and for humanity. The last public act of his life was to bring to the notice of some of our citizens a circular that had been posted in our village to the effect that a certain minister would deliver a lecture to bring before the public the necessity of putting "God in the Constitution." Mr. Croxton had just renewed his subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also sent for some books, all of which hav been received.

Respectfully yours, OLIVE A. CROXTON.

MONTREAL, Jan. 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Your note to hand, also parcel of "Age of Reason." No more seizures! Ordinarily it is annoying to hav to waste one's time going to the Customs for such small parcels, but in this case it is becoming quite amusing to see how hurriedly the package is handed over when the contents are known, as if in fear of contamination, and in spite of the most pressing invitations to seize them (most of the clerks are, of course, Roman Catholic). And if this occurs very often, I don't know but what the government will yet be called on to keep them supplied with holy water to wash their hands after handling the vile stuff, and to disinfect the premises. I send you card for insertion in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also our program for January. You will see that we will hold our annual festival on the 16th inst., and you will receive, through the secretary, an invitation to be present. I can hardly hope that you will accept it, but if you do so, we shall appreciate your courage in facing a Canadian winter, and giv you a most hearty welcome.

We hav had a flood to begin the year with, which has caused a great amount of damage in the lower portions of the city. Strange to say, the basement of the Young Men's Christian Association was invaded, and, notwithstanding the prayers that were offered, the water rose just as high there as anywhere else. And the consequence was that their fires were extinguished, the heating apparatus busted, and the doors had to be closed until the waters were assuaged. The members, however, unlike Noah, were shut out of their ark.

"The children of this world are wiser than the children of light," and while the doves could not find a resting-place, those infernal Freethinkers, who had builded a little higher up on a surer foundation, were enjoying themselvs to their hearts' content, without fear of water in this world or fire in the next. Verily the devil looks after his own, and the ways of the Lord are past finding out.

Yours very truly, C. STEVENS.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Feb. 2, 284.

MR. EDITOR: There is one error and some omission in my article on Paine. I hav known the old stone house at Valley Forge for sixty years. You hav it I lived in it for sixty years. I never lived in it. The word Paola is omitted. It was at Paola where the army rested in their tents on their retreat from Chadsford, where the British came on after, and bayonetted scores, if not hundreds, as they slept. The Paola is a noted place in the history of the Revolutionary war. The cherry-tree that saved H. Martin's life was visited by Lafayette on his last visit. I think he put his name on it when Elias Hicks and Willet visited Paine. They both at that time (1809) adhered to the divinity of Christ. But in 1826 Elias wholly renounced the idea of Christ's divinity, and taught that he was a man as other men are—came into being in the natural way, as all men do. This caused the separation in the society, the orthodox adhering to the old orthodox creed. The other part were termed Hicksites Hicks repudiated the miraculous conception of Jesus, and espoused Paine's doctrins in full. H. WILLIS.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Feb. 4, 284.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of this place and Santa Clara celebrated the 147th anniversary of Paine's birthday at the California Theater in this city on Wednesday evening, Jan. 30th. We were obliged to put it off one day on account of the theater being engaged by other parties on the 29th.

The weather was very unfavorable. It having rained more or less nearly all the time for the five days previous. For that cause our speaker (a lady) failed to put in an appearance, and at the last moment we were obliged to call on another party, who was wholly unprepared, but proved himself equal to the emergency, and gave us a short and stirring address.

The program consisted of music, instrumental, Mr. and Mrs. Schuertz; opening remark for chairman; address, Prof. S. S. Rizer; song, Turner's Glee Club (encored); cornet solo, with piano accompaniment, Mr. and Mrs. Schuertz; song, Prof. Elliott (encored); instrumental music, Mr. and Mrs. Schuertz.

The stage was decorated with American flags, a large picture of the author-hero, and his motto, "The world," etc. Respectfully yours,

THOMAS JACOB.

PATERSON, N J, January 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I, as a life-long Liberal, want to enter my honest protest against the disgraceful article of "Liberta." Not being satisfied with his abuse of Mr. Walker, he must needs go for the convention and question the character and judgment of some of the ablest and best men in the Liberal ranks. This, taken in connection with his charging Mr. Walker as being an ignoramus, is such an exhibition of self-sufficiency and vanity that it stands unequaled in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and if truth seekers that read it are not thoroughly disgusted they are the odds of the writer of this.

Now, as to the merits of the question at issue I deem it unnecessary to speak, except to say that Mr. Walker has expressed my views, and in a very able, logical manner; and in my opinion he covers the whole ground, and takes a position which all consistent Liberals must per force acknowledge and defend. If I thought it were necessary for me to treat the weak and contradictory character of "Liberta's" answer to Mr. Walker's able letters, I would make an effort in that direction; but believing that Mr. Walker can and will do it in a more cogent manner, in his hands I leave him—to be routed horse, foot, and dragoons.

In conclusion, I would ask "Liberta" to step forth from his coward's castle, so that we can know who this Goliath of the Liberal army is.

I am yours, dear Mac, for Walker and the platform of the last convention, with its seventh resolution, first, last, and all the time. JOHN WARR.

PORTLAND OR., Jan. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Our young Auxiliary Liberal League, being only a few months of age, had expressed a desire to celebrate the anniversary of Thomas Paine's birthday. The hall where the League holds its usual meetings was considered too small. It was therefore decided that the celebration should take place in some other hall. A committee consisting of Messrs. Fisk, Alisky, Egan, Youse, and myself was appointed for that purpose, and the only hall we could obtain for the evening of the 29th was the so-called Turn Verein Hall, the largest and most popular in our city. The celebration was advertised in all daily newspapers, printed programs distributed and mailed to Liberals in the vicinity, yet we were afraid that only a few people would come, and the soft-headed priests would hav a chance to laugh at us. Who knows what could be if a heavenly messenger, or rather an earthly devil, would not put in his hellish tongue? I speak of the Rev. F. R. Marvin, of the Congregational church, who on the previous Sunday evening delivered a purely theological lecture, rather vindication, on the life of Thomas Paine. The daily newspapers gave full reports of it. The following is an extract from the daily Oregonian: "Thomas Paine is remembered for the worst book he ever wrote—the 'Age of Reason.' I denounce, said Marvin, the 'Age of Reason,' because it is dishonest and illiterate. Paine was an ignorant man of very vulgar tastes, and toward the end of his life he became a common drunkard and town-loafer. Paine turned his hand against nearly every good man and good thing. The 'Age of Reason' is a worthless and dishonest attack upon a religion he did not understand, and upon a Bible he never read. Educated Infidels despise him as heartily as any minister I know of, and the men and women who follow him are for the most part from the lower walks of society. Thomas Paine was neither philosopher nor theologian; he was an incompetent iconoclast, and toward the close of his life he was a miserable sot. Sober, industrious, and thoughtful men will leave Paine and his 'Age of Reason' to the bats and moles. More and more the light of a Christian civilization is dissolving the dark shadows of both superstition and unbelief."

That was enough to encourage every true admirer of our republic, and the result was that the hall was well filled, I would not like to occupy too much space in your columns. I dare not desire it, for I know you will hav to giv room to much correspondence from different places where Paine celebrations took place. I shall only notice that we intend to publish a pamphlet of the proceedings, and every one who is interested in the Freethought of this coast will hav an opportunity to get that little book for two or three nickels. But before that work is done allow me to quote some extracts of the account on the celebration given in the daily Oregonian this morning: "The speaker [Prof W. H. Chaney] read an editorial from the New York Advertiser of June 10, 1807, the day after Paine's deaih, laudatory in the highest degree of Paine's honesty, intelligence, and patriotism. This was written, the speaker continued, a quarter of a century before America was disgraced by the birth of Marvin, the traducer of our hero and patriot. Paine was a man who, while rebuking sin, pitied the sinner. Marvin preaches, 'Love your enemies;' he practices, 'An eye for an eye.' These professing Christians could not burn Paine when living, nor burn his bones after he was dead, as ecclesiastical cutthroats did in former days. Their only course is slander, and the chief of slanderers is F. R. Marvin. . . . Paine accomplished more with the pen than Washington did with the sword. . . . The speaker related that his grandfather had fought in the Revolution, and his father in the war of 1812, and among his earliest recollections was sitting on his grandfather's knee and hearing him tell of 'times that tried men's souls,' until the old man grew livid with excitement. Said he to me, 'If you ever hear a tory defame the American government or the men who fought to establish it, knock him down and trample on him.' . . . I can figurativly consign this modern tory, Marvin, to a seat he has earned alongside of Benedict Arnold and Charles Guiteau in the hottest corner of hell."

A tableau was then shown representing a man tied to the stake of the execution as a heretic by the monks and other officers of the church, wearing crosses and emblems of Christianity. Dr. Rosenspitz, a Jewish rabbi, was then introduced. He said: "I do not believe in souls going up to heaven, for no astronomer ever saw them there; neither do I believe in the apostles given in the New Testament I believe in a God and the angels, and understand the former as 'Goodness,' and the latter as 'messengers.' I therefore claim that Thomas Paine, who said, 'To do good is my religion.' is a true angel of God, whose apostles are not those of the New Testament, but the inventors, mechanics, etc., who benefited and enlightened our world, none of whom were preachers, priests, popes, or saints." (Loud applause.)

The audience were favored with music. Mr. Dean followed with a brief address, in which he alluded to Paine as the advocate of human liberty.

A tableau representing the age of reason was then exhibited, after which the floor was cleared, and those who wished engaged in dancing.

The Osegonian omits a recitation read by Mr. Eddy, and many other proceedings which I don't think to mention here, for I guess space in your paper is very dear now. I will only add that those who like to hav the mentioned pamphlet may send about fifteen cents to Prof. W. H. Chaney, 269 1-2 First street, Portland, Oregon. MOSES F. WAHRHAFTIG.

MR. EDITOR: You accord to your correspondents the privilege of mutual criticism, and if you will go a step further and allow criticism of yourself I shall thereby be gratified. From your editorial of Dec. 15th, on "The Miracle Business," I reproduce the following sentence, with only very brief comment: "That a man could, by laying on of hands, cause a cripple to walk or the blind to see, is most preposterous nonsense." To properly correct the "nonsense" you here giv evpression to would require more time and space than I hav promised to take. A former landladv of mine, Mrs. E. A Hodgdon, now stopping at 150 East 21st st., New York, was on one occasion afflicted with what she called a "hang-on cold." Having myself volunteered my services as a manipulator of the human body in the common ailments which afflict it, wherever I may hav found myself during the last twenty-five or thirty years, I in her case offered to see what effect I might produce; and, good, bad, or indifferent, I was not informed or had anv idea until, some two or three months afterward, I was summoned, on entering the house one evening, to see what I could do for an attack of neuralgia of the right eye, extending in a vertical line up over the head and down to the right shoulder. Upon approaching Mrs. Hodgdon I found her covered with a multitude of wraps, including her own clothes, and I thought to myself that there was a poor chance to penetrate through all this covering, especially as it was out of the question to move or roughly handle her. Gentle passes from head to foot —which, if you will take the trouble to call upon her, she will no doubt tell you—resulted in the cessation of the intense pain, and a perfect cure. At another time she had at least a touch of pneumonia, which by the same simple means vanished.

Two years ago the coming spring, myself a sufferer almost to the extent of suicide with an inflamed eye, I sent for a fellow-professional, Dr. G. C. Hoadly, with the main purpose of placing my will in his possession, as I did not know but what I should be driven to desperation, as above suggested. Upon this visit, at my request he rubbed my eye and head with his hands, and the pain left me, and I hav not suffered a relapse since, although that sickness was a relapse of a former inflammation of the iris.

Now, sir, I deem this testimony due your readers as well as yourself, for I feel that person to be very unfortunate in this world of sickness who is ignorant of the wonderful benefit to be obtained in sickness or health preservation from the thorough manipulation of the body by a congenial person. I hav known of this panacea ever since I was a youth, say about twenty-eight years, and I will say that there is no knowledge I value more highly. The laying on of hands being a beneficence second to none, it banishes as real necessities the productions of the pharmacies of all countries, and makes man only beholden to his neighbor. Undoubtedly Dr. Monck or anyone else can run an idea "into the ground" by tacking onto it the name of Jesus, and thus making some of the superstitious a little wild. In conclusion, Mr. Editor, should you become sick at any time, let drugs alone, get a congenial hand to rub and bathe and giv proper food, and insist upon pure air night and day; and, mv word for it, in this way you will last the longest. DR. GEORGE HARDCASTLE.

[Dr. Hardcastle has misunderstood our meaning, or perhaps the fault is that it was not made clear. We meant the sort of "laying on of hands" practiced by Monck and Jesus—a touch on the affected part and a command to be healed. Nearly all competent physicians commend, and many introduce into their practice, the Swedish movement cure, the massage treatment, the magnetic rubbing treatment, etc., and many wonderful cures are effected. Natural forces so employed are undoubtedly beneficial to sick persons. But the "take-up-your-bed-and-walk" style of treatment is a humbug, whether done in the name of the Almighty or for the almighty dollar.—ED. T. S.]
